LIFE

THE LIFE OF Sir WALTER RALEGH.

EXPERIENCE, and her records, have ſometimes manifeſted to us, That as men, renowned for glorious exploits, abound more in ſome ages than others, according to the genius of the times, or general taſte and purſuit of their contemporaries; ſo if a martial ſpirit ſpring up in the reign of an active and adventurous ſoveraign, he ſhall riſe into high repute, be much honoured and emulated: As, on the other ſide, if it is his fortune to live under a prince of a contrary character, his unfaſhionable virtue, unleſs it be of a ſupple nature, and can mould itſelf to occaſions, will become criminal; and his courage, of leſs ſecurity than cowardiſe.

THE WORTHY, of whoſe life and fortunes I have been perſuaded to attempt a rehearſal, will appear, in the following narrative, a convincing evidence of this obſervation. And what renders his ſtory more remarkable is, that tho' he gave ſuch repeated proofs of a ſuperior conduct, in ſo many important ſtations and characters of life; tho' he was not only maſter of all the accompliſhments requiſite to defend a ſtate in war, but to adorn it in peace; and did render himſelf illuſtrious, as well by letters in the latter, as he had done by arms in the former condition; yet that a warlike reign was of greater ſafety to him, and a peaceful one prov'd his deſtruction. I ſhall not anticipate the cauſes, but only premiſe thus much; That whoever can attend to the repreſentation of a brave man wreſtling with adverſities, and riſing higher in the notice and admiration of the world, the more violently he was oppos'd; whoever is any way concerned to know the effects of thoſe prepoſſeſſions which diffident princes may entertain, and the proſtitutions to which their ſordid inſtruments may be won; or would be informed, what a pernicious foe in his country an inſinuating foreigner may be to thoſe natives who are its real friends; I may recommend him here; and venture to promiſe a proſpect inſtructive, entertaining, and full of variety.

FOR tho' abundance of ſolid particulars are naturally ſunk in the rapid current of time, while many leſs ſubſtantial are floating upon the ſurface, to the hand of every ordinary memorialiſt: And tho' ſome ſhining circumſtances, in the proſperous part of Sir Walter Ralegh's life, have been darken'd through envy; as others, in the unfortunate period, through intereſt, by the age in which he lived; nevertheleſs, his ſingle life may perhaps be found more fruitful of memorable incidents, than many hiſtories of intire ages: Inſomuch, as I may be apprehenſive, with a late collector of his memoirs, " That the deſcribing a perſon of ſo " diffuſive a praiſe, ſo equally great in ſo many different parts of life, will be like at- " tempting a landskip from a high hill, where the multiplicity and extent of the proſpects

" may

" may rather diſtract the mind, than direct it; and call for judgment to reſtrain the fancy, " which is apt to run riot, when employ'd upon too many objects." Many guides may indeed appear to lead us through this wilderneſs; but, numerous as the authors are who mention him, they contain but fragments of his ſtory; divers whereof, hitherto widely diſpers'd, have eſcap'd not only our general hiſtorians, but the many compilers of diſtinct pieces on his actions. Even the moderns, who have treated of him with impartiality, have yet been deficient in point of induſtry, ſo as to prove no leſs injurious to his merits, than ſome who in his own age conſpir'd to depreciate them. Hence the generality, having been too ſuperficial and undigeſted; having neither regarded due choice and order of matter, proportion in the parts, or connexion of the whole; nor yet diſcharged themſelves by ſuch references to proper vouchers, as might ſatisfy thoſe readers it is my ambition to pleaſe; I have eſteemed the number of ſuch writers, no diſcouragement to the revival of his ſtory.

And firſt for the name of Ralegh, otherwiſe written Rale and Ralega, in ſome old deeds I have formerly ſeen;[a] it is certainly of great antiquity in this kingdom; ſince there are ſome villages and towns in the weſt, as well as other parts, ſo call'd,[b] which might at firſt receive their denomination from ſome, as well as afterwards give it to others, who were natives or poſſeſſors thereof. And ſince we are credibly inform'd, that one of thoſe diſtricts belonged anciently to noble lords of the ſame name,[c] as alſo that ſeveral of them were ſo call'd from the very family we are to ſpeak of:[d] And as the Raleghs of Devonſhire will appear to have flouriſhed there before the conqueſt; they might be the progenitors of thoſe in other counties; as it is expreſly intimated out of the records they were of thoſe in Warwickſhire.[e] But as we are alſo told of no leſs than five knights of this name, at one time differently ſituated in that weſtern county before-mention'd;[f] and that there were three great families ſo named alſo there, contemporary with Sir Walter Ralegh's, who bore arms different from thoſe of his paternal coat;[g] we may conclude, they were not all of one lineage; and at the ſame time, that it is owing to the eminency of this great man, that a diſtinction of the ſeveral houſes, and his in particular, when all but his were in a manner extinct, has been ſo elaborately endeavoured by the antiquaries and genealogiſts of his own time.

As to the family of Sir Walter Ralegh therefore in particular, it is generally agreed on, that Smalridge in the pariſh of Axminſter, in the county of Devon, was one of their moſt ancient ſeats. But Sir William Pole, who is ſaid to have been one of the greateſt ſearchers into the antiquities of that country, has been ſingularly ſhort in the time of their firſt ſettling there. However, if we ſhould agree with him upon that perſon for Sir Walter Ralegh's direct anceſtor, who firſt removed thither out of Nettlecomb-Ralegh in Somerſetſhire, in the reign of king Henry III, from whom there is a ſucceſſive deſcent of thoſe ſix knights, Sir Wimond,[h] Sir Hugh, Sir John, Sir Peter, and two Sir Johns more; beſides others, who were either of the ſame degree themſelves, or married into families diſtinguiſh'd with it, even down to Wimond the grandfather of Sir Walter Ralegh:[i] I know not but it may be alſo allowed, that the honours of this pedigree were ſufficient to have been boaſted of by ſome of his traducers. For tho', in the eye of heraldry, many titles are accounted more noble than knighthood; tho' native and patrimonial dignities, or ſuch as deſcend neceſſarily from father to ſon, may in the eye of the common lineal claimant appear moſt legitimate; and ſuch as are venal, be eſteemed in that of the wealthy, moſt valuable; yet thoſe which are perſonal, the individual acquiſition, or recompence of every man's proper merit, will, in the eye of reaſon, be held moſt honourable.

[h] In a viſitation-book, made anno 1623, of the counties of Wilts, Dorſet and Somerſet, among the MS. collections of Brown Willis Eſq; of Whaddon-Hall in Bucks, there is a pedigree of Sir Walter Ralegh's family from the reign of king John; with a copy whereof that worthy antiquary having obliged me, I find this Wymond, in the time of king Henry III, is therein called lord of Coliton and Nettlecomb: So it may ſeem, the eſtate in Somerſetſhire was of later acceſſion to the family, and that in Devonſhire the more ancient ſeat; or that the removal was made rather to the former, than the latter country.

But

But however grateful it may ſeem in that author, who has characteris'd the aforeſaid Sir William Pole, as the firſt and beſt antiquary of his county;[a] though none of his works were ever printed, or perhaps now remain ſufficient to prove him ſo to the public;[b] yet we are at liberty to obſerve, that John Hooker, another famous antiquary and hiſtorian of the ſame county, appears to have been his ſenior;[c] whoſe actual publications, ſeveral years before Sir William Pole is ſaid to have privately apply'd himſelf to theſe ſtudies, had eſtabliſh'd his character, through the applauſes of the beſt judges in his own time;[d] and who, with reſpect to Sir Walter Ralegh in particular, being related to, and acquainted with him, had not only the greateſt opportunities to be expert in his genealogy, but withal publicly addreſſing an account thereof to Sir Walter himſelf, when this knight was in the very meridian of envy and detraction, had the greateſt obligations upon him to be ſtrictly accurate in diſplaying it. Now this author, in one of his performances, gives us to underſtand; that Smalridge was in the poſſeſſion of the Raleghs before the Norman conqueſt; and that one of the family, being taken priſoner by the Gauls, did, for his deliverance upon St. Leonard's day, build, at his return home, a chapel there, conſecrated to that ſaint; and therein, as a grateful monument, hung up his target:[e] the records of which foundation are ſaid to have been given by a prieſt of Axminſter to Sir Walter Ralegh,[f] as their moſt rightful owner. So much for the antiquity of the family in Devonſhire: and as for its derivation, the ſaid Hooker, even in a printed dedication to Sir Walter Ralegh, as I hinted (which he repeatedly confirms in the aforeſaid performance) not only avouches his alliance to the Courtenays, earls of Devon, and other illuſtrious houſes; but traces the ſtream of conſanguinity up to the kings of England: where he ſays, "That one of "his anceſtors in the directeſt line, Sir John de Ralegh of Fardel (another ſeat of their ancient "inheritance in the pariſh of Cornwood, eight miles eaſt of Plymouth) eſpouſed the daughter "of Sir Roger D'Amerei, who married Elizabeth daughter of Gilbert earl of Glouceſter, by "Joan D'Acres, daughter of king Edward I. which Gilbert was deſcended of Robert earl of "Glouceſter, ſon of king Henry I." So goes up to the conqueror: and farther adds, "That "in like manner he may be derived by his mother alſo out of the ſame houſe."[g] But ſince theſe two authors, the likelieſt we have in print to have confirm'd us in the truth of this matter, vary thus from each other; ſince Sir William Pole thought it rather another family of the Raleghs, which was thus royally deſcended; ſince alſo five or ſix ancient pedigrees of this family, which I have ſeen in manuſcript, by the heraldical viſitors, and antiquaries of thoſe weſtern parts, alſo differ, not only from Hooker, but in ſeveral points both from Sir William Pole, and from one another; and laſtly, ſince it will be conſider'd, that I have not undertaken to account for the whole race of the Raleghs, but only one ſelect perſon of the name, here let the truth, as to theſe remote anceſtors or alliances, hover for me: for I am not moved, on the wings of conjecture, to make my ſelf a party with any of thoſe antiquaries, nor ſhall endeavour to compremiſe the difference between them, unleſs ſuch prevailing authorities had occurr'd, as would enable me to do it with certainty. Beſides, as thoſe whoſe virtues have adorned them with a ſufficiency of perſonal honours, are ever leaſt anxious about ſuch as are relative: ſo it might well argue but little weight in the judgment of a hiſtorian, to ſhew himſelf contentious

[b] Many of Sir William's MSS miſcarried in the civil wars ſo effectually, that the very titles and arguments of them are likewiſe periſhed, as Prince tells us in the ſame page; and thoſe four or five volumes this author appears to have had ſome view of, having been ſince lent about, are thought, and have been reported by ſome of the family, to be now alſo irretrievably loſt. See the Engliſh baronets, 12mo. 1728. vol. 1. p. 323. Yet I have been told by a perſon of great honour and knowledge in curioſities of this kind, that he had heard one volume of thoſe collections, if not more, is ſomewhere in being.

[c] Sir William Pole, who was high ſheriff of Devonſhire, and honour'd by king James with knighthood in 1606, when Ralegh was in diſcredit with him, ſeems to have been a writer chiefly in his reign; for though he might apply himſelf twenty years to theſe ſtudies, according to Prince, fol. 506. we yet find one of his largeſt volumes written Ann. 1616, in the ſame page. But Mr. Hooker, who was the firſt chamberlain of Exeter about 1554, and twice member of parliament for that city, as we find in the Notitia Parliamentaria, by Brown Willis Eſq; vol. 2. 1716. p. 272; as alſo for Athenry in Ireland about 1570, as I find by his own words; did actually ſet forth in print his tracts about the government of Exeter, and biſhops of that ſee; beſides his augmentations of the Engliſh and Iriſh chronicles, with other pieces, before, or by the year 1587; and, having lived to near eighty years, died in 1601, according to Anthony Wood, and my ſaid author Prince, in his life; though the former of them quotes from Hooker's own words, that he was living in 1605 (if 'tis not a miſtake of the preſs) and the latter has made no boggle at the blunder.

A copy whereof, in this author's time, was in the cuſtody of Mr. John Eaſtchurch of Wood in that county; ſtill extant, as I have heard in thoſe parts; and pity it is, that it has not yet ſeen the publick light; ſince above a hundred years ago, it was reviſ'd by ſo able a judge of its worth as Sir John Dodderidge, and had his recommendation to the preſs.

about theſe feathers for his worthy; eſpecially ſuch a one, as ſhall be found to have thought ſo juſtly light of them himſelf.

HOWEVER, as all accounts allow him a very honourable extract; let us prefer which we pleaſe, the freedom ſome great courtiers took in calling him Jack and Upſtart, upon his advancement to queen Elizabeth's favour, is thought to have ſomewhat reflected rather on themſelves; in ſuffering their ſprightly parts to take ſuch advantage of their noble principles. One of theſe ſarcaſms I find recorded by lord Bacon, in his little book of Apophthegms,[a] where he ſays, "That when queen Elizabeth had advanced Ralegh, ſhe was one day playing on the virginals, "and my lord of Oxford with another nobleman ſtood by; when it happen'd that the ledge "before the jacks was taken away, ſo that they were ſeen; whereupon that lord and the other "nobleman ſmil'd and whiſper'd a little: the queen mark'd it, and would needs know, what "was the matter? His lordſhip anſwer'd, They laugh'd to ſee, that when jacks went up, heads "went down." Though the application of this reflection particularly to Ralegh, if ſuch was made, is diſputable, notwithſtanding lord Bacon's alluſion, yet it is plain, that Sir Robert Naunton, who was ſecretary of ſtate at the time of Ralegh's death, and whoſe obſervations on that queen's favourites were written, though not printed, before thoſe Apophthegms, thought alſo, that it was made upon Ralegh: for he has ſaid, with relation to this jeſt by that witty earl, "We all know it ſavours more of emulation and his humour, than of truth; it being a certain "note of the times, that the queen, in her choice, never took into her favour a mere new man, "or a mechanick."[b] But it is believ'd, Sir Walter Ralegh himſelf was afterwards pretty even with his quality-critics; where he ſo ſolidly expoſes the emptineſs of merit, nay, the real detriment to it, in poſterity's being entitled to the rewards of their anceſtor's virtues, by hereditary honours; ſucceſſion of blood; and nobility in parchment: thoſe only being truly noble, who by worthy acts have render'd themſelves moſt notable.[c]

His parentage.

ALL therefore that needs be added on this head, as a matter more immediately requiſite, and indeed ſufficient for my preſent purpoſe, is, That Sir Walter Ralegh was the ſon of Walter Ralegh Eſq; of Fardel aforeſaid; who being thrice married, had by his firſt wife Joan, daughter of John Drake of Exmouth in Devon Eſq; two ſons, one named George, and the other John; which laſt married Anne the daughter of Sir Bartholomew Forteſcue of Filley in Devon, and relict of ----- Gaicrick of Ford; and they had iſſue. His ſecond wife was daughter of one Darell of London; by whom he had a daughter named Mary,[d] who was married to Hugh Snedale of Hilling in Cornwall Eſq; and had iſſue:[e] his third wife was Catherine daughter of Sir Philip Champernon of Modbury, and relict of Otho Gilbert of Compton in Devon Eſq; He had by this laſt Venter, his third ſon, Carew, afterwards knighted, and of Wiltſhire, who married Dorothy daughter of Sir William Wroughton, and relict of Sir John Thynn; by whom he had iſſue; and laſtly, his fourth ſon, named Walter, the ſubject of our enſuing diſcourſe; who was thereby the uterine brother of thoſe three eminent knights, Sir John, Sir Humphrey, and Sir Adrian Gilbert. By this laſt wife, Mr. Ralegh had alſo one daughter, named Margaret; who was married firſt to ---- Radford of Mount Radford in Devon, clerk of the peace; and afterwards to ---- Hull of Larkebere Eſq; in St. Leonard's pariſh, Exeter.[f]

THE family was indeed at this time much declin'd from its former ſplendor of fame and affluence of fortune: for the eſtate of Smalridge, which remain'd in the name of Ralegh to the time of king Henry VIII, was then ſold, by Sir Walter's grandfather Wimond, to John the father of Sir John Gilbert of Compton; but I cannot find it reduc'd to that low ebb, in the latter reſpect, which ſome have intimated: for Fardel remain'd ſtill in their poſſeſſion; which, after the death of Sir Walter's father, fell to the eldeſt ſon George; and there were beſides,

[a] I mean the only genuine and uncorrupted edition of them, publiſhed by the author himſelf, in ſmall 8vo, 1625. 'Tis the firſt Apophthegm in the book.

[d] The viſitation of Devonſhire, Ann. 1564, by William Hervy Eſq; Clarencieux, a MS. in the heralds-office.

[e] Among the errors of the clerk or tranſcriber of this viſitation, in the paragraph concerning Sir Walter Ralegh's father (too obvious and minute to be here taken notice of) that aſſertion of this daughter's having no iſſue ſhould not be deem'd one; that book being written probably before ſhe was married.

[f] Though Sir W. Pole, in Prince's Worthies, fol. 530, mentions Sir W. Ralegh's father to have been but twice married, omitting his ſecond wife, and alſo his daughters by her, and his third; yet as one or both of thoſe daughters will hereafter occur, proving him manifeſtly defective in that omiſſion, I have thought it moſt reaſonable to follow ſome other antiquaries of thoſe parts and times, who concur in his marriages and iſſue as they are here diſplay'd. And for this intelligence, the publick is principally obliged to the incomparable Harleyan library; its noble owner having honour'd me with the permiſſion of collecting it from the pedigrees of the Devonſhire gentry, an original MS. by Tho. Weſtcot, recorder of Totneſs, fol. ſign. 99, C. 16. pag. 59; and of collating it with Richard Munday's MS. coll. of pedigrees, fol. ſign. 90. A. 10. pag. 53; and with the viſitation of Devonſhire, by Hen. St. George Eſq; Richmond-herald, and Sampſon Lennard, blue-mantle, deputies for W. Camden Eſq; Clarencieux, Ann. 1620, fol. ſig. 64. B. 14. pag. 366. But ſome of the pedigrees in theſe books, and others I have ſeen of Sir Walter Ralegh's family, might perhaps be improved, at leaſt with relation to the more ancient branches; that is to ſay, from king Henry II. down to king Henry VIII's reign, out of the valuable old deeds and evidences which remain in the cuſtody of Sir John Trevelyan of Nettlecomb in Somerſetſhire, Bart.

Widdycomb-

Widdycomb-Ralegh, and Coliton-Ralegh in their poſſeſſion; the former of which was ſold, by Sir Walter's elder brother Sir Carew Ralegh, to George the natural ſon of George aforeſaid; and the latter was ſold, by Sir Walter himſelf, to Richard Martin, or his father, of Exeter.[a] But neither of theſe places claim the honour of his birth.

Birth-place.

For his father having the remainder of a fourſcore-years leaſe, in a pleaſant farm call'd Hayes, ſituate in the pariſh of Budley, in that part of Devonſhire bordering eaſtward upon the ſea, near where the Ottery, or river of Otters, diſcharges it ſelf into the Britiſh channel; and reſiding upon the ſaid farm during the time of his laſt marriage: this was the birth-place of Sir Walter Ralegh; and it is accordingly diſtinguiſh'd, as for nothing more remarkable, by topographical writers to this day. After the expiration of that leaſe, Ralegh apply'd, but unſucceſsfully, to Mr. Duke of Otterton, to whom the eſtate devolv'd, to ſell it him; as appears by Ralegh's letter to him, wherein he ſays, "That for the natural diſpoſition he had to the place, being "born in that houſe, he had rather ſeat himſelf there, than any-where elſe."[b] From whence, it ſeems, that what ſome are, by another Devonian antiquary, ſaid to have reported, and himſelf appears only to have recorded; as if "Sir Walter Ralegh was born in the city of Exeter, and "in the houſe adjoining to the palace-gate,"[c] has no authority, and perhaps, had not ſo much as rumour to countenance it.

Born.

As to the time of his birth; I find the computation has been made from Camden's account of his age at his death, that he was born in the year 1552. And herewith correſponds an obſervation I have found in an aſtrological author, who, fixing his birth in the ſixth year of king Edward VI, which anſwers to the year of our Lord aforeſaid, calls it "A year remarkable "in our chronicles; firſt, for that ſtrange ſhole of the largeſt ſea-fiſhes, which, quitting their "native waters for freſh and untaſted ſtreams, wandered up the Thames ſo high, till the river "no longer retained any brackiſhneſs; and ſecondly, for that it is thought to have been ſome-"what ſtain'd in our annals with the blood of the noble Seymer, duke of Somerſet: events "(ſays he) ſurpriſingly analogous both to the life of this adventurous voyager, Sir Walter "Ralegh, whoſe delight was in the hazardous diſcovery of unfrequented coaſts; and alſo to "his unfortunate death."[d]

Educated at Oxford.

That his younger years were ſeaſon'd at the univerſity of Oxford, we may gather from good authorities; as Hooker aforeſaid, lord Bacon, and Anthony Wood; which laſt ſays, "He "became commoner of Oriel College, in or about the year 1568, when his kinſman C. Cham-"pernon ſtudied there; and that his natural parts being ſtrangely advanced by academical "learning, under the care of an excellent tutor, he became the ornament of the juniors; and was "worthily eſteem'd a proficient in oratory and philoſophy"[e]. But in that he came ſo late thither as this author mentions, and ſtayed ſo long there as three years, which he afterwards mentions; and, as the biographical fry who follow have nibbled out of him, they are all miſtaken: for he will preſently appear two years before that time amounts to, in the wars abroad. What time then can we ſpare for his reſidence at Chriſt-Church College alſo, in that univerſity; whereof Dr. Fuller would needs have him a member, either before or after he was of Oriel;[f] unleſs we could find, as I fear we ſhall not, that he return'd from the ſchool of Mars, to that of the Muſes? Little more can we expect to have been obſerved of this more remote part of his life; and yet ſomething more in it has been preſerved by lord Bacon aforeſaid, who had the judgment to foreſee, that every little circumſtance would be acceptable of a man, whoſe fortunes and misfortunes had render'd him ſo memorable. And indeed it has been repreſented to me as a matter of no ſmall honour to Sir Walter Ralegh, that a caſual expreſſion of his, in his immature and greeneſt years, ſhould prefer it ſelf to the commemoration of that great philoſopher, in his ſageſt and moſt advanc'd age. But as he had obſerv'd, on the nature of things; That great objects may be diſcern'd through a little crevice; ſo he knew, with reſpect to the nature of men, that a great diſcovery of genius may be made through a ſmall and ſudden repartee: and hence might he be moved to remember; "That while Ralegh was a ſcholar at Oxford, "there was a cowardly fellow, who happen'd to be a very good archer; but having been groſly "abuſed by another, he bemoaned himſelf to Ralegh, and aſk'd his advice; What he ſhould do "to repair the wrong that had been offer'd him? Ralegh anſwer'd, Why, challenge him---at a "match of ſhooting."[g]

How

How long he continued at the univerſity, is at laſt rightly concluded by Anthony Wood to be uncertain; but as ſure as he thinks himſelf right in ſettling him a ſtudent of the municipal laws in the Middle Temple, upon ſeeing a copy of verſes he might write in that inn of court; I take this aſſertion to be a greater uncertainty than the other. For though Sir Robert Naunton, and poſſibly from him moſt other writers of Ralegh's life, have alſo conſign'd him to the ſtudy of the law, on his leaving Oxford; there is a late author who believes it a miſtake ſo obvious, that no merit can reaſonably be aſſum'd from correcting it:[a] for Sir Walter, at his arraignment, in a reply to the attorney-general, lays a heavy imprecation upon himſelf, If ever he read a word of law or ſtatutes, before he was a priſoner in the Tower.[b] So that if this Ralegh was the author of that poem before-mention'd, and of the Middle-Temple in that year it was written, which we ſhall preſently arrive at, we muſt yet take care to keep the lawyer clear from the templar.

For we are expreſly told by Hooker, "That, after Ralegh had laid a good ground to "build his actions on at the univerſity, he travell'd into France;"[c] and this is confirm'd by Camden, according to whoſe account of the time, Ralegh could not be, at his departure, above ſeventeen years of age; and by the occaſion of his firſt going over, it will appear that a military courſe of life firſt fledg'd his fame. For as it has been rightly obſerv'd, Ralegh had the advantage of a ſtirring age to encourage and exerciſe his active genius, throughout the whole ſeries of his firſt engagements. France was now embroil'd in civil wars; England ſoon after, to divert a menaced danger from the encroaching power of Spain, lent aſſiſtance to the then diſtreſs'd and humble States of Holland; Spain, by a political repriſal, raiſed ſtubborn inſurrections in Ireland; and the Pope, to make the rebellion more permanent, and more plauſible, religiouſly pretended that kingdom was a perquiſite of St. Peter.[d]

But firſt of France: and here we need not recur to the original of thoſe commotions there; need not trace the Hugonots to their fountain-head;[e] apologiſe for their oppoſitions againſt the Guiſards;[f] labour to reconcile queen Elizabeth's defence of another prince's oppreſſed ſubjects, to the laws of nations, when imminent danger, by ſuch oppreſſions, threatned her own;[g] nor, laſtly, aggravate her motives againſt France in particular, from their late violation of covenants, relating to the rendition of Calais:[h] theſe topics being to be ſought where they have already been, and it is more proper they ſhould be directly diſcuſſed. Sufficient therefore it will be, to obſerve in this place, out of Camden's annals, that though the queen had her hands full of diſorders at home, yet ſhe was not wanting either in commiſeration or relief to the perſecuted proteſtants of France; and not only exhorted other princes of the ſame perſuaſion to lend their hands to the common cauſe, but ſupply'd the queen of Navarre with money and men to ſupport it; permitting Henry Champernon, a relation by marriage of the earl of Montgomery, to march with a ſelect troop of a hundred gentlemen voluntiers, well mounted and accoutred, into France; who bore in their ſtandard this motto: Finem det mihi Virtus: Let valour decide the cauſe. In the liſt of theſe voluntiers, was Philip Butſhed, with Francis Barcley, men afterwards of note in their time; and this Walter Ralegh, the moſt noted of all, then a very young man, and firſt beginning to puſh his fortune in the world; admodum adoleſcens, jam primum ſatis monſtratus, ſays our above-cited annaliſt.[i]

Goes to the wars in France.

The greateſt hiſtorian in France of thoſe times, tells us, this ſelect troop of horſe arrived in the French camp, on the 5th of October 1569, and that they were very honourably receiv'd by the queen of Navarre and the princes.[k] But what ſervices diſtinctly they perform'd in France, or how long they continued there, neither the writers of that country, nor of our own, have, I think, given full ſatisfaction. This conſequence we draw from ſome circumſtances in the latter part of Ralegh's life, that he eſtabliſhed himſelf a conſiderable reputation while he was in that kingdom; and from our author Hooker aforeſaid, "That he ſpent good part of his youth "in wars and martial ſervices there:"[l] agreeable to which, is that paſſage in another author, who alſo ſeems to have known him; where, ſpeaking of his education, he adds; "It was not part

" part, but wholly gentleman, wholly ſoldier."[a] And hence may we not only account for the greateſt chaſm in all the memoirs which have hitherto appear'd of Sir Walter Ralegh's life; but alſo preſume, that he was here initiated in thoſe accompliſhments both civil and military, through the language and politeneſs of the people, as well as their warlike and miniſterial affairs, whereof he afterwards gave ſuch manifold proofs; and of which, in a period cluſter'd with ſuch extraordinary events, he muſt have here had ſuch an extenſive and inſtructive proſpect.

Some French hiſtorians tell us, that what with the ſupplies of queen Elizabeth, who ſent the French proteſtants a hundred thouſand angels, beſides ſome pieces of cannon and ammunition; and what with the aids of their other allies, the proteſtant army, which took the field under admiral Coligny and the prince of Conde, and encamp'd about Limoſin, this year of Ralegh's going over, being in the beginning of their third civil war, amounted to no leſs than twenty-five thouſand fighting men; when the king's army under his brother the duke of Anjou, being encamp'd at Rochlabeille, amounted to above thirty thouſand.[b] But others reckon the proteſtant army of equal number; and obſerve, tho' their men and horſe died at Limoſin in great numbers for want of food and forage; and tho' a great reward was offer'd for the admiral, dead or alive, that it only added fuel to the fire: for what terror could it ſtrike, ſays my author, into perſons, who headed an army of thirty thouſand men, and ventur'd their lives with the utmoſt bravery on all occaſions?[c] As for the inſincere league or union of France and England, by the pretended marriage, which appears to have been negotiated two years after between the two crowns;[d] it ſeems not to have withdrawn theſe Engliſh auxiliaries, at leaſt not him along with them; becauſe Ralegh's continuance in France would then fall ſhort of Hooker's implication aforeſaid. But as we ſhall diſcover him to have been in that kingdom beyond the death of king Charles IX, which from Ralegh's entrance thither is about five years; and that in this compaſs of time near thirty battles, ſieges, overthrows, treaties, and capitulations on one ſide or other may be enumerated; it is manifeſt that our young volunteer was hazardouſly engaged in ſome, if not ſeveral of them. He had afterwards occaſion to mention, upon his obſerving here, the ill conſequence of having commanders in equal power, whom it is almoſt impoſſible to chuſe of equal courage and diſcretion, " How well he re- " member'd, that when the prince of Conde was ſlain after the battel of Jarnac, the proteſtants " did greatly bewail his loſs, in reſpect to his religion, perſon, and birth: yet that comforting " themſelves, they thought it rather an advancement, than hinderance to their affairs; for (as " he judiciouſly proceeds to diſtinguiſh between the military virtues of this prince, and the ad- " miral aforeſaid) ſo much did the valour of the one out-reach the adviſedneſs of the other; " that whatſoever the admiral intended to win, by waiting the advantage; the prince adven- " tur'd to loſe, by being over-confident in his own courage."[e] In another place Ralegh ſpeaks of a ſtratagem which he and his company uſed with ſucceſs at Languedoc, where the enemy had fortify'd themſelves in certain caves which had but one narrow entrance cut in the mid-way of the high rocks, and " which (ſays he) we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine; till " at laſt, by certain bundles of lighted ſtraw let down by an iron chain with a weighty ſtone in the " midſt, thoſe that defended it were ſo ſmother'd, that they ſurrender'd themſelves, with their " plate, money, and other goods, therein hidden; or they muſt have died like bees that are " ſmoak'd out of their hives."[f] And in another place he gratefully takes notice of a deliverance he had in theſe wars. 'Tis where, reaſoning upon the manner and opportunities of retreats in battle (with that ſagacity and experience which are no ſtrangers in his writings) he firſt gives an example of its being leſs diſhonour to retire in the dark, than to be ruin'd in the light, in the ſentiment of M. de la Noue, upon the retreat made juſt before the battle of Moncountour. " For (ſays that Frenchman) ſtaying upon our reputation in ſhew, not to diſlodge by " night; we loſt our reputation indeed, in diſlodging by day; whereby we were forced to fight " upon our diſadvantage, and to our ruin: yet (ſays Ralegh) did that worthy gentleman " count Lodowick of Naſſau, brother to the late famous prince of Orange, make the retreat at " Moncountour with ſo great reſolution, as he ſaved one half of the proteſtant army, then " broken and diſbanded, of which my ſelf was an eye-witneſs, and was one of them who had " cauſe to thank him for it."[g] But by what means Ralegh eſcaped that comprehenſive de-

And theſe articles, &c. are mention'd there to be enter'd in his diarium of foreign matters, lib. A. pag. 25. As for the letters of the Engliſh ambaſſadors upon this occaſion, they were collected by Sir Dudley Digges, and printed under the title of the compleat ambaſſador, fol. 1655.

ſtruction which broke out in the third year of this turbulent period, unleſs with young Sidney (afterwards a knight of great renown for his own accompliſhments, and the patronage of other men's, then upon his travels in France) he took ſanctuary in the ambaſſador Walſingham's houſe,[a] we deſpair at this diſtance of learning: for then the cruel and inſidious young king aforeſaid, inflam'd by the queen mother, and her firebrands of religion, perpetrated that horrible maſſacre of all the proteſtants in the capital city, and other parts of his realm; the invitation to which was the nuptials of his ſiſter; the ſignal to which was the bell they rung to their pious mattins; and in the execution whereof, among many thouſands, fell the great admiral aforeſaid, by the procurement of his implacable enemy the duke of Guiſe.[b] And though the comet, which ſoon after glar'd out of the face of heaven upon theſe bloody actors for many months together,[c] ſeems to have wrought little remorſe or contrition in them during life; yet is their untimely and violent end, with the extirpation of the very line of Valois, ſomewhat remarkable; eſpecially that of this king himſelf, whoſe early delight in hunting of wild beaſts, thus improved to the ſlaughter of his fellow-creatures; till in leſs than two years after that inhuman maſſacre, his inſatiable thirſt of his people's blood, was quenched by an irreſiſtible extravaſation of his own.[d]

Now that Ralegh was, till the death of that king, and even longer, in France, we may be fully convinc'd, from the further light I have fortunately met with, in an eminent author of his own time. For Mr. Richard Hakluyt, in his moſt excellent collection of voyages, dedicating his tranſlation of a French adventure therein to Sir Walter Ralegh, tells him, That "calling "to mind you had ſpent more years in France than I, and underſtand the French better than "my ſelf; I perceiv'd you approve my endeavour, not for any private eaſe, but for the ſpecial care "you had of thoſe to be employ'd in your own-like enterpriſe."[e] And how long Hakluyt had been in France, appears in his dedication to Sir Francis Walſingham of his firſt edition of thoſe voyages;[f] where he takes the occaſion to tell his patron, that himſelf had been five years in that kingdom: ſo that Ralegh muſt have been at leaſt ſix years there.

And this will lead us near the time we are to look for him in London, if we take for our guide in the chronology of Ralegh's life, that copy of verſes before-mentioned which Anthony Wood took for his, in relation to Ralegh's profeſſion. Theſe verſes I have found to be a commendatory poem of three ſtanza's, by Walter Rawely of the Middle Temple, as he is there written; and printed among others, before a ſatire call'd the ſteele glaſs, publiſhed in 1576, by a learned and ingenious poet of repute in thoſe days, named George Gaſcoigne Eſq;[g] an Eſſexian born, and therefore nearly related, as I take it, to that excellent genealogical antiquary of the ſame ſurname, who afterwards lived, and died I think, in Yorkſhire; and of whom I

[a] See Digges's compleat ambaſſador, fol. 250.

[b] The maſſacre of Paris was begun on St. Bartholomew's day 1572. And if between Mezeray's eſtimate of the numbers that were butcher'd over France, which is one of the leaſt; and Pereſixe's, which is one of the largeſt, we incline to the medium; we ſhall prefer the computation of Natalis Comes, who wrote earlier, and about the very time. He reckons them at threeſcore thouſand. And ſo inſatiable was the fury of theſe parricides, that they ſpared neither age, ſex, nor quality; vel puberes, vel impuberes, ſays he, trucidati ſunt; neque ullius ſexûs, vel ætatis, vel dignitatis, habita eſt ratio. vid. Hiſt. Nat. Com. lib. 23. p. 508. But yet Sir W. Ralegh, in one of his MS diſcourſes on the marriage between England and Savoy, hereafter more particularly ſpoken of, numbers them (not yet ſo high as ſome of their own hiſtorians) at no leſs than a hundred thouſand. And Margaret, queen of Navarre, confeſſes in her memoirs, liv. 1. That ſeveral of her brother's friends fell as well as his enemies, in the blind rage of this diffuſive and undiſtinguiſhing deſolation. Inſomuch that in contempt of all princely promiſes and proteſtations of amity, their hiſtorians were ſuffer'd to boaſt, More hereticks had been deſtroy'd in that one day, than in all the twelve years of the war. Well therefore did that deputy of the reformed religion, in his treaty for a peace with the king and queen mother, which they agreed to, inſiſt upon ſecurity for the preſervation of it: and when the queen mother ſaid, Why, is not the word of a king ſufficient ſecurity? Well did he anſwer; No, by St. Bartholomew, Madam. How much this flagrant exploit was gloried in over France and Rome, their proceſſions, thankſgivings, medals, and jubilee, will ſufficiently declare.

[c] This blazing ſtar, on which 30 different books were written, which had been read by Tycho Brahe, the noble Dane, before he compos'd his larger work thereon, firſt appear'd on the 9th of November 1572, in the form of a lozenge of four points, and continued immoveable nine months, ſays De Serres. Sir Thomas Smith, in a letter dated December 11. that year to Sir F. Walſingham, deſcribes it a fair comet without beard or tail, on the back-ſide of Caſſiopeia's chair, and on the edge of Lactea via; that it was between the ſize of Jupiter and Venus, and had then appear'd three weeks in England. In another letter to Walſingham, he notes how much the French and Engliſh aſtronomers varied as to the placing this ſtar in the ſigns of the Zodiac. See Sir Dudley Digges's compleat ambaſſador, fol. 299, and 316. But Camden, in his annals of queen Elizabeth, more particularly obſerves it to have ſhone brighter than the planet of Jupiter in the perigee of his eccentric and epicycle; that it continued in the ſame place full ſixteen months; though after eight months it viſibly diminiſhed. Mr. Thomas Digges and Dr. John Dee, two famous mathematicians of thoſe times, have learnedly proved by the doctrine of Parallaxes, that it was fixed in the celeſtial, not the elementary region; and that it diſappeared by aſcenſion. Theodore Beza very ingeniouſly apply'd it to the ſtar which appear'd at the ſlaughter of the Innocents under Herod. And queen Elizabeth's gallant comportment at the ſight of it, from her window at Richmond, which ought not to have eſcaped her annaliſt aforeſaid, is preſerved by the earl of Northampton, in his learned Defenſative againſt the poiſon of ſuppoſed prophecies. 2d edit. fol. 1620. p. 77.

[d] That extraordinary eruption of blood carried off king Charles IX, on the 30th of May 1574, in the 24th year of his age. His ſucceſſor, Henry III, was ſtabb'd to death by a Jacobin frier, named James Clement, Anno 1589, in that very chamber where the council had been held for the fatal Bartholomew's day; ſo made way for the houſe of Bourbon: and the duke of Guiſe was murder'd in the ſaid king's cabinet at Blois, about a year before. See the hiſtorians of France.

have elſewhere more particularly ſpoken. Now though I have had the opportunity of ſeeing ſome original manuſcripts of Sir Walter Ralegh's writing, and his name written ſeveral times by his own hand, I ſhall not cavil at the pſeudography thereof before the ſaid printed copy of verſes; becauſe I could inſtance greater errors of the like nature, which yet have not excluded authors from the reputation of their compoſitions; but more eſpecially, becauſe there are ſome glimmering circumſtances which render the writing of that piece by this our author probable to me: as namely, a kind of familiar dependency which that Gaſcoigne had upon the lord Gray of Wilton; as in the dedication of this, and ſome other of his works, is evident; under which nobleman Ralegh will ſoon after appear to have ſerved in the wars of Ireland. Again, Gaſcoigne had led a life ſomewhat like Ralegh in foreign travel and military ſervices: then 'tis to be noted Gaſcoigne uſed the very motto, under his picture prefix'd to that ſatyr before-mention'd; which, after his death, is ſo well known to have been aſſumed by, or appropriated to, Ralegh himſelf; Tam Marti, quam Mercurio. All which ſeem to ſhadow out the links, if not the perfect chain, of ſome acquaintance between them. But the poem it ſelf, to me, diſcovers, in the very firſt line of it, a great air of that ſolid axiomatical vein, which is obſervable in other productions of Ralegh's muſe:

Sweet were the ſauce would pleaſe each kind of taſte.

And the whole middle Hexaſtic, is ſuch an indication of his own fortune or fate; ſuch a caution againſt that envy of ſuperior merit which he himſelf ever ſtruggled with; that it could proceed from no hand more properly than his own.

Though ſundry minds in ſundry ſort do deem;
Yet worthieſt wights yield praiſe to every pain:
But envious brains do nought, or light eſteem,
Such ſtately ſteps as they cannot attain:
For whoſo reaps renown above the reſt,
With heaps of hate ſhall ſurely be oppreſs'd.

Laſtly, As to the particular of his being at this time of the Middle Temple, all we can conclude of it is, ſince he has ſo publickly and ſolemnly proteſted he never ſtudied the law there; that it might be as cuſtomary in the inns of court then, as it is now, for a young gentleman to be with a friend, or have the uſe of his chambers while he is out of town, or even have chambers of his own, rather than be confin'd to the ſingularities of a family in lodgings, and never read a word of the law; much leſs have any purpoſe to practiſe it. And this is ſtrengthned by what I have met with both in ſome old writings, and ſome hiſtorians of thoſe times, which obſerve, that the inmates not only in private houſes, but thoſe who dwelt among the lawyers, and did not follow their profeſſion, grew ſo numerous and inconvenient, that there was an order or proclamation for their removal out of the inns of court about the latter end of queen Elizabeth's, or the beginning of her ſucceſſor's reign.[a] In what ſenſe he might be of the Middle Temple.

His next ſtage of action was in the Netherlands, according to one of the writers of his life; who tells us he ſerved under the prince of Orange, as a volunteer againſt the Spaniards; making himſelf, in the low-countries, maſter of the art military; and confirming, through the ſucceſs of his firſt campaigns, his reſolution to advance himſelf by arms, as the nobler and readier way to glory.[b] Sir Robert Naunton alſo intimates, that before he was in Ireland under the lord Grey, he was engaged in the Low-countries, and alſo in a voyage at ſea.[c] Another author likewiſe agrees in this Low-countries ſervice, and voyage at ſea, before Ralegh was known at court.[d] But whereas the firſt of theſe two writers mentions an earlier expedition of Ralegh's in Ireland, before this of the Low-countries, as his firſt expoſure to a military life, being ignorant of all the time he paſs'd in the French wars; and whereas the laſt fixes him in that firſt Iriſh expedition, under general Norris; I apprehend them to be herein both miſtaken; the former, in that Ralegh appears not to have been twice againſt the rebels in Ireland, nor once as his firſt engagement in war; and the latter, in that this Norris appears not to be in Ireland, when the courſe of Ralegh's employments will allow him to have been in that kingdom: Goes to the Netherlands.

[a] Further; to confirm this conjecture of Ralegh's being only an inmate there, I have been led to enquire after the regiſters of the Middle Temple, which are ſtill extant, of thoſe times; and upon a diligent ſearch, have ſatisfy'd my ſelf that there was no ſuch perſon enter'd as a ſtudent of the law in that inn, by the name of Walter Ralegh, or any name like it, either in this year that he wrote the aboveſaid poem from thence, or any other year before, up to the beginning of queen Elizabeth's reign: though ſome of his countrymen, and I think relations, occur there in that ſpace of time.

But

But now that there is room for Ralegh's being in the Netherlands we find general Norris to be there.

For the emperor Charles's natural ſon Don John of Auſtria, a briſk, forward young man, fluſh'd with the late victorious battle of Lepanto againſt the Turks, and high in the Pope's favour; being ſent by his brother the king of Spain in the year 1577 governour of the Low-countries, to divert his mind from higher reaches at home; and having incurr'd the general odium of the ſtates for his tyranny over them, no leſs than the jealouſy of the Engliſh, for his treachery to this nation; queen Elizabeth thought the Dutch now more immediately needful of her notice; and more particularly from a diſcovery that had been made to her, ſome ſay, by the prince of Orange, of a vain project the ſaid Don John had form'd of reſcuing the queen of Scots out of priſon; and by marriage with her, or the force of arms, to dethrone the queen of England, and make himſelf maſter of her crown: for Don John's haughty conceit of himſelf, ſays Ralegh, overcame the greateſt difficulties, tho' his judgment was over-weak to manage the leaſt.[a] Wherefore the queen not only receded from that peace with the Spaniards, and neutrality then in agitation; but ſent the States both men and money, as they had requeſted, to carry on the war more powerfully againſt them. Among the forces, both Engliſh and Scotch, which now poured over, under Sir John Norris, Sir Robert Stewart, colonel John North, Henry Cavendiſh, and others, not to forget colonel Thomas Morgan; whoſe veteran troops were the firſt perfect harquebuſiers of our nation, and the firſt who taught us to like the musket;[b] there is here, and here only, I think, a vacancy in the ſtory of Ralegh, that will admit of him under the firſt of thoſe commanders: ſo might he probably ſhare in the danger and honour of that memorable Lammas day, Anno 1578, which buried the reputation of Don John; which this governour did not two months ſurvive; and which has raiſed the emulation of pencils, as well as pens, to commemorate. For the ſtates having thus gather'd a powerful army, and planted themſelves near the village of Rimenant, about a league from Mecklin; Don John, at the head of, ſome ſay thirty thouſand men;[c] being aſſiſted by the prince of Parma, Mondragon, and other the beſt commanders of Spain, now reſolved to give them battle. He made a furious onſet; but in the end, by a notable ſtratagem, was deluded to a great overthrow.[d] For perceiving, as he thought, the whole confederate army encamped before the ſaid village, in an open and inviting plain; Don John, too raſh to take advice, and too raw to prevail without it, precipitouſly detach'd a ſtronger force to encounter them; which ſo ſucceeded on both ſides, that the ſtates army, after a convenient reſiſtance, feigning a flight, quitted this their counterfeit camp; the Spaniards eagerly purſuing, in a ſcattered and diſorderly manner, to compleat their ſuppoſed victory; till, amaz'd, they found themſelves in the midſt of the fugitives true camp, environ'd with nineteen thouſand horſe and foot; a number conſiderably greater than the aſſailants. To extricate themſelves was impoſſible; there was a river on one ſide; when they attempted the thicket on the other, it was lined with an armed ambuſcade of Engliſh and Scots; and when they aſſaulted the trenches, they could not ſuſtain the fury of the artillery. Yet was the battle vigorouſly maintained from morning till night; tho' the Engliſh and Scots, harraſs'd by a long and weariſom march, came but a day, ſome ſay but an hour, to the field, before the encounter began: and yet partly thro' bravery, partly thro' the ſultry warmth of the weather; or, as one author has it, more ſenſible of a little heat of the ſun, than any cold fears of death,[e] they made themſelves further remarkable, by ſtripping off armour and cloaths, and fighting in their ſhirts; till at laſt, thoſe who had purſued the ſtates army in a pretended flight, were themſelves driven, with great ſlaughter, to a real one. And had count Boſſu, La Noue, with the reſt of the ſtates commanders, been but vigorous in charging the Spaniards upon this retreat, it would have proved an abſolute diſcomfiture, and might have put an end to all ſucceeding oppreſſions. But it was ſufficient to chaſtiſe Don John for the faithleſs treaties of peace wherewith he had abuſed the ſtates, upon his entrance into that government. "The fortune "of the day (ſays my laſt author) may be better aſcribed to the ſervice of the Engliſh and "Scots, by comparing this charge near Rimenant, where the Engliſh and Scots were in great "numbers, with the like charge given by Don John, half a year before at Gemblours, where "the ſucceſs was contrary; there being at that time but a handful of Engliſh and Scots, and "they put into confuſion by their own horſes."[f]

The battle of Rimenant.

Soon after, a proſpect preſented it ſelf for Ralegh to try his fortune in another element; for his brother Sir Humphrey Gilbert, having now newly obtain'd a patent of the queen to plant and inhabit ſome northern parts of America, unpoſſeſs'd by any prince with whom ſhe was in alliance, ſoon engaged Ralegh, upon his return into England, who was always ready to graſp at every occaſion, that might reputably advance his fortune or his knowledge, to embark in this adventure. For tho' the coaſts from the cape of Florida northwards to the iſles now called the Newfoundlands, had been before diſcovered by John Cabot the father, with Sebaſtian and Sancius his ſons,[a] both Engliſhmen born, through the authority and expence of king Henry the ſeventh; yet there wanted not only more inland reſearches and the eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity, but the very trade and commerce with Newfoundland was very ſlothfully neglected, even ſince the reign of king Edward VI;[b] for our merchants and adventurers in his time enrich'd this nation conſiderably from their fiſhery in thoſe parts, as appears by that act,[c] wherein care is taken to prevent the exaction of any doles or taxes from them by the officers of the admiralty, that they might not be diſcourag'd from the merchandiſe of fiſh, but tranſport it more plentifully into the realm, and at more reaſonable rates. Now Gilbert having, as I ſaid, procured an ample commiſſion to repoſſeſs theſe advantages with improvement, by piercing more effectually into the bowels of thoſe tracts which extend immenſely into the north from thirty, or rather twenty-five degrees of ſeptentrional latitude, many gentlemen of good account reſorted to him, among whom we ſhall find his brother Ralegh to be one; ſo that from theſe preparations was expected a potent fleet. Nevertheleſs, among ſuch variety of volunteers, diſpoſitions were various; which in the end bred diviſion, and even confuſion of the attempt: for, after the ſhipping was by degrees prepared, and the men ready to go aboard; ſome diſagreeing in opinion, ſome ſhrinking at obedience, and others failing of their promiſes and engagements; the greater number were diſperſed, leaving the general, with a few only of his aſſured friends. "However, with theſe he ventur'd to ſea; where, having taſted "of no leſs misfortune, he was ſhortly after driven to retire home with the loſs of a tall ſhip; "and more to his grief, of a valiant gentleman named Miles Morgan."[d] Now this misfortune at ſea, and loſs of a ſhip with that valiant gentleman, I have not only reaſon to believe was by a ſharp encounter they had with the Spaniards, however tenderly touch'd at that time, perhaps to avoid their triumph, by my author before referr'd to; but that Ralegh was in this very engagement, and his life in great danger thereby. For there is another author, who, in his addreſs to him before-mention'd, tells him, that after his return from his land-ſervices, having gained ſufficient knowledge and experience therein, "To the end that you might be every way "able to ſerve your prince and commonwealth (ſays he) you were deſirous to be acquainted "with maritimal affairs: then you, together with your brother Sir Humphrey Gilbert, travel-"led the ſeas for the ſearch of ſuch countries as, if they had then been diſcover'd, infinite com-"modities in ſundry reſpects would have enſued; and whereof there was no doubt, if the fleet "then accompanying you had, according to appointment followed you; or your ſelf had "eſcaped the dangerous ſea-fight, when many of your company was ſlain, and your ſhips "therewith alſo ſore batter'd and diſabled."[e] This unfortunate adventure cannot, I think, be confounded with that ſecond attempt upon Newfoundland, made afterwards by theſe two brothers, becauſe from this, Sir Humphrey Gilbert never return'd, as we ſhall hear; beſides, the courſe of this voyage is ſo particularly recorded, that we may affirm no ſea-fight, or any ſuch deſertion of adventurers happen'd therein; and as we know how to account for a good part of Ralegh's time, till that ſecond attempt was more notoriouſly made; ſo we may from thence, and the delays aforeſaid, be able to compute that this firſt, happen'd in 1579; for I have at laſt found the fleet was preparing, but not ſet out, in the latter end of the foregoing ſummer.[f]

In a dangerous ſea-fight.

[a] And perhaps before them, by Madoc ap Owen Guyneth, a Britiſh prince, who is ſaid in the Welſh chronicles to have tranſported himſelf and ſome colonies to theſe parts about the year 1170, where he named ſeveral of the places and productions after the language of his own country, which remain to this day; as the fruit called Guyneth, from his own name; and the bird call'd Pengwin, which is Welſh for white-head, whereof, from the abundance of the birds ſo marked, there is an iſland ſtill ſo call'd: and many other Welſh words they have in uſe. See Sir George Peckham's report of the diſcovery and poſſeſſion of Newfoundland in Hakluyt, vol. 3. p. 173. And Howel's letters, vol. 2. nº 54.

[b] And yet within four years before Sir Humphrey Gilbert obtain'd his patent, there reſorted to the coaſts of Newfoundland for fiſh about fifty ſail, of Engliſh, above a hundred ſail of Spaniards for cod, and thirty more from Biſcay for whale to make train-oil; about fifty ſail of Portugueſe; and about an hundred and fifty ſail of the French and Bretaigns. My author obſerves, that the trade our nation had then to Iceland, was the reaſon the Engliſh were not there in ſuch numbers as other nations. See Ant. Parkhurſt's letter in Hakluyt, vol. 3. p. 132.

[f] There is an old dramatic performance (lately imparted to me by Mr. Theobald) entitled, The hiſtory of Promos and Caſſandra, written by George Whetſtones, Gent. who, in his dedication thereof to W. Fleetewood Eſq; recorder of London, expreſſes himſelf, "Reſolved to ac-"company that excellent captain Sir Humphrey Gilbert, "in this honourable voyage: and concludes with his "prayers that God would preſerve him in it, 29 July "1578."

THIS ill ſucceſs kept not theſe adventurers long abroad; and now new diſturbances broke out which call'd for men of experience in war at home. For the firſt dart of any conſequence which was thrown from Spain or Rome upon Ireland, being in 1580, we ſhall then find Ralegh among that body of his countrymen which effectually broke its force, and ſhielded off the miſchief wherewith it would otherwiſe have gall'd that kingdom. For as to the invaſion of Thomas Stucley, two years before, it blew over into Africa; where that meteor of oſtentation, and tool of ambitious princes, fell in the plains of Alcazar, and with royal company expir'd. But now that James Fitz-Morris of the Geraldine family was come over,[a] and not long after San Joſepho, under the pope's banner, with Spaniſh and Italian forces, to aſſiſt the Deſmonds in the Munſter rebellion, and had landed in three ſhips at Smerwick in Kerry; where having built a fort which they call'd Fort del Ore, and re-fortify'd it with the benedictions of Allen an Iriſh, and Sanders an Engliſh jeſuit; the Iriſh rebels under Sir James and Sir John, brothers to the earl of Deſmond, ſoon reſorted thither to join, as the Engliſh forces alſo did to diſperſe them. Their ſhips were ſoon taken by Thomas Courtenay, a Devonſhire gentleman; and Fitz-Morris himſelf, for a prey he had made of ſome garons and other cattle, was by Sir William Burk and his ſons ſoon ſlain, and his quarters expos'd at Kilmallock. The next, whoſe fate drew on, was Sir James Deſmond; who, on the fourth of Auguſt in the above-mention'd year, having made an inroad upon Muſkerry, and taken a great booty from Sir Cormac Mac Teige, ſheriff of Cork; the ſaid ſheriff making head againſt him, recover'd the booty, wounded Sir James mortally, and took him priſoner. In that condition he was kept, till by letters from the lord juſtice named Sir William Pelham, and the council, he was deliver'd to Sir Warham Sentleger, then provoſt-marſhal of Munſter, and to captain Ralegh; and according to the commiſſion directed to them, he was examin'd, indicted, arraign'd; and then, upon judgment, drawn, hang'd, and quarter'd; and his head and limbs impal'd upon the city gates of Cork, for a terror to his aſſociates, and a prey for the fowls of the air. Thus the peſtilent Hydra of this rebellion loſt another of his heads:[b] and this is the firſt appearance we meet with of Ralegh in Ireland;[c] enough to ſhake the report of thoſe who ſay he was a militia there,[d] and had his firſt commiſſion from Arthur lord Grey, baron of Wilton; tho' indeed under him we ſhall find the greateſt part of Ralegh's ſervices in this kingdom perform'd: for that lord came over deputy of Ireland on the twelfth of Auguſt aforeſaid; but the ſword was not reſign'd to him by the lord juſtice Pelham till a month after.[e]

A captain in the wars of Ireland.

THIS lord Grey was reputed a warm and ſanguine man, ſomewhat wanting among the Iriſh, perhaps in Julius Agricola's qualification, who knew how to temper what was neceſſary in his government of the Britons with what was agreeable: for the Engliſh governor is thought to have been ſo zealous of a healthy conſtitution, as ſcarcely to refrain from ſcarifying the parts which were ſound, that he might be ſure of clearing away thoſe which were infected; and gave ſome proofs he agreed in the ſentiment of a ſucceeding deputy, That the Iriſh were like nettles, ſure to make thoſe ſmart who gently handled them; but muſt be cruſhed to prevent ſtinging. His firſt expedition againſt the Obrines, whom he is thought to have attack'd raſhly to his diſadvantage in their woods and faſtneſſes before he was ſworn, loſt him ſome credit, and ſeveral brave Engliſh officers. But the chief commander in theſe parts at this time was the earl of Ormond, ſoon after governor of Munſter, a man of ſuch loyalty, as to have reduc'd his rebellious brothers to allegiance; and of ſuch courage, as conſtantly partaking in every danger with his own ſoldiers, made him much beloved by all his adherents; while his apparent contempt thereby of that danger, gain'd him no leſs fear from all his adverſaries. He, on the other ſide, bending his courſe againſt the foreign enemy, encamped his army at Tralegh, within ken of the Spaniſh fort aforeſaid: hereupon many of thoſe invaders diſlodged, whom the earl valiantly engag'd, ſlaying ſome, and taking others priſoners; the reſt flew to the coverts of Glaningell. The priſoners he took, confeſs'd their force was not above ſeven hundred ſtrong; but that they had brought arms and ammunition for five thouſand natives, beſides a maſs of money for the Deſmonds and Dr. Sanders, and daily expected farther ſupplies from Rome; for it was abſolutely determin'd by the pope and king Philip to make a compleat conqueſt of Ireland, and England beſides; nay, ſo confident they ſeem'd of ſucceſs, if we can credit the aſſertion of an author who was this year in Spain, that his holineſs had provided a chalice to drink the queen of Eng- land's precious blood,[a] ſays he, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould be made a ſacrifice. Now after the aforeſaid defeat, about three hundred of the enemy having made their way back to the fort, the earl followed them cloſe, and encamped at Dingle: but wanting ammunition for a battery, was forced to retire. And, finding himſelf of unequal force to withſtand another ſalley the Spaniards made, return'd to join the deputy at Rakele; who having now about eight hundred horſe and foot with him, under the conduct of captain Ralegh, Zouch, Denny, Mackworth, and others, decamped and marched up towards the fort. But Ralegh, who had obſerv'd it to be the cuſtom of the Iriſh Kerns, upon any diſlodgment of the Engliſh camp, to flock in parties thither, and glean away whatever they ſaw left behind; linger'd, and lay in ambuſh to receive them. They came accordingly with their wonted conſtancy and greedineſs; but in the midſt of their proling, Ralegh fell upon them ſo advantageouſly, that he enclos'd them all with his men, and took every rebel upon the ſpot, who was not ſlain in reſiſtance. Among them there was one laden with withies, who being demanded, What he intended to have done with them? Boldly anſwer'd, To have hung up the Engliſh churls. Well, ſaid Ralegh; but they ſhall now ſerve for an Iriſh kern: ſo commanded him to be immediately tuck'd up in one of his own neckbands; and dealt with the reſt of theſe robbers and murderers according to their deſerts.[b] We read of another Iriſh rebel, but of greater rank, named Brian O Rourk; who being afterwards to ſuffer at the gallows, ſhew'd great concern that it was to be by the common halter; and earneſtly petition'd, not for pardon or preſervation of his life, but that they would change the inſtrument of his death; and inſtead of a rope, to let him take his ſwing in a withy: but being ask'd, Why he inſiſted upon ſuch an inſignificant diſtinction? he anſwer'd, 'Twas a diſtinction had been paid to his countrymen before him. I remember lord Bacon ingeniouſly applies this example to illuſtrate the force or tyranny of cuſtom.[c]

Surpriſes the Iriſh Kerns at Rakele.

WHILE the lord deputy lay before the fort, there arriv'd in the bay of Smerwick, vice-admiral Bingham, and ſoon after Sir William Winter, admiral of the fleet, with freſh ſupplies: hereupon the lord deputy reſolved to beſiege the fort by land, while the admiral ſhould batter it by ſea. But firſt the Spaniards were ſummon'd to ſurrender at diſcretion: they anſwer'd, "They were ſent, ſome, from the holy father, who had given that realm to king Philip; and "ſome from that king, who was to recover this land to the church of Rome, which by her "majeſty's means was become ſchiſmatical and excommunicate; therefore, in ſhort, were "obliged to retain what they had, and recover what they could."[d] Nor did they omit the advantage they thought this parley would produce of finding the Engliſh unguarded, to make a ſally upon them; but they were ſo diſappointed, through the vigilance and valour of Ralegh's company, and that of captain Denny, that ſuch as were not left dead behind, were forced to retreat with more haſte than good ſpeed. The culverins and other pieces of ordnance being now landed, and a large mountainous bank laborioufly cut through, for the carriages to paſs to the place convenient for planting them; the deputy is ſaid, by my author Hooker, to have given the enemy another ſummons by cannon-ſhot to ſurrender, and receive mercy.[e] But they anſwer'd as before: thereupon the artillery was order'd to attack the fort both by land and water. Ralegh, as the ſame hiſtorian records, commanded the firſt three days after the opening of the trenches; and aſſaulted the fort ſo roughly from his battery, that he forced the Spaniards to ſeveral excurſions; but they ſkirmiſh'd ſo warily, and hived again ſo nimbly, that there was no cloſing with them effectually. The fourth day was commanded by Zouch, under whom a tall proper gentleman, named John Cheke, the ſon of a knight well known among the learned for his writings, venturing ſo near the fort as to look over the parapet, paid his life for his curioſity; being obſerved by a Spaniard, who levell'd his piece, and brought him to the ground. But now the trenches for the full battery were drawn ſo near the Spaniards, and the Engliſh play'd their cannon ſo furiouſly and inceſſantly upon them from every ſide, that the enemy began to fear, ſomewhat prophetically, what they had built for a garriſon would prove their monument, and they ſhould be buried alive in the ruins of it. Therefore, finding no ſuccours arrive, they beat a parley, and hung out the white flag, crying out Miſericordia, Miſericordia; but the lord deputy would not liſten to any treaty with the confederates of traitors and rebels; no, not ſo much as to their departure with bag and baggage, or free paſſage to any one particular perſon; nothing but an abſolute ſurrender. And as for mercy, which Hooker before intimates to have been offer'd on proviſo of their timely ſubmiſſion, we find by

Edmund

Edmund Spenſer, who was then ſecretary to the lord deputy, and upon the very ſpot, that his lordſhip never gave the Spaniards any hopes of it. For as this author writes, "When firſt "their ſecretary Seignor Jeffrey, an Italian, was ſent to treat with the lord deputy for grace, "he was flatly refuſed it; and afterwards, when their colonel, named Don Sebaſtian, came forth "to entreat that they might part with their arms like ſoldiers, and at leaſt be ſpared their lives, "according to the cuſtom of war and law of nations; it was ſtrongly deny'd him, and told "him by the lord deputy himſelf, that they could not juſtly plead either cuſtom of war or law "of nations; for that they were not any lawful enemies; and if they were, he inſiſted upon "their ſhewing by what commiſſion they came thither, into another prince's dominions, to war? "And when they ſaid they had none to produce; but were only adventurers, that came to "ſeek fortune abroad, and to ſerve in wars among the Iriſh, who deſired to entertain them, "it was then anſwer'd, that the Iriſh themſelves, as the earl and John of Deſmond, with the reſt, "were no lawful enemies, but rebels and traitors; and therefore they, who came to ſuccour "them, no better than rogues and runnagades; eſpecially coming with no licence or commiſ- "ſion from their own king: wherefore it would be diſhonourable for him, in the name of his "queen, to condition, or make any terms with ſuch raſcals. So left to their choice, whether "they would yield themſelves, or not."[a] Then the ſaid colonel did abſolutely yield himſelf, the fort, with all therein; and craved only mercy, which it was not thought good (ſays my ſaid author) to ſhew them.

Enters the fort.

FOR after the lord deputy had by captain Jaques Wingfield, maſter of the ordnance, diſcover'd they were in earneſt; that they had yielded, and ſurrender'd the fort, on the ninth of November,[b] Ralegh and Mackworth, who had the ward of that day, firſt enter'd the caſtle, and, with their companies, made a great ſlaughter; ſo that except one Iriſh nobleman, who was repriev'd; another Iriſhman, and an Engliſhman, who were ſent to publick execution; except alſo San Joſepho the Spaniſh commander, and his camp-maſter; with a few Spaniſh officers, who were ſent priſoners into England, and reſerv'd for ranſom; all the invaders, between four and five hundred, were, according to the deputy's poſitive command, put to the ſword; and the country was thus weeded of theſe noxious foreigners. As for Ralegh, he never was taxed, that I can learn, with any cruelty upon this account, more than Mackworth, or the reſt of the officers: but notwithſtanding it was afterwards alledg'd, that the Engliſh army there was not enough to keep the enemy all priſoners, and ready to mutiny for want of their proviſions out of the fort; or that the Engliſh expected hourly aſſaults from the Iriſh rebels, more than fifteen hundred at hand;[c] or freſh oppoſition from Spain, three thouſand carbines being in readineſs to come over;[d] or that they had not barks enough to tranſport their priſoners into England; or that an article in the deputy's inſtructions themſelves, was to ſhorten the war by effectual proſecutions;[e] queen Elizabeth did afterwards expreſs much diſſatisfaction at this deciſive conduct in the ſaid lord deputy.

Puts the Spaniards to the ſword.

RALEGH, as Hooker goes on, was quarter'd this winter at Cork; where he obſerv'd the ſeditious practices of David lord Barry, Patrick Condon, and other ringleaders of the rebellion in thoſe parts, to diſtreſs ſo intolerably thoſe ſubjects who were peacefully inclin'd, and foment the diſaffected to an inſurrection; that he was forced to take a journey in perſon to the lord deputy at Dublin;[f] where he remonſtrated the dangerous conſequences he foreſaw, ſo urgently, that, the caſe being taken into conſideration by his lordſhip and the council, they return'd him with a full commiſſion to enter upon the caſtle called Barry-Court, with all other lands of the ſaid Barry; and to reduce him to peace and ſubjection, by ſuch means as he judg'd moſt feaſible; appointing him for his farther enablement a party of horſe. In the interim, ſuch meaſures were uſed with thoſe in authority at Cork, that the commiſſion proved of little effect; but though the ſaid eſtate of Barry-More, was made over to the mother of David Barry, and only rented to the ſon; and though it was his principal ſeat; yet partly in fear of that commiſſion, partly through ſpite and indignation, he burnt the caſtle himſelf to the ground, and waſted the country about it with greater outrage and deſtruction, than his enemies, had they taken it, would have done. Moreover, as Ralegh was on his journey back to his quarters, an old rebel of Barry's faction, named Fitz-Edmonds, who was ſeneſchal of Imokelly, lay in wait to ſet upon and ſeize him, with a party of horſe and ſome Kerns, at a ford through which he was to paſs between Yougall and Cork: ſome hiſtorians call the place Corabby.[g] Ralegh was much inferior in number, being, at his ſetting out, accompanied but with ſix men, and they ſcatter'd behind when he approach'd the ford. Here Fitz-Edmonds and his crew ſallied from their ambuſcade, and croſs'd him, to oppoſe his paſſage, whom Ralegh manfully encounter'd and defeated, or at leaſt broke through them, ſo that he got clear over the river:[a] but one of his company, Mr. Henry Moyle, following, either took a part too deep and unfordable, or plung'd into a quick-ſpring; or his horſe, otherwiſe foundering, threw him down in the middle of it; where, between fear of drowning and being taken by the enemies, he called out to Ralegh for help; who, tho' he had eſcap'd both dangers, yet incurred them again to ſave his companion's life: but Moyle, in haſte and confuſion remounting, over-leap'd his horſe, and fell down on the other ſide into a deep mire, where he might have been ſtifled, had not Ralegh recover'd him a ſecond time, and brought him ſafe to land; but his horſe run over to the rebels.[b] Ralegh waited on the oppoſite bank, with his ſtaff[c] in one hand, and a piſtol in the other, for the reſt of his company who were yet to croſs the river; among whom was his ſervant Jenkin, who had two hundred pounds of his money in charge; a ſum in thoſe days enough to make a ſoldier of fortune in theſe circumſtances look about him; eſpecially now the ſeneſchal had got a recruit of twelve men, and was in all above twenty ſtrong againſt him. Yet this hero, as his party called him, when he beheld Ralegh ſtand his ground, and the reſt of his company advance, whom he poſſibly thought might be of greater number than they were, only exchanged a few rough words with him, and thought it beſt to offer no further moleſtation. Not long after, there being a parley between the earl of Ormond and the rebels, where the ſeneſchal beginning to vaunt of his own exploits, Ralegh, who was preſent, charg'd him openly with flat cowardiſe, as having lately twenty to one on his ſide, and durſt not encounter him alone. One of the rebels own comrades pretended an unwonted diffidence in their champion upon that rencounter; but gave confident aſſurances he would never be ſo remiſs again upon any like occaſion. This ſo chaff'd the earl of Ormond, that he challeng'd the ſeneſchal, with Sir John Deſmond, and any four they would nominate, to meet himſelf, captain Ralegh, and four more whom they would bring, at the place aforeſaid; where they would paſs the great river to them, and there, two to two, four to four, or ſix to ſix, fight and determine the point in debate between them; but no anſwer was then return'd: wherefore the white knight, named Fitz-Gibbon, was afterwards ſent to him with a repetition of the challenge; but the rebels then abſolutely refuſed it. Soon after the earl of Ormond departed from his long and weariſome ſervices here to England, about the ſpring of the year 1581. His government of Munſter was given to captain Ralegh, in commiſſion with Sir William Morgan and captain Piers. Ralegh lay for the moſt part at Liſmore; and, in the country and woods thereabouts, ſpent all this ſummer in continual action againſt the rebels.[c]

In a challenge.

Commiſſioner for the government of Munſter.

THEN Ralegh remov'd with his little band of fourſcore foot and eight horſe, to his old quarters at Cork; but receiving intelligence by the way, that the arch-traitor Barry was at Clove, with ſeveral hundred men, he reſolved to paſs through that town, and offer him the combat. Accordingly at the town's end he met Barry and his forces, whom Ralegh charged with great bravery, and put him to flight. As he purſued his journey, he overtook another company of the enemy in a plain, by a wood-ſide; upon whom, having only ſix horſe-men with him, expecting probably his company would ſoon join him, he gave the onſet; but the rebels, who were in much greater number, being cut off from the wood, and having no other relief, faced about, and fought very deſperately, killing five of the horſes belonging to Ralegh's company, whereof his own was one, and he himſelf very near being over-borne by the numbers upon him, had not his truſty ſervant Nicholas Wright, a Yorkſhire man, interpos'd; who perceiving his maſter's horſe ſo mortally wounded with darts, and plunging paſt all recovery, encounter'd ſix of the enemy at once, and killed one of them; while another of his fellow-ſervants, named Patrick Fagaw, reſcued Ralegh; which had been ſo unſucceſsfully attempted by James Fitz-Richard and his kern, both of Ralegh's company, that the man was ſlain, and the maſter very near the ſame fate; whereupon Ralegh would not ſuffer Wright to fight by him any longer, but order'd him to charge above-hand, and ſave the gentleman: at which command he ruſh'd into the throng of the enemy, diſpatch'd the antagoniſt who preſs'd ſoreſt upon Mr. Fitz-Richard, and reſcued him. In this ſharp ſkirmiſh, there were many of the rebels ſlain, and two taken priſoners, whom Ralegh carried with him to Cork; and while he lay here, he performed ſeveral other notable ſervices, which deſerve (ſays my author Hooker) to be for ever regiſter'd.[d]

AMONG the reſt, his excellent conduct in the ſeizure of the lord Roch is more particularly remember'd and applauded. This nobleman, being much ſuſpected to hold confederacy with ſome of the chief rebels, Ralegh undertook to bring, with his family, before the earl of Ormond at Cork. But the deſign of this hazardous ſurpriſe took air among the enemy, and a party of eight hundred men, under Fitz-Edmonds and Barry, were gather'd to way-lay the Engliſh either going or coming. However Ralegh, knowing the lord Roch to be a powerful and popular man among the Iriſh, ſo ſuddenly commanded all his company to be in readineſs by eleven a-clock that night, and they were ſo punctual to the hour, that he directly marched away to Bally in Harſh, which was Roch's ſeat, about twenty miles from Cork, and eſcaped the ambuſcade. He arrived there by break of day; but the townſmen were ſo alarmed, that they ſoon gather'd five hundred ſtrong. Ralegh drew up, and in ſuch manner beſtowed his men in the town it ſelf, that he ſoon quell'd and reſtrain'd the people there; then ſelecting half a dozen out of his company, among whom were Arthur Barlow, hereafter to be ſpoken of, with Nicholas Wright before-mention'd; and having appointed another little party to follow him, he marched up to the caſtle. He was met by three or four of Roch's gentlemen, of whom he deſir'd to ſpeak with their lord; which was agreed to, on condition he would diſmiſs three or four of his own attendants; to which, with apparent readineſs, he comply'd; but ſo contriv'd, that none of them were lock'd out. Then he gave them directions which way the reſt alſo, without the gates, might be admitted, whilſt he ſhould hold the lord Roch in diſcourſe; which ſucceeded ſo happily, that by degrees his whole complement were got within the court-yard; ſome guarding the gates, others watching in the hall, each having his piece loaden with a brace of balls. The lord Roch was amaz'd and terrify'd at ſo ſilent and inſenſible a ſeizure; but, diſſembling his uneaſineſs, he would needs have Ralegh, and the gentlemen with him, participate of his plentiful table: yet the policy of his hoſpitality did not defeat that of their enterpriſe; for, as ſoon as the dinner was over, Ralegh ingenuouſly laid open the occaſion of his viſit. Lord Roch made many excuſes, and in the end abſolutely refuſed to go along with him. But when the commiſſion was produced, and he found Ralegh inflexible, he choſe to do that by conſent, which he found he muſt do by compulſion. Then Ralegh urged him to oblige his townſmen likewiſe, who had ſo faithfully riſen for his defence in his neighbourhood, to eſcort and defend him in his journey; to which lord Roch alſo conſented, profeſſing he doubted not but to clear himſelf of whatever allegations ſhould be laid to his charge. When his lordſhip, with his lady and attendance, had made themſelves ready, Ralegh was for another nocturnal progreſs; but though the night fell out ſo very dark and tempeſtuous, and the ways were ſo full of hills and dales, rocks and precipices, that many of his ſoldiers were much bruiſed by falls, and one of them ſo mortify'd, that he loſt his life in the march; yet the veil wherewith the reſt were ſhelter'd, by that obſcurity, from the more dangerous ambuſcades of their enemy, who had every-where beſtrew'd the paſſages to intercept them, made ſuch ſufficient compenſation for thoſe diſaſters, that by the next morning early he ſafely preſented his priſoners to the general; not without raiſing an univerſal aſtoniſhment at his dexterous evaſion of ſo many perils. But the lord Roch, upon examination, did make his words good; for being honourably acquitted, he approved himſelf a faithful ſubject ever after, and three of his ſons laid down their lives in her majeſty's ſervice.[a]

Seizes lord Roch in his own caſtle.

IN the month of Auguſt, the ſame year, the lord deputy made the aforeſaid captain John Zouch governor of Munſter, with whom Ralegh and Dowdal made ſeveral journeys to ſettle and compoſe the country; but the certain place of their reſidence was at Cork. And when Zouch, with Dowdal, made that ſecret expedition, in which he lopp'd off the third branch of this venomous hydra, Sir John Deſmond; whoſe body was hung by the heels on a gibbet, then fix'd on the gates of that city, and his head ſent to London: he left the government of Cork to Ralegh.[b] I have obſerv'd this ſervice againſt that Sir John Deſmond to have been commemorated by Ralegh himſelf in honour of Zouch, though in a diſcourſe on a different ſubject, and ſome years after his death;[c] for ſoon after his return with the lord deputy into England, he was kill'd in a duel by one of his intimate friends: and this I remark here, as ſomewhat diſproving the inſinuation that Zouch's ſuperior preferment ſhould have nouriſhed any ſuch diſcontent in Ralegh,[d] as might occaſion that diſpute we ſhall hear of between him and the lord deputy afterwards in England. Nor can I impute it to the diſbanding his company, which might happen about this time; it ſeeming reaſonable, upon the ſilence of the earl of Deſmond, the ſlaughter of his brothers, and the ſubmiſſion Barry had newly made, that the deputy, thinking Munſter was now growing quiet, ſhould not only leſſen the queen's expences there, by caſhiering ſeveral companies, and diſcharging many garriſons, which he did, ſo as to have for the whole ſervice of that province, only four hundred foot and fifty horſe; but that in the command of theſe, the ſenior officers ſhould be continued. However it was, Ralegh appears no longer, after this reduction, in the wars of Ireland: but how well his ſervices were received by the queen, and how nobly ſhe rewarded him for them after the earl of Deſmond himſelf was ſlain, we ſhall hear when we arrive at the time that his large poſſeſſions came to be divided among thoſe who had aſſiſted in quenching the flames of his rebellion.

His introduction at court.

RALEGH was not long in England, before his relation in ſome degree to the court began to appear. Tradition has induſtriouſly aſcrib'd his firſt introduction thither to a piece of gallantry, wherewith he ſurpris'd the queen accidentally in one of her walks. "Her majeſty meeting (ſays my author) with a plaſhy place, made ſome ſcruple to go on; when Ralegh (dreſs'd in the gay and genteel habit of thoſe times) preſently caſt off and ſpread his new plush cloak on the ground, whereon the queen trod gently over, rewarding him afterwards with many ſuits for his ſo free and ſeaſonable tender of ſo fair a foot-cloth: thus an advantageous admiſſion (ſays he) into the notice of a prince, is more than half a degree to preferment."[a] After this, as the ſame author tells us, Ralegh coming to court, and finding ſome hopes of the queen's favour reflecting upon him, he wrote in a glaſs window, obvious to her eye,

Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall

UNDER which her majeſty ſoon after wrote,

If thy heart fail thee, climb not at all.

No romantic air, that may appear in theſe paſſages, has been able to deny them a recital by ſeveral ſerious authors: and indeed readers of experience, knowing how often an unuſual compliment, or artificial bait for favour, catches it, before the moſt ſubſtantial ſervices, will not only be apt to doubt whether ſuch incidents are to be call'd acceſſories, ſo much as principals in worldly promotion; but eſteem thoſe as the moſt inſtructive circumſtances in the lives of great men, which diſplay the foot-ſteps of their advancement; and how they firſt fell into the track of diſtinction: for the acquiſition of glory is like that of riches; the profound myſtery lies in coming at the prime ſtock; an ordinary prudence will increaſe it.

Deſcription of his perſon.

BUT though he always made a very elegant appearance, as well in the ſplendor of attire, as the politeneſs of addreſs; "having a good preſence, in a handſome and well compacted perſon; a ſtrong natural wit, and a better judgment; with a bold and plauſible tongue, whereby he could ſet out his parts to the beſt advantage;"[b] all very engaging advocates for royal favour, eſpecially in a female ſoveraign: yet, obſerving Ralegh had, at this time, render'd himſelf conſiderable enough by his actions; and that the queen was not wanting in due notice towards ſuch as were of a publick nature; I ſhould think theſe, of a more private and particular nature, might be accounted only as concurrent cauſes of his favourable reception at court; and eſpecially ſeeing others, about the ſame time offering, ſufficient of themſelves to eſtabliſh him there: but be that as it may, we find him, upon his return into England, employ'd in an expedition or two, by authority belike from the court; they being upon occaſions of ſtate. And though it imports not much whether it was now, or before he was in Ireland, that he accompanied the French ambaſſador, Monſieur Simier, among thoſe gentlemen who were appointed for his ſafe convoy to France: yet if that ambaſſador return'd home, when his maſter the duke of Anjou came laſt over in November, the year before-named, this is the place for it to be mention'd in. That Simier was, it ſeems, a proper advocate for the cauſe he came to plead; ſkill'd in all the inſinuating arts and devices of amorous addreſs, and thereby perhaps won more of the queen's attention to his maſter's ſuit, than ſat eaſy upon the earl of Leiceſter's mind: for though this earl was now privately married to the late earl of Eſſex's widow, yet his prejudice might at this time be renewed againſt the ambaſſador, for procuring him the queen's diſpleaſure, by diſcovering that marriage; as it was at firſt created, by ſupplanting him in his higher hopes. Indeed, the earl's animoſity is ſaid to have extended to the hiring of bravo's to aſſaſſinate the ambaſſador; and Camden, who relates thus much, aſſures us the queen publiſh'd (about two years before this time) a proclamation, commanding that no man ſhould offer any affront to Simier, or any of his attendants:[c] nay, if we will believe a certain collection of moſt flagrant accuſations againſt that earl, to which Camden, who ſeldom ſpares him, has paid much credit; the land it ſelf was no boundary to the earl's revenge: for when other attempts fail'd, he is ſaid, among thoſe accuſations, to have "dealt with certain Fluſhingers, and other pirates, to ſink the ambaſſador "at ſea, with the Engliſh gentlemen, his favourers, who accompanied him at his return into "France; and though they miſſed of this practice alſo (as not daring to ſet upon him for "fear of her majeſty's ſhips; which, to break this deſign, attended by ſpecial command, to "waft him over in ſafety;) yet the foreſaid Engliſh gentlemen were holden four hours in chaſe "at their coming back, as Maſter Ralegh well knoweth (ſays my author) being then pre-"ſent; and two of the chaſers, named Clark and Harris, confeſſed afterwards the whole de-"ſignment."[a]

But after the duke of Anjou himſelf had been three months in England, he alſo departed to take upon him the government of the Netherlands. This departure was in February following; and though the queen ſeems to have declin'd the marriage with him, principally becauſe ſhe found her miniſtry ſo averſe to it; yet there was an author, and his printer, who, for having publiſhed a little treatiſe againſt it about two years before,[b] had their hands cut off but a few days after the duke came to London.[c] And ſhe ſhew'd him many other marks of favour and diſtinction; particularly, when he left the kingdom, ſhe bore him company in perſon to Dover, and having appointed a moſt ſplendid retinue of nobles and gentlemen to wait upon him to his new government; I find that Ralegh was alſo among this grand aſſembly. They attended the duke to Antwerp, where, making a moſt magnificent proceſſion, he was created duke of Brabant, &c. and inveſted with his charge. Ralegh ſeems not only to have ſtaid there ſome time after the lord admiral Howard, Leiceſter, young Sidney, and the reſt were return'd; but, through the opportunity of being perſonally known to the prince of Orange, honour'd with ſome ſpecial acknowledgments from him to the queen of England. And Ralegh mentions thus much himſelf, in a diſcourſe he wrote many years afterwards; wherein, ſpeaking of the Hollanders flouriſhing ſtate, he lays down, as the firſt cauſe thereof, the favour and aſſiſtance granted them by this crown; "which, ſays he, the late worthy and famous prince of "Orange did always acknowledge: and in the year 1582, when I took my leave of him at "Antwerp, after the return of the earl of Leiceſter into England, and Monſieur's arrival there; "when he delivered me his letters to her majeſty, he pray'd me to ſay to the queen, from "him, Sub umbra alarum tuarum protegimur: for certainly (ſays he) they had wither'd in "the bud, and ſunk in the beginning of their navigation, had not her majeſty aſſiſted them."[d]

And the duke of Anjou to Antwerp.

Brings over the prince of Orange's acknowledgments to the queen.

Towards the end of Auguſt, this laſt mention'd year, the lord Grey reſign'd the ſword of Ireland, after he had been two years deputy in that kingdom:[e] and this muſt be the time, that diſpute between him and Ralegh was brought to a hearing, of which authors have ſo blindly written. Sir Robert Naunton "is confident, that among the ſecond cauſes of Ralegh's growth (not de-"nying, or rather acquieſcing in his actions and accompliſhments to have been the firſt) "that variance between him and the lord Grey, in his deſcent into Ireland, was a principal; "for it drew them both over (ſays he) to the council-table, there to plead their cauſe; where "(what advantage he had in the cauſe, my ſaid author knew not, but ſays) he had much the "better in telling of his tale; and ſo much, that the queen and the lords took no ſlight mark "of the man and his parts; for from thence he came to be known, and to have acceſs to "the queen and the lords."[f] Now if this author is ſo defective, as not to have known the cauſe or ſubject of their quarrel; or, that Ralegh, leaving Ireland long before the lord Grey, was not likely to be drawn over together with him to the council-table; how much more muſt thoſe writers following him be ſo, who have confus'd this matter with ſeveral other particulars; though they ſeem to have had no other authority? One of them ſays, Ralegh had in deed, but not in truth, the better by the tongue;[g] and inſinuates (with great caution and delicacy he thought, no doubt) that the queen had been told ſomething ſo engaging of Ralegh, beſides his advantage in pleading, that it was not to be mention'd;[h] as if any of her courtiers dared to ſay any thing to the queen's face, which this anonymous writer, near fifty years after her death, would be either aſham'd or afraid to repeat. A later writer makes ſuch diſtinctions of Ralegh's extraordinary behaviour in this diſpute, as if he had been at the council-table, and ſeen as well as heard him.[a] And another, after them all, has found out the cauſe of this difference between them to be captain Zouch's preferment;[b] of which we have before ſpoken, as improbable. But paſſing theſe over, our author Naunton goes on; and tho' he does not determine, whether the lord Leiceſter had then caſt in a good word for Ralegh to the queen; yet ſays "it is true, that he had gotten the queen's ear at a trice, and ſhe began to be taken with his "elocution, and loved to hear his reaſons to her demands: and the truth is, ſhe took him "for a kind of oracle, which nettled them all; yea, thoſe he relied on, began to take this his "ſudden favour for an alarm; to be ſenſible of their own ſupplantation, and to project his; "which made him ſhortly after ſing, Fortune my foe, &c."

IT is hinted to us ſomewhat more expreſly, by another court-writer of thoſe times, and that's a rarity, ſuch being commonly too polite or political to be very obliging in hiſtorical particulars; that the earl of Leiceſter befriended Ralegh (perhaps through his friendſhip with young Sidney, that earl's worthily beloved nephew) in his firſt advancements at court; and that being willing, for his own eaſe, to beſtow handſomly upon another ſome part of the pains, and perhaps of the envy, to which a long indulgent fortune is obnoxious, either brought, or let him into that promiſing ſphere of preferment; where the earl ſoon found him ſuch an apprentice, as knew well enough how to ſet up for himſelf, ſays my ſaid author.[c] So that if the earl of Suſſex, who was Leiceſter's antagoniſt, had any hand in Ralegh's riſe, as ſome later writers of leſs authority have ſuggeſted,[d] it ſeems to have been afterwards, when Ralegh's courtly ſplendor was, by occaſion, ſomewhat obſtructed; and Leiceſter meant to allay it, by interpoſing the young earl of Eſſex: for Ralegh continued, during that ſtorm, in ſome luſtre of a favour'd man, like billows which ſink but by degrees, even when the wind is down that firſt ſtirr'd them. But this we ſhall obſerve as we go on, that in all the different aſpects or conjunctions of intereſt, through the acceſs or change of new favourites in this long reign, none were leſs emerg'd by the ſmiles of the court, in the luxuries and vanities of it, nor more animated by its frowns to the enterpriſing of publick and ſuperior difficulties for the honour and aggrandiſement of his country. Not that he ſet out to ſea, but when he had deſpaired of raiſing himſelf on ſhore: for theſe publick enterpriſes were rooted ſo early in Ralegh's aſpiring mind, that we perceive, even now, before factions at court could drive him from the land, or preferments and grants from the crown enable him for the ſea; that he had built at his own expence, to proſecute them, a ſtrong handſom ſhip, which was named Bark Ralegh, of two hundred ton burden.

AND now that the ſix years period of Sir Humphrey Gilbert's patent grew ſhort, four of them being elaps'd, he thought it high time to make a new attempt in perſon (ſince his aſſignments had proved of little conſequence) at thoſe diſcoveries he had before fail'd in, that he might confirm by experience what he had ſo excellently advanced in theory. Accordingly, having fitted out a fleet of four ſhips, Ralegh alſo victuall'd, and mann'd out his before-mention'd, which was the largeſt among them; and, in the quality of vice-admiral, ſet out to bear his brother Gilbert company, in this his laſt expedition to Newfoundland. The fleet departed from Plymouth on the 11th of June 1583. My author, who was in this voyage, tells us, no coſt was ſpared by Ralegh in proviſions and neceſſaries for the happy accompliſhment of it; yet that in two or three days following he return'd greatly diſtreſs'd to Plymouth, by reaſon his whole ſhip's company was infected with a contagious ſickneſs.[e] But lucky to him, perhaps, was this viſitation; ſince the voyage proved ſo fatal to thoſe who went through it, particularly Sir Humphrey himſelf; who, tho' he arrived in Newfoundland in the beginning of Auguſt following; took poſſeſſion of the country in right of the crown of England, by digging up a turf, and receiving it with a hafel wand, deliver'd to him according to our law and cuſtom; alſo had aſſign'd lands to every man in his company, and was got three hundred leagues in his way home again, with full hopes of the queen's aſſiſtance to fit out a fleet not only for the north, but one alſo for the ſouth next year; yet over-hardily venturing in a little frigat of but ten ton burden, called the Squirrel; he was on the ninth of September following at midnight, in a high ſea, ſwallowed up.[a] Another of the veſſels, called the Delight, but few days before alſo ſuffer'd the ſame fate; and even the reſt return'd not without great hazard, hardſhip, and loſs: teaching (ſays Camden) that it is a more difficult matter to carry over colonies to remote countries upon private men's purſes, than he and others had perſuaded themſelves, to their own loſs and detriment:[b] but neither theſe unfortunate attempts by ſea hitherto, nor the ruin of Sir Humphrey Gilbert's eſtate, nor the loſs of his life, nor the hardſhips of all his company beſides, could teach Ralegh that leſſon: theſe examples and this experience were ſo far from ſatiating, that they did but ſharpen his appetite to ſuch honourable dangers.

But he quotes no authority; and I think by what is before ſaid of the matter, this true cauſe will appear a groundleſs conjecture; at leaſt leſs probable, than what might perhaps be drawn from Spenſer's View of Ireland, vol. 6. p. 1609.

And as we are aſſur'd from family tradition, by a late author of his own name and lineage, that the diſcoveries of the great Columbus, the conqueſts of Fernando Cortez, the famous Francis Pizarro, and other leaders of the Spaniards, who under the emperor Charles and his ſon Philip II, had made the greateſt and moſt ſurpriſing additions to their empire that ever prince received, or ſubjects wrought, were the favourite hiſtories that took up Ralegh's early reading and converſation while he was but a young man;[c] we may preſume they ſo poſſeſs'd his noble genius (with perhaps alſo ſome late domeſtic and living examples) that no little perſonal oppoſitions at home, or particular miſadventures abroad, could ever diſcourage him from the purſuit of theſe grand and national undertakings. But when, by his own obſervation, he found the Spaniards had only ſettled upon the middle and ſouthern parts of America, and that there were certain vaſt territories yet unknown to the north of thoſe lands, which the Spaniards already enjoy'd, as fit perhaps for ſettlement, and as eaſy to conquer, as any they did enjoy: and when, by his enquiries, among the moſt obſervant pilots and mariners who had ſailed in the Spaniſh ſhips to the gulph of Mexico, many of whom he had opportunity to meet and diſcourſe with in Holland and Flanders, he had learnt that the Spaniards always went into the gulph of Mexico by St. Domingo and the iſland of Hiſpaniola, where the currents with the trade-winds always ran together, and ſet into the bay; that they always diſembogu'd, as they call'd it, or came out by the Havana and the channels of Bahama, which they now call the gulph of Florida; and that, as they return'd by this gulph, they found a continued coaſt on the weſt-ſide trending away north, which they generally loſt ſight of by ſtanding away to the eaſt, to make for the coaſt of Spain; Ralegh fully determin'd that there was a vaſt extent of land north of that gulph, or weſt from the coaſt of Spain, which might be well worth diſcovering; and, after mature deliberation, fully reſolv'd upon the diſcovery. As ſoon as he had digeſted his propoſal, and diſplay'd the manner of proſecuting it in proper ſchemes, he laid them before the queen and council, to whom it appearing a rational, practical, and generous undertaking, her majeſty

[a] As authors have been very defective and erroneous in their accounts of this brave and publick-ſpirited, but unfortunate knight, Sir Humphrey Gilbert of Compton; I ſhall here obſerve that John Hooker, who knew him, ſays he was bred at Oxford. See his Supply of the Iriſh chronicles, p. 132; tho' A. Wood is ſilent of any ſuch Oxonian. Hooker takes notice of his extraordinary ſervices in Ireland, for which he was made colonel of Munſter; and Sir Roger Williams, in his Actions of the Low-countries, tells us he was the firſt Engliſh commander who led a regiment thither to ſerve the prince of Orange againſt the Spaniards. But John Prince, who pretends to give us his life among his worthies of Devon, mentions nothing of his land-ſervices. The ſaid J. Prince quotes Sir W. Pole's MSS. to vouch this Gilbert's being knighted by the queen at Greenwich 1577. But Hooker aforeſaid ſhews him to have been knighted in the church at Drogheda, by Sir Hen. Sidney, deputy of Ireland, ſeven years ſooner at leaſt; and agreeable thereto, we find him call'd Sir Humphrey Gilbert in a letter of Sir Thomas Smith's, dated 1572, among Sir D. Digges's collection before-mention'd, p. 299. Laſtly, another writer of his life, in Latin, places his laſt expedition to Newfoundland twenty years ſooner than he undertook it, if it is not the fault rather of the printer than the author, vid. Hollandi Heroologia Anglica. fol. Arnheim 1620, p. 65. As for Sir Humphrey's writings, we have extant in Hakluyt, vol. 3. p. 11. his Diſcourſe to prove a paſſage by the north-weſt to Cathay and the Eaſt-Indies, in ten chapters; firſt publiſh'd in 4to. 1576. at the end of which he mentions another diſcourſe, now laſt I fear; wherein he amended the uſual errors of ſea-cards, which make the degrees of longitude in every latitude of equal bigneſs; and invented a ſpherical inſtrument, with a compaſs of variation, for the perfect knowledge of the longitude; and laid down a preciſe order to prick the ſea-cards, with certain rules for the ſhortning any diſcovery, and knowing at the firſt entrance of any fret, whether it lies open to the ocean more ways than one, and how far the ſea ſtretches itſelf into the land. As for the picture at Compton, ſaid by Prince to be drawn for Sir H. Gilbert; if his author, Sir W. Pole, is no truer in his aſſertion of the queen's having given Sir Humphrey the gold chain repreſented about the neck thereof, than he was in her having knighted him, and there are no other ſignatures beſides that chain, and the inſcription of virginia on the globe, with the verſes under it relating thereto; I ſee not but the picture is to be doubted, as rather meant for his brother Ralegh, who was honoured with a golden chain by the queen, and whoſe title to that inſcription on the globe was beyond any man's in the world. But the ſtately poem in Latin Hexameters, upon his laſt expedition, by Stephanus Parmenius Budeius, a learned Hungarian, who was drown'd with him, was undoubtedly, among other Engliſh adventurers therein nam'd, chiefly intended for his honour. See it in Hakluyt, vol. 3. p. 138.

The queen's letters patents to him for diſcovering of unknown countries.

" ELIZABETH, &c. To all people greeting. Know ye that out of our ſpecial grace, " we grant to our truſty and well-beloved ſervant Walter Ralegh Eſq; his heirs and aſſigns, " free liberty to diſcover ſuch remote heathen and barbarous lands not actually poſſeſſed by " any Chriſtian prince, nor inhabited by Chriſtian people, as to him or them ſhall ſeem good, " to hold the ſame with all prerogatives, commodities, juriſdictions, royalties, and privileges, " by ſea and land, as we by letters patents may grant, or any of our progenitors have granted; " with licenſe to inhabit or remain, build and fortify, at the diſcretion of the ſaid W. Ralegh, " his heirs, &c. the ſtatutes or acts againſt fugitives, or ſuch as depart this realm unprivileg'd " notwithſtanding.

" We likewiſe grant him or them full power to take or lead ſuch of our ſubjects, as ſhall " willingly accompany him or them; alſo to employ and uſe ſufficient ſhipping and furni- " ture for tranſportations and navigations in that behalf: ſo that none of thoſe perſons be ſuch " as are reſtrain'd by us, our heirs or ſucceſſors. Further, that the ſaid W. Ralegh, and his heirs, " ſhall enjoy for ever all the ſoil of ſuch lands ſo to be diſcover'd, and of all ſuch cities, caſtles, " or towns in the ſame, with the right, and royalties, as well marine as other, within the ſaid " lands or ſeas adjoining, with full power to diſpoſe thereof in fee ſimple, or otherwiſe, ac- " cording to the laws of England, at his and their will, to any perſon within the allegiance " of us or our heirs, reſerving always to us, for all ſervices, duties and demands, the " fifth part of all the oar of gold and ſilver there obtain'd after ſuch diſcovery. All which " lands, and countries, ſhall be for ever holden by the ſaid W. Ralegh, his heirs, &c. by " homage, the ſaid payment reſerv'd only for all ſervices. We likewiſe grant to the ſaid " Ralegh and his heirs licenſe for their defence, to repell by land or ſea all perſons that ſhall with- " out his or their liking attempt to inhabit the ſaid countries, or within two hundred leagues " of the places in them where he or they within ſix years to come ſhall make their dwellings, if " not before inhabited by the ſubjects of any Chriſtian prince in amity with us. Giving alſo " power to him or them to take thoſe perſons, with their ſhips and goods, and keep them as " lawful prize, who without his or their licenſe ſhall be found trafficking within the limits " aforeſaid (our ſubjects and others in amity with us only excepted.) And as well for uniting " in more perfect league ſuch countries with our realms of England and Ireland, as for the " encouragement of men to theſe enterpriſes, we declare that all ſuch countries ſo poſſeſſed " ſhall be of our allegiance. And we grant to the ſaid W. Ralegh, his heirs, and to all be- " ing of our allegiance, whoſe names ſhall be enter'd in ſome court of record within our " realm of England, and to their heirs, who with the aſſent of the ſaid W. Ralegh, his heirs, &c. " ſhall in his journeys for diſcovery or conqueſt hereafter travel to ſuch lands, that they " and every of them, being either born within our ſaid Realms of England or Ireland, or " any other place within our allegiance, and who ſhall hereafter be inhabitants of any of the " lands aforeſaid; ſhall have all the privilege of free denizens and perſons native of England, " in ſuch ample manner as if they were born and perſonally reſident in our ſaid realm of Eng- " land, any law, &c. notwithſtanding. And further, for the ſafety of all that ſhall adven- " ture themſelves, we grant the ſaid W. Ralegh, and his heirs, full power and authority with- " in the ſaid lands, in the way thither, and from thence, to correct, puniſh, pardon, govern " by their good diſcretions and policies, as well in cauſes capital or criminal, as civil, both " marine and other, all our ſubjects who ſo adventure themſelves, and ſhall inhabit the territo- " ries aforeſaid, or ſhall abide within two hundred leagues of any ſuch places where he or " they ſhall inhabit within ſix years next enſuing, according to ſuch ſtatutes as ſhall be by him " or them eſtabliſh'd; ſo that the ſaid ſtatutes or laws conform as near as conveniently may be " with thoſe of England, and do not oppugn the Chriſtian faith, or any way withdraw the " people of thoſe lands from our allegiance. We alſo grant full power to our truſty and " well-beloved counſellor Sir W. Cecile, lord Burghley, our high-treaſurer of England, and " to the lord-treaſurer for us and our heirs, and to the privy-council of us and our heirs, or any " four or more of them, that he or they, under their hands or ſeals, authoriſe the ſaid Sir Wal- " ter Ralegh or his heirs, by themſelves or officers, to tranſport out of England and Ireland " any of their goods, with other commodities, as to the ſaid lord-treaſurer or the ſaid privy- " council ſhall be thought convenient, for the better relief and ſupport of the ſaid Walter Ra- " legh or his heirs, any act notwithſtanding. Provided always, that if the ſaid Walter Ra- " legh, his heirs, or any other, by his or their licence, ſhall rob or ſpoil by ſea or land, or do " any unlawful hoſtility to any of our ſubjects, or thoſe of kings or ſtates in perfect league

" and unity with us, we ſhall, upon juſt complaint, make proclamation that the ſaid W. Ra- " legh or his heirs ſhall, within the terms to be limited, make full ſatisfaction; ſo that we
" and thoſe who complain may be fully contented; and that if he or they make not ſuch ſa-
" tisfaction within ſuch time, it ſhall be lawful for us to put him or them out of our alle" giance, and from that time for all princes or others to purſue with hoſtility, as not to be " avouch'd or defended by us: though any mention of the yearly value of the premiſſes, or any " part thereof, or of any other grant by us or our predeceſſors to the ſaid Walter Ralegh be" fore this time made, be not expreſs'd; or any other proviſion or reſtraint to the contrary IMMEDIATELY upon the grant of this patent, Ralegh gave his inſtructions for an American voyage [b] to captain Philip Amadas and captain Arthur Barlow, two experienced commanders, and had got a couple of barks well furniſh'd with men and proviſions at his own expence, in ſuch readineſs, that on the twenty-ſeventh day of April following they departed from the weſt of England. The tenth of May they arrived at the Canaries, and a month after fell upon the iſles of the Weſt-Indies " which, with the reſt adjoining (ſays my author, one of thoſe

" captains) are ſo well known to your ſelf (directing the account of this voyage to his pro" prietor) and to many others, that I will not trouble you with the remembrance of them."
In the beginning of July they were ſaluted with a moſt fragant gale from the land they were ſeeking, and ſoon after arrived upon the coaſt; but ſail'd along ſome ſix-ſcore miles before they could find an entrance by any river iſſuing into the ſea. At laſt, diſcovering one, they mann'd out their boats to view the land adjoining, where they ſaw vines laden with grapes in vaſt abundance, climbing up the tall cedars, and ſpreading ſo luxuriantly along the ſandy ſhore, that the ſea often over-flowed them. On the thirteenth of July they took poſſeſſion in right of the queen, and afterwards deliver'd the country over to Ralegh's uſe. They thought this land had at firſt been the continent, but found it afterwards only an iſland twenty miles long, called Wocoken; plentifully ſtock'd with animals, groves of ſweet-ſmelling trees, pulſe, grain, and eſculent roots. They obſerv'd along the coaſt, a tract of iſlands two or three hundred miles long; and paſſing between them, ſaw another great ſea, twenty, forty, and in ſome places fifty miles over, before they could reach the continent; and in this incloſed ſea above a hundred iſlands of various ſize, whereof one is ſixteen miles long, called Roanoak, and about ſeven leagues diſtant, up the river Occam, from the harbour they firſt enter'd; at which they chiefly ſettled while they ſtay'd, finding it ſo pleaſant and fruitful as to yield three harveſts in five months. But they remain'd upon the borders of Wocoken two days before they beheld a human creature; on the third, they ſaw a boat rowing towards them with three of the natives; one of them landed, and walk'd up the ſhore near their ſhip, for they were then on board; then the two captains, with ſome others, took their boat and row'd to land, and by their courteous carriage, ſoon prevail'd on the native to return with them on board, where they cloathed him, and gave him victuals, wine, and ſeveral little toys or utenſils, which won the ſimple creature's heart. Soon after his departure, he return'd again with a boat full of fiſh, to be divided between the ſhip and the pinnace, and then he left them. The next day came the king's brother Granganimeo, with a great many attendants; for the king himſelf, who was named Wingina, and his large territories Wingandacoa, lay ill of the wounds he had lately receiv'd in war. His brother was highly pleas'd with his entertainment, and having received ſeveral preſents, ſoon after ſent the ſavages to traffick with the Engliſh; alſo came again himſelf, and exchang'd twenty ſkins, worth as many nobles, for a tin diſh, which he hung as a gorget about his neck, to defend him from the arrows of his enemies: then alſo he brought his wife and children, with her attendants, forty or fifty in number. She was well-favour'd, but baſhful, clad in a mantle of deer-ſkin, lin'd with fur, and a kind of apron of the ſame, her hair hung down long on each ſide, with a band of white coral about her forehead, and long bracelets of pearl down to her middle, as big as peaſe in her ears, a bracelet whereof, we deliver'd to your worſhip, ſays my author to Ralegh. Her huſband's apparel was much like hers, only about his head he wore a broad plate of gold or copper, and his hair was long but on one ſide. After this interview, familiar commerce paſs'd between the natives and the Engliſh, who, when they went to Roanoak, were much careſs'd and treated by the lady aforeſaid. And when ſhe could not prevail with them to ſtay, [b] But that he now ſail'd thither himſelf, or then made the diſcovery, whatever he might do before, of the country hereafter mention'd, in perſon, and return'd in the beginning of 1585, as the author of his life, in Lives Engliſh and foreign, tells us, vol. 1. p. 90, is all fancy and fiction.

being but few in company, tho' the natives had no edge-tools of iron or ſteel, and had proffer'd a great box of pearl for ſome armour and a ſword, ſhe ſent her women to watch them all night in their ſhips on the bank-ſide. And indeed all the people, who ſaw them, admir'd much at their ſhips, their fire-arms, their cloaths, and above all, their complexions; for, except a veſſel which was caſt away with ſome chriſtian adventurers about twenty-ſix years before near Secotan, the ſouthermoſt town in Wingandacoa, never any people in apparel, or of fair colour were ſeen or heard of among them; which made them wonder ſo much at the whiteneſs of their ſkins, and ſo fond of ſeeing and touching them. Under theſe favourable recommendations, and the diſtreſs which the natives were in for ſome powerful friends to defend them from the invaſions of their neighbours, the promiſes of viſiting them again, wherewith the Engliſh left them, after having learnt as much of the ſituation, ſtate, and product of the country, as was at this time convenient, were very acceptable. So bringing over a couple of the Indians with them, named Manteo and Wancheſe, to ſhew them our fine country, they arriv'd ſafely in the weſt of England about the middle of September following. Then captain Barlow addreſs'd the relation of this firſt voyage, and his ſucceſs in it, to his proprietor, whereof I have thus given an abſtract.[a]

When Ralegh had laid before her majeſty theſe and all other reports moſt worthy of notice, which were brought him of this rich, beautiful, and virgin country; and had acknowledg'd how much this hopeful progreſs towards the poſſeſſion of it was owing to the auſpices of a virgin queen; ſhe was ſo well pleas'd with the honour and advantage it promis'd, and gave him ſuch encouragement to compleat the diſcovery, which he forthwith prepar'd to do by another expedition, that ſhe call'd it her ſelf by the name of VIRGINIA.[b] What enemies this publick patronage might raiſe him at court, we hear not; but find he had ſuch friends in the country, that upon the approaching ſeſſions of parliament, about two months after, he was elected a knight of the ſhire for the county of Devon, Sir William Courtenay being the other repreſentative.[c] There was then a clerk of the parliament ſo very indolent, or otherwiſe indiſpos'd, that the tranſactions of the houſe of commons at this time were very imperfectly recorded.[d] Yet we find Ralegh mention'd to have been choſen of the committees upon ſome bills that were then read. On the fourteenth of December following, the bill, in confirmation of his patent aforeſaid for the diſcovery of foreign countries, was read the firſt time. In the afternoon it was read the ſecond time, and committed to the vice-chamberlain Hatton, ſecretary Walſingham, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Richard Greenfield (or Grenvill) Sir William Courtenay, Sir William Mohun, and others. Three days after the ſaid bill was, without any alteration, order'd to be engroſs'd. The next day it was read the third time, when, after many arguments and a proviſo added, it paſs'd the houſe upon the queſtion.[e] Between this time in December and the twenty-fourth of February following he receiv'd the honour of knighthood; for being then in a committee for conſidering after what manner and meaſure they ſhould ſupply her majeſty by ſubſidy: this is the earlieſt time I meet with of his being ſtyl'd Sir Walter Ralegh;[f] a title which her majeſty beſtow'd, as all others of honour, with frugality and choice. Therefore was it a more certain cognizance of virtue or valour, than titles of more pompous denomination in the reign of her ſucceſſor, who ſuffer'd lucre to corrupt the noble fountain, to turn it into vulgar channels, and drain it even to the dregs;[g] ſo that the dignities which flowed or overflowed from it, proved diſtinctions oftener of their pride, riches, or proſtitutions, on whom they were conferr'd, than of any abilities or performances for the publick good that might deſerve them. Nay, that this honour was intended by that queen as the moſt ſignificant teſtimony of perſonal deſert, may be inſtanced, according to an ingenious obſerver of her reign, "in "Sir Francis Vere, a man nobly deſcended; and Sir Walter Ralegh, exactly qualify'd, ſays he,

[g] Sir Edward Walker, garter, and ſecretary of war to king Charles I. obſerves, "That in all queen Elizabeth's forty-"four years reign ſhe created but ſix earls, and eight or "nine barons. So that when ſhe died, the nobility con-"ſiſted but of one marquis, nineteen earls, two viſcounts, "and about thirty barons: but doubts whether in the "reign of king James, the diſpenſing of honours ſo li-"berally was not one of the beginnings of general diſ-"contents, eſpecially among perſons of great extraction. "So that when this king died, having reign'd but twenty-"two years, he left the nobility in his three kingdoms "above double the number to what he found them, tho' "his reign was peaceable, and not full of action, which "renders men in capacity highly to merit from their "prince; and ſo, without envy, receive advancement." And a little further, "When alliance to a favourite; "riches, though gotten in a ſhop; perſons of private "eſtates, and of families, that many of them, and their "fathers, would have thought themſelves highly honour'd "to have been but knights in queen Elizabeth's time, were "advanc'd; then the fruits thereof began to appear, &c." His obſervations on the inconveniencies of frequent promotions to titles of honour; in his hiſtorical diſcourſes, fol. 1705, p. 300 and 302, &c.

His patent for wine-licences.

ABOUT the time that her majeſty granted Ralegh the patent above-cited for the diſcovery of remote countries, ſhe ſeems alſo to have given him another to licenſe the vending of wines throughout the kingdom, that by the advantages of this, he might be better able to ſuſtain the great charges which the other brought upon him. There were no reſtrictions belike in this patent from increaſing the number of vintners in any part of the realm. And hence aroſe his controverſy at this time with one of the univerſities. For Ralegh having by virtue of that general patent given licence to one John Keymer to ſell wine in Cambridge, ſome of the hotter heads, eſpecially the other vintners there, among whom was one Baxter, a 'ſquire beadle, licenſed to ſell wine by that univerſity, oppoſed this Keymer and his wife with ſuch violence, that ſhe was likely to have died. Complaint being made to Ralegh, he wrote a letter to The worſhipful Dr. Howland, vice-chancellor, and the reſt of the maſters, to tell them how much he took this riotous demeanor as a contempt of the queen's grant to him; preſuming, if he had given any unlawful privilege, the conference he had offer'd, by his deputies, for a quiet deciſion of the matter by learned council between them, would have been accepted. Further telling them, that if the abuſe was not regulated, and the ſaid Keymer permitted to enjoy the liberty granted him, he would take ſome other courſe for reformation therein; but reſting aſſured they would uſe ſuch means as might occaſion no further trouble, he not deſiring to execute his grant to its extent among their vintners, who were the only diſturbers herein, reſpecting more their own gain than quiet government; he only craves their anſwer, and that the riotous perſons might not reſt unpuniſhed: ſo bids them heartily farewel; from his lodgings at the court the 9th of July 1584; and ſubſcribes himſelf Your very affectionate loving friend. This producing no anſwer in ſeven months, and Ralegh having heard they continued to oppreſs Keymer; he wrote, by him, again; To his loving friend the vice-chancellor, &c. telling him, that being by information perſwaded, himſelf, with the grave and well-diſpoſed of the univerſity, were ſo grieved with the unſeemly outrages lately committed by the young and unbridled heads thereof, to the contempt of the queen's prerogative and his diſcredit, as ſufficient order had been taken for the bearer's quiet; which cauſed him to reſt from requiring reformation therein at his good lord-treaſurer's hands; who as yet underſtood nothing from him of theſe riots, through the good-will he bore to their univerſity: and that he meant ſo to deal with them for the other four taverns, as ſhould ſufficiently have contented them. But his too favourable dealing with them had given ſuch encouragement, as, this day, he is inform'd, that, intending further to diſturb the bearer, they had warned him to appear before them; with which he had perſuaded him to comply; for tho' he knew them not, their place ſhould tell him, their proceedings would be juſt and lawful; which only he deſired, and wherein they would pleaſure themſelves, and continue his readineſs to ſerve them. Thus hoping to find by their anſwer, theſe informations ſprung rather from jealouſy than juſt occaſion, he leaves them to God; from the court at Somerſet-Houſe the 10th of February in the year aforeſaid, and ſubſcribes himſelf Your very willing friend. Upon their ſending no anſwer to this, and Ralegh hearing they had ſuddenly clapp'd up the man in priſon, he ſent ten days after the laſt, his third letter from the court, directed To the vice-chancellor, and the reſt of the maſters, &c. And herein tells them, he cannot a little marvel at their peremptory and proud manner of dealing. That he was content to uſe all manner of courteſy towards them in reſpect of his honourable good lord the lord-treaſurer; but perceived his reaſonable, or rather too ſubmiſs dealing, had bred in them a proceeding unſufferable; having committed a poor man to priſon, for doing nothing but what was warranted by the great ſeal of England; which, ſuppoſing they had a charter, he knew not that any man or ſociety would ſo much take upon them to do, before a trial. As I reverence the place, ſays he, of which you are the governors, ſo I will not willingly take any wrong or diſgrace from you. But as he was aſſur'd the lord-treaſurer would be indifferent in the caſe, and as the matter ſo much concern'd the validity of his patent elſewhere, as well as in their univerſity, he would try the utmoſt of his right as well for this one, wherewith he was content to have been ſatisfy'd, as for all the other four. So having thought they would have vouchſafed him an anſwer to his laſt letters, he ends, ſubſcribing himſelf Your friend, as you ſhall give cauſe. [b] This rous'd them to ſome conſideration, and ſoon after, a

His controverſy with the univerſity of Cambridge.

[b] The three letters, whereof I have here given the ſubſtance in Ralegh's own words, were communicated to me by the right honourable the earl of Oxford, from the collections of the reverend and learned Mr. Baker of St. John's College, Cambridge, who copied them out of the originals.

handſome apologetical letter was ſent from the vice-chancellor to Sir W. Ralegh, ſetting forth, that the hard opinion he had conceived of them for this matter, made them doubt what manner of anſwer they might addreſs to him without offence; and that their ſilence was ſo ill taken, they knew not how their endeavours to excuſe it might give him ſatisfaction. That they had not neglected any reaſonable means to procure his favour for the quiet enjoyment of that whereof they had the fruition for above two hundred years; nor omitted to become petitioners to him in a very humble manner. That his counſel had not made any juſt exception againſt their charters; and thoſe who had the hearing of the caſe, thought them to have the better warrant. Yet that he uſed ſuch hard terms, as they little look'd for at his hands; "being by birth a gentleman; "by education train'd up to the knowledge of good letters; inſtructed with the liberal diſpoſi- "tion of a univerſity, the fountain and nurſery of all humanity: and further, by God's good "bleſſing, advanc'd in court, from whence the very name of courteſy is drawn." That the prejudice he apprehended from their example againſt his patent, was unlikely to fall out; ſince other places were not privileg'd as the univerſities were. That her majeſty's grant, by her prerogative, gave him his title; and the like prerogative was the ground of their charters. And as he would think it hard to have his patent impeach'd by an after-grant, they hoped he would with like equity meaſure them, who were warranted to have the ſole dealing with all vintners in Cambridge town, and the precincts thereof. Touching the impriſonment of the party, whom he charged them with proceeding againſt before trial; and who, according to Mr. Brown's promiſe to the lord-treaſurer, was to have given over at Michaelmas laſt; however the courſe thereof had been otherwiſe reported to him, it was only at this time to correct his contempt in not appearing, being lawfully warned, and refuſing to anſwer before the ordinary judge, or enter bond for appearance when cauſe ſhould require. That for their own part, it would be no diſadvantage whether he or other, one or many, were vintners there; but in regard of the youth committed to their charge, duty bound them to conſider who they admitted to keep taverns, the number whereof alſo was limited; which, if they exceeded, would endanger their privileges; for the preſervation whereof as they had all taken a ſpecial oath, ſo they right humbly eftſoons beſeech'd him to have regard of them for their duties therein. Concluding thus; "Whatever kindneſs you ſhall any ways ſhew to the univerſity; As the body thereof doth ſtill "continue, ſo the memory thereof cannot decay. There is not one of us, but you may readily "command wherein it may pleaſe you to employ us; only we pray you, and that in the heartieſt "manner, to vouchſafe us your favour in matter of our privileges; That we may leave them in "no worſe eſtate to our poſterity, than we did receive them of our predeceſſors. Thus deſiring "God ſo to direct you with his bleſſed ſpirit, as may be moſt to his glory, and your greateſt "comfort, we take our leave; from Cambridge."[a] This might probably pacify Ralegh at preſent, both for their neglect in not anſwering his letters, and their forwardneſs in impriſoning the man; till the difference was a few months afterwards accommodated by the lord-treaſurer, who was chancellor of that univerſity.[b]

AND indeed at this juncture Ralegh ſeems to have had little leiſure for further debates of this kind: for the parliament being ſoon after, on the 29th of March 1585, prorogued, Ralegh appears ſeveral ways engag'd in the laudable improvements of navigation. For his brother Adrian Gilbert of Sandridge, afterwards knighted, in purſuance of the arguments laid down by his brother Sir Humphrey, having been at great charges in finding out the northern paſſage to China and the Moluccas; and in conſideration thereof been granted a patent by the queen two years before this time, to purſue the diſcovery by partners, under the title of The colleagues of the fellowſhip for the diſcovery of the north-weſt paſſage; Ralegh was now one of the aſſociates in this enterprize; and after having duly conſulted about the likelieſt means to ſucceſs, and liberally contributed towards the expence, they choſe captain John Davis, an experienc'd navigator, to be undertaker of the exploit. He ſet firſt out upon it this ſummer from Falmouth in two barks. When he came to land in ſixty-ſix degrees forty minutes latitude, he anchor'd in a

For "the price; it ſeemeth they may ſet prices, ſo as it be "according to the ſtatute, and not otherwiſe. And if "the vintners ſet at higher prices, they are to be puniſhed "by law. Which penalty Mr. Rawlie may diſpenſe "withal; and yet cannot ſue for the penalty by his pa- "tent againſt the ſtatute laws: for therein all liberties "to the univerſity is excepted." very fair road, under a brave mountain; which, for the ſplendid appearance it made, the cliffs thereof being as orient as gold, they named Mount Ralegh,[a] in honour of their proprietor; and ſoon after fell into the very paſſage they ſought, ſince, well known by the name of Davis's Streights. The farther ſearch whereof, through the ſame patronage and ſupport, captain Davis made in two voyages more, the two following years, and in a manner compleated the ſaid diſcovery.[b]

Mount Ralegh.

The ſecond voyage to Virginia.

But about two months before Davis begun his ſaid firſt voyage for this diſcovery, Ralegh ſent out his own fleet for Virginia, which conſiſted of ſeven ſail, whereof ſome were his own ſhips, and they departed from Plymouth on the 9th of April, the year above ſpecified. He deputed his gallant relation Sir Richard Grenville general of the expedition, and Mr. Ralph Lane, who was afterwards knighted, to be governor of the colony, which they now tranſported. There went beſides, Mr. Thomas Candiſh, John Arundel, Raymond, Stucley, Bremige, Vincent, Mr. John Clark, and ſeveral others, whereof ſome were captains, and others aſſiſtants for council and direction in the voyage. So they ſhaped their courſe to the Canary iſlands, from thence to Dominica, and to the iſland of St. John de Puerto Rico, where they were ſadly ſtung with the Muſketoes, and near which they took two Spaniſh frigats; one whereof was freighted with a rich cargo, and divers Spaniards of diſtinction, who afterwards were ranſom'd for good round ſums of money. Then they made away to Hiſpaniola, ſoon after which the general, and ſome of his company, were near being caſt away in catching of Seals. From thence they ſail'd to Florida,[c] and on the 26th of June anchor'd at Wocoken, whence they ſent word of their arrival to king Wingina at Roanoak. They carried the Indians with them from England; and Manteo, on the 6th of July, led Mr. Arundel to the main continent, where they found ſome of their men, who had been conducted thither twenty days before, by captain Raymond. On the eleventh following, the general, accompanied by Arundel, Stucley, Lane, Candiſh, Hariot, Amadas, Clark, and others, paſſed over the water to the main land, and victuall'd their ſhips; in which voyage they firſt diſcover'd the towns of Pomeioc, Aquaſgococ, and Secotan; alſo the great lake Paquipe, and many other places; then return'd to their fleet. They afterwards re-viſited thoſe parts, and were kindly entertained by the ſavages. Coming at laſt to anchor at Hatoraſk; prince Grangino, or Granganimeo, before mention'd, came attended by Manteo to viſit them on board the admiral, which was named the Tyger. The particulars which paſſed between them about the ſettlement are not mention'd in the ſhort journal of this voyage; but we may conclude it was agreed on to their mutual ſatisfaction; ſince one hundred and ſeven men, whoſe names are printed at the end of the ſaid journal, under the government of Mr. Lane, were left for a year in the country, without diſturbance, to begin the plantation. On the 25th of Auguſt the general weighed anchor, and ſet ſail for England: about ſix days after he took a Spaniſh ſhip of three hundred ton, richly laden; and on the 18th of October arrived with the prize at Plymouth, where he was courteouſly receiv'd by his worſhipful friend.[d]

A rich prize,

Of this prize, we have ſome further account, if it is to be credited; for it comes from a man, who, in the latter end of Sir Walter Ralegh's life, met with countenance to prove his greateſt enemy; but after his death, found himſelf neceſſitated to publiſh all the arguments he could deviſe, to juſtify his perfidy towards him, and aſſwage the reproach of mankind. This author, one of king James's knights, was the ſon, it ſeems, of that Stucley[e] mention'd in the foregoing voyage; who is no where call'd a captain, nor ſeems to have had command in any of the ſhips; but to have been a private gentleman, who went over as an aſſiſtant for council,

[a] John Jane's account of captain Davis's firſt voyage in June 1585, for the diſcovery of the north-weſt paſſage, in Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 101.

[b] Theſe two voyages follow the firſt in the ſame volume. Joannes Baptiſta Ramuſius, in the preface to his third volume of Navigations, writes with reſpect to this diſcovery of the north-weſt paſſage to the Eaſt-Indies, and the attempt firſt made by Sebaſtian Cabota, pilot-major of England, as follows: "It ſeems, that God does ſtill reſerve this great enterprize, for ſome great prince, to diſcover this voyage to Cathay by this way; which, for the bringing of the ſpiceries from India into Europe, were the moſt eaſy and ſhorteſt of all others; to make his name great, and fame immortal to all ages to come; far more than can be done by any of all thoſe great troubles and wars which daily are uſed in Europe among the miſerable Chriſtian people."

[c] One argument uſed by a late author to prove this was the firſt attempt made for the diſcovery of theſe parts of America, is, that theſe navigators "knew no other way to ſail from England to the coaſt of Virginia, than to go firſt to the Canaries, from thence to Hiſpaniola, and into the Gulph of Mexico; then out by Cuba and the Gulph of Bahama; and ſo coaſt along the ſhore from Florida to Virginia, from the latitude of 30 minutes to 42; which is in ſhort (ſays he) like going from London by Portſmouth, and from thence to Exeter, away to Briſtol, and ſo up by the banks of the Severn to come at Weſt-Cheſter." or or ſome directions relating to the plantation. But his ſaid ſon, after Ralegh's death, hence takes occaſion to tell us, that one day himſelf upbraiding Ralegh with the injury he had done his father, in deceiving him of a great adventure, "which my ſaid father (ſays he) had in the Tyger, "when he went to the Weſt-Indies with my uncle Sir Richard Grenvill; which was, by his "(Ralegh's) own confeſſion, worth fifty thouſand pounds, and came all to his hands, my father's "portion being at leaſt ten thouſand pounds, which he might lawfully claim: he anſwer'd; "that the queen, however ſhe ſeem'd a great and good miſtreſs to him in the eyes of the "world, yet was ſo unjuſt and tyrannous to him, that ſhe laid the envy as well of this, as of "many other her oppreſſions, upon him: and that ſhe took all the pearl in a cabinet unto "her ſelf, without ſo much as ever giving him one pearl."[a] This is publiſh'd viſibly to reflect injuſtice upon Ralegh towards that author's father, and ingratitude towards the queen: but how probable it will ſeem (had it proceeded even from an indifferent hand) that ſo great a ſhare in this prize ſhould be due to his father, and no diſſatisfaction appear in his uncle; he who got it all, to be allowed alſo no ſhare; or that his father ſhould never claim ſo great a ſum by law, which, as the ſon ſays, he might lawfully claim; and laſtly, how ſo great a profit to Ralegh will correſpond with ſome ſubſequent obſervations on the royal aſſiſtance he ſoon needed, through the ſlender returns theſe Virginian voyages made for all the charge and care he beſtow'd upon them, muſt be ſubmitted to the reader's judgment, when he ſhall arrive at thoſe paſſages; and more eſpecially at the tragical cataſtrophe of the whole ſtory.

If ſo much good fortune did now befall Ralegh, a pretty enlargement was ſoon after made to it by the queen her ſelf; ſomewhat unuſual with the leiſurely courſe of her bounty: but that it was a favour in conjunction, or of a comprehenſive nature; from a principal ſhare whereof, he, neither for his former eminent ſervices, could be juſtly excluded; nor for the ſupport of that chargeable diſcovery, by which he had ſo newly deſerved. For an end having been put to the Munſter rebellion by force of arms, and the country further laid deſolate by a raging famine, which devour'd what the ſword had left, except a few who remain'd in cities, fled to England, or could feed upon weeds and carrion, ſo as even to rob the graves and the gibbets of their dead, to keep the dying alive;[b] the queen ſoon became deſirous of repeopling the country, and to have ways conſider'd on, how the late earl of Deſmond's large territories in Ireland might be diſpos'd of to the advantage of her and her ſubjects. After commiſſioners were ſent over for this purpoſe, and proper methods taken to prevent fraudulent conveyances by the rebels, there was now at laſt a ſcheme reſolv'd on for the plantation of Munſter; and ſecretary Fenton carried over the inſtructions towards the latter end of this year.[c] The whole forfeiture was above five hundred ſeventy-four thouſand acres of land;[d] and after ſome reſtitutions had been made, the remainder was divided into Seigniories among certain gentlemen-undertakers, as they were call'd;[e] but chiefly ſuch as had been inſtrumental in appeaſing the Iriſh rebellion. One of the largeſt diviſions, which was twelve thouſand acres, ſituate in the counties of Cork and Waterford, was given by her majeſty to Sir Walter Ralegh and his heirs, with certain privileges and immunities, upon thoſe conditions of planting and improving the ſame, to which the reſt were alſo oblig'd.[f] And tho' many of the undertakers did not people their Seigniories with well-affected Engliſh, but ſold them to Engliſh papiſts, or otherwiſe to their profit; nor fortified according to their covenants; nor forbore encroaching upon the lands of the loyal and protected Iriſh (as the crown on the other ſide fail'd of maintaining certain forces promis'd for their ſecurity from freſh invaſions;) yet I meet with none of thoſe irregularities objected to Ralegh: on the contrary, that he peopled his plantation unexceptionably; that he kept the ſaid eſtate to the latter end of the queen's reign, and then ſold it to Richard Boyle, afterwards the famous earl of Cork, as, in a memorial of his own life, the ſaid

[d] Fynes Moryſon in his Itinerary, fol. 1617. part 2. cap. 1. pag. 4. agrees with Cox, fol. 392, that the number of acres Engliſh meaſure, forfeited by the earl of Deſmond and his confederates, were 574628. But Cox makes three variations from Moryſon in the diviſion of that land, with reſpect to Sir Walter Ralegh's ſhare. For Moryſon makes Ralegh's dividend to lie in Waterford and Tipperary; Cox, in Cork and Waterford; Moryſon, parcelling four ſhares together, allots by patent to the earl of Ormond, Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, Sir Edward Fitton, and Sir Walter Ralegh, 22910 acres. But their four ſhares joined, out of Cox, amount to 37425 acres. Yet in Cox thisgreater tract yields but 242 l. 13 s. 7 d. yearly rents; and that ſmaller tract in Moryſon, 303 l. 3 d. So that Moryſon's account falls ſhort of the other in 14515 acres of land; And Cox's account falls ſhort of his in 60 l. 6. s. 8 d. yearly rent. But as no other author I have met with expreſly diſtinguiſhes Sir Walter Ralegh's ſhare to have been 12000 acres, with rents 66 l. 13 s. 4 d. beſides Cox; and he ſeems to have had good authority for that diſtinction; I find my ſelf obliged, not only by neceſſity, but reaſon, to accept of his account. earl has related.[a] But as capacious as this benefit ſeemed, it was rather expenſive perhaps at firſt, than profitable to him.

For Sir Richard Grenvill, who, at his departure from Virginia, had promis'd the colony he left behind to return punctually with ſupplies by the following Eaſter at furtheſt, was not altogether ſo expeditious as they expected; probably through ſome difficulties attending the charge thereof, which Ralegh's new undertaking of planting alſo that Seigniory might probably render more burdenſom. Grenvill brought over letters from governor Lane to a very worthy encourager of all naval adventures;[b] deſcribing the commodities and fertility of the country they were about to cultivate and civilize: the ſaid governor alſo drew up notes while he was there, which he afterwards methodiz'd into a Diſcourſe of two parts, diſplaying the particularities of the country of Virginia, and the reaſons which moved their departure from thence into England.[c] In this diſcourſe we learn, that their diſcovery for Sir Walter Ralegh had extended from Roanoak ſouthward, as far as Secotan, about eighty miles; northward as far as the Cheſepians, being a hundred and thirty miles more; and to the north-weſt, as far as Chawanook, a hundred and thirty miles: and further mentions many towns about the water-ſide, diſcovered by the way. It alſo informs us of his enquiries after a fiſhery and traffick for pearl in thoſe parts; beſides a mine of ſtrange metal like copper, but paler and ſofter: moreover, of the taking prince Skyco priſoner; and after the death of Granganimeo aforeſaid, how his brother king Wingina changed his name, and plotted an inſurrection againſt the Engliſh; for which he loſt his life: while another king called Okiſco, ſent to pay homage and acknowledge ſubjection to the grand Weroanza, or queen of England; and after her, to Sir Walter Ralegh. Laſtly, the arrival of Sir Francis Drake about the 10th of June 1586; who, returning from his proſperous conqueſt of St. Domingo, Cartagena, and St. Auguſtine, determin'd, in his way homeward, to viſit his friend's colony in Virginia. They had deſpaired of Sir Richard Grenvill's promiſe; and the rather, becauſe of the preparations then making for Flanders, and other parts of America. Their corn was indeed within a fortnight of inviting the ſickle; but they were in need of many other proviſions. Hereupon Drake readily proffer'd them all manner of ſupplies, by victuals, men, ammunition, and ſhips, to carry on and compleat their worthy undertaking. The governor deſir'd only a ſhip, and ſo much proviſion as about Auguſt would carry him and his company to England, which Drake granted in full ſufficiency; beſides pinnaces, boats, and two experienc'd maſters or pilots, to abide with them, and apply themſelves earneſtly in the action. All this was perform'd in two days. On the next day, while ſome were writing letters into England, and others relating their adventures to each other, ſome at ſea, ſome on ſhore, there aroſe a moſt violent tempeſt, which laſted three days; drove moſt of the fleet from their anchors away to ſea, and in them the proviſions and maſters aforeſaid, with the chief of the Engliſh colony; whom they ſaw no more till they met in England. Then Drake proffer'd them another ſhip; but the reſt of the colony, who were left behind, all begg'd to go for England; to which Drake conſenting, took them aboard on the 19th of June, and ſet ſail.[d] Sir Walter Ralegh had in the mean time provided a ſhip of a hundred ton, freighted with all kind of proviſions in a moſt plentiful manner, for the relief of this colony; but not ſailing till after Eaſter, the ſaid colony was newly departed before this freſh ſupply arriv'd at Virginia. After ſome time ſpent up the country, in ſeeking the colony and not finding it, they return'd with all the proviſion aforeſaid into England.[e] About a fortnight after, Sir Richard Grenvill arrived at Virginia with three ſhips more, well ſtored for the ſame company of planters; but he, after much ſearch, miſſing alſo of them and of the aforeſaid ſhip, left fifteen men at Roanoak with plenty of ſupplies, and made for England; not without ſome conqueſts over the Spaniards at the Azores in his return.[f] And indeed Ralegh was alſo about this very time victorious at the ſame place: for, when he ſent the aforeſaid ſhip to relieve his colony, or ſoon after, he diſpatched two more, named the Serpent and Mary-Spark, both of them his own, to the Azores againſt the Spaniards, under the conduct of captain Jacob Whiddon, John Eveſham, and others. They departed from Plymouth on the 10th of June afore-ſaid, and took more Spaniſh prizes than they could bring home. In one of them was the governor of St. Michael's iſland; in another, which they took near the iſle of Gracioſa, was the famous Pedro de Sermiento, governor of the ſtreights of Magellan; who was the furtheſt and moſt experienced navigator in all Spain. [a] They took alſo three other veſſels, but turned two adrift, after having taken out of them what they wanted, becauſe they could not ſpare hands to man them; and after a fight for thirty-two hours with two great carracks, and the other guard-ſhips of twenty ſail more, richly laden, they gave over for want of powder, and returned ſafe to Plymouth, where they were received with triumphant joy; then proceeding to Southampton, they were met by their owner Sir Walter Ralegh; rewarded them with their ſhares, out of the merchandize, and other commodities of value, which in thoſe three prizes were thus taken from the enemy. [b] Not long after this, there was another voyage ſet out, the ſame year, by the earl of Cumberland to the South-Sea, but performed no further than the latitude of forty-four degrees to the ſouth of the equinoctial, in which as Sir Walter Ralegh was alſo an adventurer, his fine pinnace, named Dorothy, being engaged therein, and ſome ſmall prizes alſo being taken, he had, no doubt, his proportion in the profits that aroſe from them. And in a voyage to the South Sea.

BUT to return to the Virginian colony: it arrived at Plymouth on the 27th of July following. Camden has remember'd, that by this colony of Ralegh's, and in thoſe ſhips of Drake's, the famous American plant called TOBACCO was firſt brought into England, by or under governor Lane, [d] doubtleſs according to the inſtructions they had received of their proprietor; for the introduction among us of that commodity, is generally aſcrib'd to Ralegh himſelf. There are ſome pleaſant ſtories of this plant, with relation to him, which have been as carefully preſerved as the box he kept it in. [e] But the tradition of "Ralegh's ſmoking tobacco at firſt "privately in his ſtudy, and of the ſervant, who uſed to wait on him there, ſurpriſing him "one time with his tankard of ale and nutmeg as he was intent upon his book, before he had "done his pipe; and ſeeing the ſmoke reeking out of his mouth, threw all the ale in his face, "then running down ſtairs alarm'd the family with repeated exclamations, that his maſter "was on fire, and before they could get up would be burnt to aſhes:" [f] This I ſay, if true, has nothing in it of more ſurpriſing or unparallel'd ſimplicity, than there was in that poor Norwegian, who upon the firſt ſight of Roſes could not be induced to touch, tho' he ſaw them grow, being ſo amazed to behold trees budding with fire: [g] or, to come cloſer by way of retaliation, than there was in thoſe Virginians themſelves, who, the firſt time they ſeized upon a quantity of Gun-powder which belong'd to the Engliſh colony, ſow'd it for grain, or the ſeed of ſome ſtrange vegetable in the earth, with full expectation of reaping a plentiful crop of combuſtion by the next harveſt to ſcatter their enemies. [h] But paſſing over theſe tales; as Ralegh was the firſt, who brought this herb in requeſt among us, and laid the foundation for that great traffick therewith, which has been of ſuch conſiderable benefit to his country; there is no leſs honour due to him than has been conferr'd on that ambaſſador, who had before brought it out of Portugal into France; where, in mentioning the herb, they pay grateful acknowledgments to the importer, by calling it Nicotiana after his own name: nay, his politick ſoveraign Catherine de Medicis, did ſo zealouſly encourage the uſe of it, that it was alſo afterwards in honour of her called the Queen's Herb. [i] Nor was the queen of England back-a While this Sarmiento was Ralegh's priſoner in England, they were one day ſurveying a map together, concerning which, Sarmiento told him a pleaſant ſtory of the Painter's Wives Iſland; which Ralegh, afterwards, ingeniouſly apply'd; where he compares the liberties of local and hiſtorical fiction, or ſuch as geographers make, in filling up the blank ſpaces of their maps with lands of pigmeys, and rocks of load-ſtone; to thoſe of hiſtorians, in repairing the broken accounts of paſt ages: yet concludes, with an encouraging difference, againſt the ignorant deſcribers of remote places, in favour of liberal conjecture, to enlighten the obſcurities of antient times. e Being at Leeds in Yorkſhire, ſoon after Mr. Ralph Thoreſby the antiquary died, Anno 1725. I ſaw his Muſæum; and in it, among his other rarities, what himſelf has publickly call'd (in the catalogue thereof, annex'd to his antiquities of that town) Sir Walter Ralegh's tobacco box. From the beſt of my memory, I can reſemble its outward appearance to nothing more nearly than one of our modern Muff-caſes; about the ſame height and width, cover'd with red leather, and open'd at top (but with a hinge, I think) like one of thoſe. In the inſide, there was a cavity for a receiver of glaſs or metal, which might hold half a pound or a pound of tobacco; and from the edge of the receiver at top, to the edge of the box, a circular ſtay or collar, with holes in it, to plant the tobacco about, with ſix or eight pipes to ſmoke it in. This travelling box, with the MSS. Medals and other rarities in its company, deſcending to a young clergyman, the ſon of the deceaſed, was ſoon after reported to have been tranſlated to London.

ward in liſtening to, and promoting the advantages it was promis'd to produce. We may gather from ſome authors, that ſhe was very curious to know its virtues and properties; and that once converſing with Ralegh upon this ſubject, "he aſſured her majeſty he had ſo well experienced the "nature of it, that he could tell her of what weight even the ſmoke would be in any quanti- "ty propos'd to be conſum'd. Her majeſty fixing her thoughts upon the moſt impracticable part "of the experiment, that of bounding the ſmoke in a ballance, ſuſpected that he put the traveller "upon her, and would needs lay him a wager he could not ſolve the doubt: ſo he procured a "quantity agreed upon to be thoroughly ſmok'd; then went to weighing; but it was of the "aſhes; and in the concluſion, what was wanting in the prime weight of the tobacco, "her majeſty did not deny to have been evaporated in ſmoke; and further ſaid, that many "labourers in the fire ſhe had heard of who turned their gold into ſmoke, but Ralegh was the "firſt who had turned ſmoke into gold." [a] Whether thoſe two queens did ever recommend the uſe of this herb by their own example, we are not certain; but it is evident, it ſoon became of ſuch vogue in queen Elizabeth's court, that ſome of the great ladies, as well as noblemen therein, would not ſcruple to take a pipe ſometimes very ſociably; however, it was ſuch an abomination to the refined palate of her Scotch ſucceſſor, that he not only refuſed the uſe of it himſelf, but endeavoured to rob his crown of what has ſince proved one of its greateſt revenues, [b] by reſtraining his ſubjects alſo from it. Indeed it is not to be wonder'd that ſuch a philoſopher, as could magnify the power of witches, after the manner he has done in one of his learned pamphlets, [c] ſhould be ſuch a politician as to diſcourage the taking of tobacco in another. [d] But thoſe who have not admir'd at his prejudice in this attempt to diſpel the fumes of that herb with greater of his own, if I may allude to the witty title of his performance without imputation of irreverence to his memory, may yet applaud his policy, in ſo far conducing to its ſuppreſſion, as to exclude it from the body of his works, when this Royal Pamphleteer reſolved to become an author in folio. As for the uſes and virtues of this plant; ſince ſo many learned writers have given us whole books upon them, I ſhall only

[a] Apophthegms of the Engliſh nation MS. quarto, inter Collec. Rodnei Fane Armig. and James Howel in his epiſtles, vol. 3. has a whole letter upon tobacco, where he mentions alſo in effect this ſtory of Sir Walter Ralegh's wager with the queen.

[b] An author of experience has lately informed us; "That the benefit of this vegetable to Great Britain is "prodigious, if we conſider the ſhort time ſince it was "firſt introduced into England by Sir Walter Ralegh. 'Tis "now become, ſays he, the ſtaple of two of his majeſ- "ty's colonies, inhabited by half a million of people; "many of whom could hardly ſupport themſelves at "home; yet there they live in great ſplendor and eaſe; "having ſumptuous buildings, rich equipages, ſlaves and "other attendance. According to the exacteſt compu- "tation that has been made on this branch of our trade, "about 430 ſail of ſhips, with above 5000 ſeamen, have "been employ'd in one year to bring over about 75,000 "hogſheads of tobacco from Virginia and Maryland; "the freight of which, at 8 l. per ton (a medium in "times of peace) amounts to 150,000 l. ſterling; moſt "of which ſum centers among our ſelves, in the pay- "ment of ſailors and tradeſmen, who live by ſhipping; "beſides about 15 s. per hogſhead cuſtom-houſe fees, "cooperage, lighterage, wharfage, porterage, cartage, "ware-houſe rent, brokerage, and other incident charges. "'Tis further calculated, that out of the ſaid 75,000 "hogſheads imported, there are exported 46,000 hogs- "heads, containing 720 lb. per hogſhead, at four pence "per pound on board; which amounts to 552,000 l. "towards ſupporting the ballance of trade with foreign "nations." The ſame author a little further obſerves, "as another great benefit ariſing from this vegetable, "that the produce is laid out in our Britiſh manufactures, "and exported to the Britiſh colonies; which in one "year has amounted to 500,000 l. (and would be much "more, if proper encouragement were given to manu- "facture it before exportation) therefore it may be juſtly "ſaid, that tobacco is become in few years one of the "the moſt valuable branches of trade belonging to Great "Britain." Thus far Mr. John Lacy, tobacco-merchant, in his obſervations on the nature, uſe and trade of tobacco. Folio, one ſheet, printed Mar. 1. 1733. Beſides the advantage this vegetable is of to trade, a large revenue ariſes to the crown by cuſtom-duties on tobacco.—— I have ſeen ſeveral accounts of its groſs and net produce, and alſo ſeveral eſtimates of what it might further produce, if put under a new regulation; but there being ſo much difference in the ſeveral calculations, that no certain judgment can, without much ſcrutiny and diſtinction, be formed from them; it may be thought ſufficient here to obſerve, that I have ſeen an account, upon the veracity whereof I can depend, by which it appears, the money paid on this article of tobacco into his majeſty's exchequer in the year 1731, was 175,277 l. 8 s. 10 d. and that a medium for ſeven years paſt to that time was 169,079 l. 0 s. 10 d.

[c] Dæmonologie: a diſcourſe in three books, Edinb. cum privil. Reg. 4to. 1597. In the preface whereof, king James proteſts he did not publiſh this pamphlet for a "ſhew of his learning and ingine, but to preaſſe thereby, "as far as he can, to reſolve the doubting harts of ma- "ny, both that ſuch aſſaults of Sathan are moſt certain- "ly practis'd, and that the inſtrumentes thereof merits "moſt ſeverely to be puniſhed; againſt the damnable "opinions of two principally in our age; whereof the "one, called Scot an Engliſhman, is not aſhamed in pub- "lick print to deny, that there can be ſuch a thing as "witchcraft; ſo mainteines the old error of the Saddu- "cees, in denying of ſpirits: the other call'd Wierus a "German phyſician, ſets out a publick apology for all "theſe Craftes-folkes; whereby procuring for their im- "punity, he plainly bewrayes himſelf to have been one "of that profeſſion." Then his majeſty lays down the method he intends to follow, in ſpeaking firſt, of magie and negromancy; ſecondly, of ſorcery and witchcraft; laſtly, of all kinds of ſpirits and ſpectres, that appears and troubles perſons. His further affirmation of magicians raiſing ſuddenly all dainty diſhes; bringing wine out of a wall; and making men unable for women; contains not yet the moſt remarkable paſſages in this crowned author; for if you would have a maſterpiece of his royal ſcholarſhip in the myſteries of nature, turn to his chapter of the Incubi and Succubi; there you have Rex Platonicus in perfection. But as many old womens notions as there are in this tract, Sir Walter Ralegh was at the pains of finding ſomething he could approve in it, and generouſly honours its author before all others for the ſame, as may be ſeen by the very firſt quotation he makes, in the introduction to his Hiſtory of the World.

[d] Entitled the Counter-blaſt to Tobacco, 4to. without date. There is alſo extant K. James's warrant to the lord-treaſurer Dorſet, Anno 1604, for laying a good heavy impoſition upon tobacco, that leſs quantity may be brought into the realm, and only ſufficient for the better ſort, who will uſe it with moderation for their health: wherefore he authoriſes the ſaid treaſurer to order, that from the 26th of October enſuing, the proper officers ſhould take, of all who import tobacco, the ſum of ſix ſhillings and eight pence upon every pound weight, over and above the cuſtom of two pence per pound, uſually paid heretofore. Rymer's Fœdera, Tom. here here obſerve from the firſt author among us, who wrote thereof out of his own experience; immediately upon his return with the colony aforeſaid from Virginia, where he had been employ'd by Ralegh to ſurvey the country and deſcribe its products; that the ſavages diſtinguiſhed it by ſowing it apart from all other vegetables, and held it of higheſt eſtimation in all their ſacrifices by fire, water and air, either for thankſgiving to, or pacification of their gods. And as by ſucking it through pipes of clay, they purged all groſs humours from the head and ſtomach, opened all the pores and paſſages of the body, preſerving it from obſtructions, or breaking them, whereby they notably preſerved health and knew not many grievous diſeaſes wherewith we in England are often afflicted: So "we ourſelves, ſays he, during the time we were "there, uſed to ſuck it after their manner, as alſo ſince our return, and have found many "rare and wonderful experiments of its virtues, whereof the relation would require a volume "by it ſelf, the uſe of which by ſo many men and women of great calling, as well as others, "and ſome learned phyſicians alſo, is ſufficient witneſs." [a]

THE learned author of this account, Mr. Thomas Hariot, a famous mathematician, of whom ſomething more will be ſpoken hereafter, having further in the ſaid diſcourſe confuted the calumnies, which had been raiſed of this new diſcover'd country, by the idle, ignorant and avaritious part of the colony lately returned from it, and given a faithful relation of the merchantable commodities, with thoſe fit for food or building, and an account of the natures of the people, in three parts, expreſſes himſelf towards the concluſion of the whole in this manner. "Seeing the air there is ſo temperate and wholſome; the ſoil ſo fertile, and yielding "ſuch commodities, as I have before-mentioned; the voyage alſo to and fro ſufficiently ex-"perienced to be performed twice a year with eaſe, and at any ſeaſon; and the dealings of "Sir Walter Ralegh ſo liberal in large giving and granting lands there, as is already known, "with many helps and furtherances elſe; the leaſt that he hath granted, having been five hun-"dred acres to a man only for the adventure of his perſon: I hope there remains no cauſe "whereby the action ſhould be miſliked." [b] His encouragement to planters.

THERE are many other publick teſtimonies in recommendation of this enterpriſe, eſpecially of Ralegh's diſcreet orders or inſtructions to theſe firſt undertakers, as well as ſome complaints that his ſaid directions were not always punctually followed; and I remember to have met with a ſcarce old tract in the Lambeth library, written by a learned and ingenious author of thoſe times, wherein, according to his brief and volatile way, ſkimming over the characters of many eminent contemporaries, he mentions Sir Walter Ralegh's political government of Virginia. [c] But where to come at thoſe particular laws or inſtructions now, I know not, tho' they ſeem to have been in the poſſeſſion of Sir Francis Walſingham (a great encourager of theſe plantations.) For I find a bundle entitled, matters relating to Sir Walter Ralegh's voyages, mentioned in the inventory of that ſecretary's ſtate-papers relating to the navy, about this time. [d] But the author, who this year dedicates his Iriſh hiſtory to Ralegh, has in general terms, both largely commended his proceedings in that diſcovery, and inform'd us of others, who have done the like. For having mentioned the ill ſucceſs wherewith his firſt maritime adventures were attended, as a matter ſufficient to have diſmay'd a man of common reſolution from the like attempts for the future; he adds: "Yet you, more reſpecting the good ends whereunto "you levelled your line for the good of your country, did not give over till you had re-"covered a land, and had made a plantation of the people of your own Engliſh nation in "Virginia, the firſt Engliſh colony that was ever planted there; not a little to the deroga-"tion of the Spaniards glory and impeachment to their vaunts, who, becauſe, with all cruel "immanity, they ſubdued a naked and yielding people, whom they ſought for gain, and not "for religion or the plantation of a common-wealth, over whom, to ſatisfy their inſatiable "covetouſneſs, they did moſt cruelly tyrannize, and againſt the courſe of all human nature ſcorch "and roaſt them to death, as by their own hiſtories doth appear. Theſe, I ſay, do brag and "vaunt, that they only have drawn ſtrange nations and unknown people to the obedience of "their kings, to the knowledge of Chriſtianity, and to the inriching of their country; and "thereby claim the honour to themſelves alone. But if theſe your actions were well looked "into and with due conſideration, it ſhall be found much more honourable in ſundry reſpects "for the advancement of the name of God, the honour of the prince, and the benefit of the "common-wealth. For what can be more pleaſant to God, than to gain and reduce, in all "chriſtian-like manner, a loſt people to the knowledge of the goſpel and a true chriſtian

" you do deſerve every way, in following ſo honourable a courſe, not we our ſelves only can
" witneſs, but ſtrange nations alſo do honour you for the ſame; as doth appear by the epiſtle
" of Baſſimerus of France to the hiſtory of Florida, and by Julius Cæſar a citizen of Rome,
" in his epiſtle to his book, intitled Columbeados." [a] To this we may here add the teſtimony of Camden; who, ſpeaking of this undertaking of Virginia, at the return of the laſt colony ſent thither by Sir W. Ralegh, ſays, He was a man never to be ſufficiently commended for the great pains he took in diſcovering remote countries, and advancing the glory of the Engliſh navigation. [b]

THAT Baſſimerus, as Hooker calls him, was the learned Martine Baſſaniere of Paris, as I find elſewhere, with whom Richard Hakluyt, the worthy collector of our naval adventures, being acquainted, and having procured a very valuable hiſtory in manuſcript of the firſt diſcovery of Florida about twenty years before this time, by Rene Laudonniere and three other French captains, he ſent it over to that Monſieur Baſſaniere, who publiſhed it from the ſaid French copy, this year [c] at Paris, and dedicated it as aforeſaid to Sir Walter Ralegh, who, as appears above, is therein celebrated, for I have not yet ſeen, tho' I have been promiſed, that original French edition. But it was tranſlated into Engliſh the year following by Richard Hakluyt himſelf, who alſo dedicates it anew to the ſame patron: and indeed we find Ralegh from this time a very conſiderable patron of learned and ingenious authors, not only in hiſtory and geography, but antiquities, chymiſtry, poetry, and other polite branches of art and ſcience; ſome further inſtances whereof will occaſionally ariſe as we proceed. And even here we may mention ſomething of his encouragement in painting; for admiral Coligny having ſent over with the aforeſaid diſcoverers of Florida, a very skilful artiſt from France, to take draughts of whatever he found obſervable and worthy of repreſentation in the ſaid country; which he did, not only among the animal and vegetable rarities thereof, but alſo, it ſeems, from the cuſtoms of the natives and hiſtorical events among the diſcoverers themſelves: this painter living afterwards in London, at, or before the publication of thoſe dicoveries; was ſupported by Ralegh in the great expence of publiſhing alſo his draughts and deſcriptions. For Hakluyt, among other reaſons for not particularizing the commodities of thoſe parts; the accidents of the Frenchmen's government therein; the cauſes of their good and bad ſucceſs; with the ſurpriſes made by their enemies, tells Ralegh he does not reckon them up again; " the rather, becauſe the ſame,
" with divers other things of chiefeſt importance, are lively drawn in colours at your no ſmall
" charges, by the skilful painter James Morgues ſometime living in Black-Fryars, London, " whom Monſieur Chaſtillion, then admiral of France, ſent thither (to Florida) with Laudo-
" niere for that purpoſe, which (painter) was an eye-witneſs of the goodneſs and fertility of " thoſe regions, and hath put down in writing many ſingularities, which are not mentioned in
" this treatiſe; and which he hath ſince publiſhed together with the portraitures." [d] Hereunto we may further add, that there was about this time alſo another book dedicated to Ralegh, in praiſe of muſick, wherein, beſides the antiquity and dignity thereof, is declared the ſober and lawful uſe of the ſame in the congregation and church of God. [e] It was written by an Oxonian then lately deceaſed, who is not named, and publiſhed by the univerſity printer, who ſubſcribing his own name Joſeph Barnes to the ſaid dedication, has made it paſs among our auctioneers, and other ſuperficial inſpectors, for a treatiſe of the ſaid printer's writing. I apprehend, there was a greater propriety in the publiſher's choice of this patron to that work, than is now commonly known; for I have ſomewhere met with hints, that Sir Walter Ralegh was a great proficient in muſick, either vocal, inſtrumental, or both; whence we might be

Yet in the preface to his ſecond volume printed fol. 1599, he ſays 'twas in the year 1587, that he cauſed that hiſtory of Florida to be publiſhed in France; which muſt be a miſtake, becauſe Hooker mentions its being publiſhed in his dedication dated the year before.

ſomewhat

ſomewhat induced to conſtrue ſome lines of Spenſer's concerning him, hereafter quoted, in the literal ſenſe.

Nor among learned and ingenious men only was Ralegh now in great eſteem; but he flouriſhed at this time alſo highly in the queen's favour, as Camden, where he ſpeaks of the foregoing colony, has informed us. And about this time it was, her majeſty conferred upon him ſome preferments; but of honour more than profit perhaps to him: for Hooker in the dedication aforeſaid of his Iriſh hiſtory, dated the 12th of October this year, ſuperſcribes it to the right worthy and honourable gentleman, Sir Walter Ralegh, Knt. Seneſchal[a] of the dutchies of Cornwall and Exeter, and lord-warden of the ſtannaries[b] in Devon and Cornwall. To theſe dignities I preſume he was then but newly advanced, becauſe the ſaid hiſtorian in the body of the dedication begs leave to remember "how it hath pleaſed God to bring you, ſays he, into "the favour of your prince and ſoveraign; who, beſides her great favour towards you many "ways, hath alſo laid upon you the charge of a government in your own country; where "you are to command many people by your honourable office of the ſtannary, and where "you are both a judge and a chancellor to rule in juſtice and to judge in equity. — Be "therefore careful to be reported well of for your upright dealings both herein and in all your "other actions. Be a patron of virtue and an example of true nobility, which hath her "foundation upon virtue; for, as the poet ſaith, Ex virtute nobilitas naſcitur, non ex nobilitate "virtus: virtus ſola nobilitat, non caro nec ſanguis. — Your anceſtors were men of great no- "bility; beneficial to their princes and country many ways: and, as in nature you are deſ- "cended from them; ſo it hath pleaſed God to bleſs you with knowledge in learning, with "ſkill of warlike ſervice, and experience in maritimal cauſes; and beſides hath placed you "among the nobles, and in the good grace and favour of your prince."

Made Seneſchal of Cornwall and Exeter, and Lord-warden of the ſtannaries.

How Ralegh uſed this favour, and what uſage it alſo procured him, the ſame dedication does ſomewhat further reveal in theſe words. "It is well known, that it had been no leſs "eaſy for you, than for ſuch as have been advanced by kings, to have builded great houſes, "purchaſed large circuits, and to have uſed the fruits of princes favours, as moſt men in all "former and preſent ages have done; had you not preferred the general honour and com- "modity of your prince and country before all that is private: whereby you have been rather "a ſervant than a commander to your own fortune. And no doubt, the cauſe being ſo good, "and the attempt ſo honourable, but that God will increaſe your talent and bleſs your do- "ings, and every good man will commend and further the ſame. And albeit the more no- "ble enterpriſes a man ſhall take in hand, the more adverſaries he ſhall have to deprave and "hinder the ſame; yet I am perſuaded, as no good man ſhall have juſt cauſe, ſo there is none "ſo much carried with a corrupt mind, nor ſo envious of his country's honour, nor ſo bent "againſt you, that he will derogate the praiſe and honour due to ſo worthy an enterpriſe. "And that ſo much the ſooner, becauſe you have endured ſo many croſſes, and have, through "ſo many envyings and misfortunes, perſevered in your attempts; which no doubt ſhall, at "laſt, by you be performed, when it ſhall pleaſe him, who hath made you an inſtrument of "ſo worthy a work."[c]

Envy'd.

Thus Hooker hints at the cauſe of theſe envyings; but from whom they ſhould proceed it does not manifeſtly appear. The earl of Eſſex had now been near a twelve-month abroad, under his father-in-law, Leiceſter, governor of the Netherlands; was but nineteen years of age when he went over, being his firſt engagement in any publick action, yet no leſs than a general of the horſe; and before that, as himſelf ſays, "he had ſmall grace, and few friends "at court."[d] So that it muſt be now after their return,[e] that Leiceſter ſet him up a competitor

But Leiceſter, as great as his power was, could no more bridle the licentious reflections of the populace than Ralegh; an inſtance whereof we have from ſome antient authority it ſeems, tho' in a modern author, who ſpeaking of "Tarleton, the beſt comedian of theſe times in England, tells us, "that when a pleaſant play he had made was acting before her majeſty, he pointed at Sir
Slander'd. "Walter Ralegh, and ſaid, See the knave commands the queen; for which ſhe corrected him "with a frown: yet he had the confidence to add, that he was of too much and too intolerable "a power; and going on with the ſame liberty, he reflected on the over-great power and "riches of the earl of Leiceſter; which was ſo univerſally applauded by all who were pre-"ſent, that ſhe thought fit at that time to bear theſe reflections with a ſeeming unconcerned-"neſs; but yet was ſo offended, that ſhe forbad Tarleton and all her jeſters from coming "near her table, being inwardly diſpleaſed with this impudent and unreaſonable liberty." [a] Ralegh ſeems to have little regarded theſe aſperſions, but conſtantly attended his publick charge and employments, whether in town or country as occaſion called him. Accordingly we find
In parliament. him the latter end of this year in parliament, where, among other weighty concerns, the fate of Mary queen of Scots was determined. There is nothing particular upon record in the journals of the houſe of commons of Ralegh's opinion in this matter, nor indeed any debates upon the ſentence that had been pronounced againſt that queen. For on the 12th of November, a petition agreed upon in both houſes was preſented to queen Elizabeth, by the ſpeaker Puckering, the privy-council, and a body of the commons, joyned with the lord-chancellor Bromley and twenty other temporal lords, for the ſpeedy execution of the ſaid queen of Scots, in conſideration of the treaſonable and rebellious practices wherewith ſhe had been proved to endanger this realm and its ruler. The ſaid petition was immediately printed, [b] and that queen in leſs than three months after executed. [c] The clerk of the parliament's place being ſupplied at this time by a kinſman, inexpert in the rules and methods of the houſe; we find nothing more recorded of Ralegh this ſeſſions, which was diſſolved on the 23d of
In a committee for the regulation of the clergy. March, than that he was appointed one of the committee to confer upon the amendment of ſome things, whereunto the clergy were required to be ſworn, and that ſome good courſe might be taken to have a learned miniſtry; for the queen had in her ſpeech at the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſions told the biſhops of ſome faults and negligences, "which if you, my lords of the clergy, ſaid ſhe, do not amend, I mean to depoſe you." [d]

Now Ralegh, reſolving to perſevere in planting his country of Virginia, prepared a new colony of one hundred and fifty men to be ſent thither, under the charge of Mr. John White, whom he appointed governor, and with him twelve aſſiſtants, to whom he gave a charter, and incorporated them by the name of the governor and aſſiſtants of the city of Ralegh in Virginia.
The fourth voyage to Virginia. Their fleet, conſiſting of three ſail, departed from Portſmouth on the 26th of April, 1587, and in leſs than three months following arrived ſafe at Hatorask, from whence they went to the iſle of Roanoak to look for the fifteen men left there by Sir Richard Grenvill the year before, meaning from thence to paſs to the bay of Cheſepiock, where they intended to make their ſeat and fort, according to the charge given them, among other directions, under the hand of Sir Walter Ralegh. But they ſought their companions in vain, and when they came to the north-part of the iſland where governor Lane had built his fort, they found it razed, and the ground-rooms of the dwelling-houſes, which had been alſo erected about it, inhabited by deer, and over-grown with melons, or ſuch like ſort of fruit, which thoſe animals brooz'd upon. At Croatoan they were very well received and entertained by the natives, thro' the means of Manteo their country-man. Of theſe they learnt, that the Engliſhmen they were ſeeking, had been treacherouſly ſet upon by a party of the ſavages, who wounded ſome of ing a medal, repreſenting his own head on one ſide, and ſeven unguarded ſtraggling ſheep on the other. The author of a brief diſcourſe of Dr. Allen's ſeditious drifts, &c. 4to. 1588. p. 46. endeavours to clear the earl's conduct in that government againſt the ſaid doctor; as E. Cliffe, in his breviate of Holland's deliverance and ingratitude to to the crown of England and the houſe of Naſſau, 4to. 1665. p. 55. does againſt Vander Sande and Hugo Grotius; eſpecially the latter, who inſinuates, as if the earl, who died within two years following, was poiſoned by his wife, becauſe ſhe ſoon after married again. I have read, this earl's effects were then ſeized upon by the crown for debt, and heard that an inventory of them is in the poſſeſſion of Sir John Evelyn, Bart.

them, and drove the reſt to ſome remote and obſcure parts of the country. On the thirteenth of Auguſt, their friend Manteo was, according to the commands they had received of Sir Walter Ralegh, chriſtned in Roanoak, and called lord thereof, and of Daſamonguepeuk, in reward of his faithful ſervices. Three days after, the governor's daughter Eleanor, wife of Ananias Dare, one of the aſſiſtants, was delivered of a daughter in Roanoak, and the infant was chriſtned there the Sunday following, who, becauſe ſhe was the firſt Creolian or Chriſtian born in that country, was baptized by the name of Virginia. Now having re-eſtabliſhed their intereſt and alliance with the natives, as far as this ſhort interview would permit, and delivered their ſhips of the proviſions for the colony, the planters began to conſider, they ſhould be in want of freſh ſupplies; therefore upon ſome difference about chooſing a factor to return for that purpoſe into England, they unanimouſly petitioned the governor to return himſelf, to which he at laſt conſented, and the ſhips with ſome few of the company arrived in England, not without ſtorms, ſickneſs, and the death of ſeveral of them by other like caſualties, about the latter end of the ſame year. [a]

Captain of the queen's guard and lieutenant-general of Cornwall.

It was but five days after the going forth of this ſecond colony, that Mr. Richard Hakluyt dedicated his tranſlation of the voyages to Florida, before-mentioned, to the right honourable Sir Walter Ralegh, as he ſtiles him, captain of her majeſty's guard, lord-warden of the ſtannaries, and her highneſs's lieutenant-general of the county of Cornwall. In this dedication it will ſomewhat appear, that neither the returns, which might have been made by any merchantable products in Virginia, nor the profits ariſing to him from any Spaniſh prizes, which had been taken at ſea, were equivalent to the great expences he had been at, in ſettling this plantation; and further, that he had received no particular or private aſſiſtance in this enterpriſe from the queen, becauſe his hopes therein, and her majeſty's regard thereof, are ſo handſomely excited by the ſaid author: but take his own words. "Theſe four voyages "(ſays he) I knew not to whom I might better offer than to your ſelf, for divers juſt conſi- "derations: firſt, for that they were dedicated to you in French: ſecondly, becauſe now "four times alſo you have attempted the like upon the ſelf-ſame coaſt near adjoining: "thirdly, in that you have pierced as far up into the main, and diſcovered no leſs ſecrets "in the parts of your abode, than the French did in the places of their inhabiting: laſtly, "conſidering you are now alſo ready (upon the late return of captain Stafford, and good "news which he brought you of the ſafe arrival of your laſt colony in their wiſhed haven) "to proſecute this action more throughly than ever. And here to ſpeak ſomewhat of this "your enterprize, I affirm, that if the ſame may ſpeedily and effectually be purſued, it will "prove far more beneficial in divers reſpects to this our realm, than the world, yea many "of the wiſer ſort have, hitherto imagined. The particular commodities thereof are well "known to your ſelf and ſome few others, and are faithfully and with great judgment com- "mitted to writing, as you are not ignorant, by one of your followers, who remained there "about a twelve-month with your worſhipful lieutenant Mr. Ralph Lane, in the diligent "ſearch of the ſecrets of thoſe countries. Touching the ſpeedy and effectual purſuing of "your action, tho' I wote well it would demand a prince's purſe to have it throughly fol- "lowed without lingering: yet I am of opinion, that you ſhall draw the ſame, before it be "long, to be profitable and gainful, as well to thoſe of our nation there remaining, as to the "merchants of England, that ſhall trade hereafter thither; partly by certain ſecret commodi- "ties already diſcovered by your ſervants, and partly by breeding of divers ſorts of beaſts in "thoſe large and ample regions, and planting ſuch things in that warm climate as will beſt "proſper there, and our realm ſtandeth moſt in need of: and this I find to have been the "courſe which both the Spaniards and Portugals took, in the beginnings of their diſcoveries "and conqueſts. [b] And, if our men will follow their ſteps by your wiſe directions, I doubt "not, but in due time they ſhall reap no leſs benefit. Moreover, there is no other likeli-

[a] See the fourth voyage to Virginia in 1587. which tranſported the ſecond colony; in Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 208, and, at the end of the ſaid voyage, fol. 287, a liſt of the men, women and children in the ſaid colony, who remain'd in Virginia this year. Among whom governor White, and the pilot Simon Ferdinando are mentioned, but erroniouſly; for it appears in the narrative of that voyage, they both returned.

[b] Here this author illuſtrates his addreſs by theſe examples; "The Spaniards at their firſt entrance (ſays he) "into Hiſpaniola, found neither ſugar-canes nor ginger "growing there, nor any kind of our cattle; but finding "the place fit for paſture, they ſent kine and bulls, and "ſundry other profitable beaſts thither, and tranſported "the plants of ſugar-canes, and ſet the roots of ginger; "the hides of which oxen, with the ſugar and ginger, "are now the chief merchandize of that iſland. The "Portugals alſo at their firſt footing in Madera, as John "Barras writes in his firſt Decade, found nothing there "but mighty woods for timber, whereupon they called "the iſland by that name: howbeit, the clime being fa- "vourable, they inriched it by their own induſtry, with "the beſt wines and ſugars in the world. The like "manner of proceeding they uſed in the iſles of the "Azores, by ſowing therein great quantity of woad. "So they dealt in St. Thomas under the Equinoctial; and "in Braſile, and in ſundry other places.

" hood, but that her majeſty, who hath chriſtned and given the name to your Virginia, if " need require, will deal after the manner of honourable god-mothers, which ſeeing their " goſſips not fully able to bring up their children themſelves, are wont to contribute to their " honeſt education, the rather if they find any towardlineſs or reaſonable hopes of goodneſs in " them.

" AND if Elizabeth, queen of Caſtile and Aragon, after her husband Ferdinando and " ſhe had emptied their coffers in ſubduing the kingdom of Granada, was nevertheleſs ſo " zealous of God's honour, that ſhe laid part of her own jewels, which ſhe had in great ac- " count, to gage, to furniſh Columbus forth upon his firſt voyage, before a foot of land in all " the Weſt-Indies was diſcovered; what may we expect of our moſt magnificent and gra- " cious prince Elizabeth of England, into whoſe lap the Lord has ſo plentifully thrown his " treaſures? What may we, I ſay, hope of her forwardneſs and bounty, in advancing this " your moſt honourable enterpriſe, being far more certain than that of Columbus, at that time " eſpecially, and tending no leſs to the glory of God than that of the Spaniards?" Then a little further: " Sundry men entering into theſe diſcoveries, propoſe unto themſelves " ſeveral ends; ſome ſeek authority and places of command; others experience by ſeeing of " the world; the moſt part, worldly and tranſitory gain, and that oftentimes by diſhoneſt " and unlawful means; the feweſt number, the glory of God, and the ſaving of the ſouls of " the poor and blinded infidels: yet becauſe divers honeſt and well-diſpoſed perſons are en- " tered already into this your buſineſs, and that I know you mean hereafter to ſend ſome " ſuch good church-men thither, as may truly ſay, with the apoſtle, to the ſavages, we ſeek " not yours, but you, I conceive great comfort of the ſucceſs of this your action; hoping, " that the Lord, whoſe power is wont to be perfected in weakneſs, will bleſs the feeble foun- " dations of your building: only be you of a valiant courage, and faint not, as the Lord " ſaid to Joſhua, exhorting him to proceed in the conqueſt of the land of promiſe; and re- " member, that private men have happily weilded and waded through as great enterpriſes as " this, with leſſer means than thoſe, which God in his mercy hath bountifully beſtowed up- " on you, to the ſingular good, as I aſſure my ſelf, of this our common-wealth, wherein " you live: hereof there are examples domeſtical and foreign. [a] — But if the greatneſs of " the main of Virginia, eſpecially to the weſt, ſhould make you think the ſubduing of it a " matter of more difficulty than the conqueſt of Ireland (by Strongbow;) firſt, I anſwer, that " as the late experience of that skilful pilot, captain John Davis, to the north-weſt, towards " which his diſcovery your ſelf has thrice contributed with the forwardeſt, hath ſhewed a " great part to be main-ſea, where before it was thought main-land. So for my part, I am " fully perſuaded by Ortelius his late reformation of Calvacan and the gulph of California, " that the land on the back-part of Virginia, extends nothing ſo far weſt-ward as is put down " in the maps of thoſe parts. Moreover, it is not to be deny'd, that one hundred men will " do more now among the naked and unarmed people in Virginia than one thouſand were " able then to do in Ireland, againſt that armed and warlike nation in thoſe days. I ſay fur- " ther, that theſe two laſt years experience hath plainly ſhewed, that we may ſpare ten thou- " ſand able men, without any miſs. — Seeing therefore we are ſo far from want of people, " that retiring daily home out of the Low-countries, they go idle up and down in ſwarms " for lack of honeſt entertainments; I ſee no fitter place to employ ſome part of the better " ſort, than in the inward parts of Virginia, againſt ſuch ſtubborn ſavages as ſhall re- " fuſe obedience to her majeſty. And doubtleſs many of our men will be glad and fain to " accept this condition, when by reading this preſent treatiſe, they ſhall underſtand the fertili- " ty and riches of the regions confining ſo near upon yours, the great commodities and " goodneſs whereof you have been contented to ſuffer to come to light. In the mean ſeaſon, " I humbly commend my ſelf and this my tranſlation to you; and your ſelf, with all thoſe " who have undertaken this enterpriſe in hand, to the grace and good bleſſing of the Al- " mighty; which is able to build further, and finiſh the good work, which in theſe our days " he hath begun by your moſt chriſtian and charitable endeavour." Such were the praiſes of this diſcovery, and exhortations to proceed in it, that were publickly paid to Sir Walter Ralegh

[a] As the ſame author had before incited queen Elizabeth, to ſupport this chargeable enterpriſe, by example; ſo here he encourages Sir Walter Ralegh to proceed in it by the like means, in theſe words, " Remember, I pray " you, what you find in the beginning of the chronicle " of Ireland, newly dedicated unto your ſelf. Read " you not, that Richard Strongbow, the decayed earl of " Chepſtow, paſſed over thither in the year 1171; and, " accompanied only with certain private friends, had in " ſhort ſpace ſuch proſperous ſucceſs, that he opened the " way for king Henry II. to the ſpeedy ſubjection of all " that warlike nation to this crown of England? The " like conqueſt of Braſilia, and the annexing thereof to " the kingdom of Portugal, was firſt begun by mean " and private men; as Don Antonio de Caſtillio, ambaſſa- " dor here for that realm, and by office, keeper of all " the records and monuments of their diſcoveries, aſ- " ſured me in this city, Anno 1581." Theſe examples, as not directly neceſſary to the hiſtory of my ſubject, are thus ſubjoin'd, becauſe they illuſtrate the arguments of my author.

at this his ſetting out the fourth voyage to Virginia, by thoſe who wiſh'd it might contribute no leſs to the improvement of his fortune, than it did to the advancement of his glory.

But the ſhips, in which this ſecond colony was tranſported, had not been many days returned into England, before we find Ralegh's thoughts diverted, for a while, from planting in a foreign country, and engaged upon ſchemes of diſplanting rather thoſe powerful enemies who were preparing to root themſelves in his own. For the rumour grew ſtronger every day of ſuch a mighty fleet threatning us, as if all Spain and Rome were to land upon our little iſland, and over-run the whole kingdom. The queen and her privy-council therefore no longer delay'd all proper means for the defence of the realm; but out of all her commanders by land and ſea appointed thoſe of moſt approved abilities in naval and military affairs, as well as of the greateſt authority in their reſpective counties, to hold conſultations for the ſecurity of her perſon, her people, and their poſſeſſions. And as there were ſuch conſultations diſtinctly held by the moſt ancient and experienc'd commanders at ſea; ſo we find by the like appointment a council of war alſo held on the 27th of November this year by others of higheſt repute for their knowledge how to put the forces of the realm in the beſt order, to withſtand any invaſion by land. For this purpoſe were choſen the lord Grey[a], Sir Francis Knolles[b], Sir Thomas Leighton[c], Sir Walter Ralegh,[d] for I recite, as I find them written, Sir John Norris[e], Sir Richard Grenvill[f], Sir Richard Bingham[g], Sir Roger Williams[h], and Ralph Lane Eſq;[i] Of their determinations in this important council I ſhall here preſent an abſtract, from a manuſcript drawn up perhaps by Sir Walter Ralegh himſelf; the ſaid draught being annex'd to another manuſcript now before me, which was apparently of his compoſing.[k] In the national Council of war.

They firſt number'd up the places moſt ſuſpected for the army from Spain, and alſo thoſe moſt convenient for that in Flanders, to land at: then concluded how many of thoſe places were to be put in defence to hinder their landing. And firſt they took notice of Milford; which tho' they did not ſuſpect would be preferr'd for the barrenneſs of the country, yet in regard to the goodneſs of the haven, they thought it convenient there ſhould be a trained number of two thouſand foot and five hundred horſe in readineſs; and that in want of horſe-men, the gentlemen and their ſervants were to ſupply the deficiency. But Plymouth they thought the moſt likely place; becauſe it was improbable the king of Spain would venture his fleet too far within the ſleeve, before he had maſter'd ſome good harbour; of which Plymouth is neareſt to Spain, ſooneſt fortified, and moſt convenient to be ſuccour'd either from Spain or France. Portland they alſo thought a tempting place, having a large harbour and good landing. The Iſle of Wight they conſider'd as a ſtrong retreat, if won, and the country adjoining champion; where the enemy might march his whole army. And why they thought the Downs, Margate, and the Thames, fit landing-places, was in regard to the eaſineſs of landing; and being neareſt the prince of Parma, in whoſe forces the king of Spain repoſed ſpecial truſt. Then they conſulted whether theſe places were to be ſtrengthned by fortification, or aſſembly of the people, or both; and concluded, that for Plymouth, there ſhould be both; and that the five thouſand trained men in Devon and Cornwal, beſides the Stannaries, were to be aſſembled for Plymouth, ſtanding equal to both counties: of this number, inſtead of muſter-days, chargeable and of little effect, two thouſand ſhould be aſſembled in Plymouth, under the general to be appointed over the weſtern army, that they might know their leaders, be acquainted with watch and ward, and ſo inſtructed, that on a ſudden there might be no confuſion; and this to be half at the charge of her majeſty, and half on the country, if the country charge ſurmounted not the ordinary trainings. Portland alſo was to be arm'd both by fortification and aſſembly; for the

[a] Late deputy of Ireland, and now lord-lieutenant of the county of Bucks, knight of the garter, and an excellent ſoldier, ſays Camden; at leaſt cool in council, tho' hot in action.

[b] Knight of the garter, treaſurer of the queen's houſehold, and privy-counſellor, a prudent and learned man, trained in military affairs; and perhaps now governor of the Iſle of Wight, whereof he writ a General Survey, tho' it was never printed.

[c] Governor of the Iſle of Guernſey, well vers'd in matters of ſtate, as well as the army; ſent into France afterwards in 1591, of ſpecial truſt, to adviſe the earl of Eſſex in his actions there; and author of Les Loix, couſtumes, & uſages de l'Iſle de Guernſey, differentes du couſtumier de Normandie, d'antienneté obſervées en ladite Iſle. A fair written copy whereof, in eight ſheets Folio, is in the Harleyan library.

[d] Lieutenant-general of Cornwal, &c. as before.

[e] Train'd in the wars of France, general in Friſland, and the Low-countries, now preſident of Munſter in Ireland, and the year following lord-marſhal of the field in England.

[f] Vice-admiral, I think, in the weſt, before-mention'd; and of whoſe valour we ſhall hear more hereafter.

[g] A Dorſetſhire man, famous in the wars of France, Scotland, and the Iſle of Candie; late preſident of Connaugh, and a brave commander in the wars of Ireland, where he afterwards died governor of Leinſter.

[h] A valiant and experienc'd commander in the French and Belgick wars, of whom further mention will be made in the courſe of this hiſtory.

[i] Late governor of Virginia, as before obſerv'd; afterwards knighted, and preferr'd to ſome conſiderable poſt in the navy or the treaſury; a man able either to give counſel in warlike affairs, or put it in execution; was author, beſides his diſcourſes on Virginia, of ſeveral military memorials in letters to the lord-treaſurer and others; particularly one, on the uſe to be made of Don Antonio againſt Spain; another, about encamping of ſoldiers, and inconvenience of quartering them in towns, &c.

[k] Entitled, A Diſcourſe on the preſent Conſultation, touching the peace with Spain, and retaining of the Netherlands in ſociety and protection. Which manuſcript will be further ſpoken of in a more convenient part of this work.

two thouſand ſeven hundred trained men in Dorſetſhire and Wiltſhire were to be aſſembled for that place; and two thouſand of them to be exerciſed as before, in ſome part of Wiltſhire, appointed for the Iſle of Wight, to take Somerſetſhire in, which are two thouſand foot. At Sandwich and the Downs by aſſembly. In Kent and Suſſex, the four thouſand five hundred trained men to be aſſembled for defence there; and two thouſand of them to be exerciſed at Sandwich, as before. The like order to be taken for Norfolk and Suffolk. Their further meaning was, that theſe garriſons ſhould remain but for twenty days, to be throughly train'd, and acquainted with encamping. Then every ſuch two thouſand men in garriſon thus diſciplin'd, ſhould give example to a great army of raw men, ſo prevent confuſion on a ſudden. Further, that twenty captains ſhould be appointed to every ſuch two thouſand men; which captains having each of them a hundred trained men, ſhould receive under them when the army aſſembled a hundred more; ſo as in effect there would be four thouſand men in order, and under martial diſcipline. Half theſe captains were to be choſen by the general of the army, the reſt to be from the principal gentry of the country; under whom were ſoldiers to be appointed for their lieutenants. And the ſame order to be obſerv'd in all other places of garriſon. Then they conſider'd on the courſe to be taken for fighting the enemy, if by force he ſhould land; and this they agreed muſt be left to the diſcretion of the general; only adviſed, if they could not prevent his landing and marching forward, that the country be driven, ſo as no victuals remain to the invaders, and that they be kept waking with perpetual alarms; but in no wiſe to venture battle, till divers lieutenants were aſſembled to make a ſtrong army, as before ſpecified; except upon ſpecial advantages. Further, that in thoſe provinces where there are many lieutenants, ſome one to be appointed chief leader, that there be no ſtraining of courteſy among one another, and giving thereby advantage to the enemy; but that every lieutenant's authority ſhall only extend to the command of his own company, as colonel of that regiment, and be commanded by the lieutenants-general: as in Devon and Cornwal, there being ten lieutenants; whereby it ſhall be known who ſhall command in either, as need ſhall require. Next they conſider'd what proportion of men muſt be prepared for this end. Here ſuppoſing the enemy landed at Plymouth, they computed that the ſix thouſand armed and furniſhed in Devon and Cornwal, with the aſſiſtance of thoſe in Wiltſhire, Dorſet and Somerſetſhire, would make a ſufficient army, ſtrengthened with the gentlemen, their retinue, and others of the neighbouring counties, to be incorporated, tho' not ſo compleatly armed: and if by reſiſtance, or contrary weather, the enemy paſs over Plymouth, and land at Portland; then the army of the weſt ſhall repair to them. If the invaſion happen upon Kent, or other part to the weſt of the Thames, then the midland-ſhires directed to aſſiſt the weſt, may turn to the eaſt along the coaſt. If the army in Flanders land to the eaſt of the Thames, the ſame order to be taken with Suffolk, Norfolk, Suſſex, and the city of London. And becauſe ſpecial regard was to be had to her majeſty's perſon, an army ſhould be provided, and commanded under counties reſerved for that end, to join the forces of London and others, to be armed out of her majeſty's ſtores. Further, for the increaſe of footmen wanting armour, among one fourth of the able unarmed men, eighty ſhould be pikes, and twenty bill-men, and thoſe weapons ſpeedily to be provided, they being furniſhed by the realm. And for the increaſe of pike-men in this ſcarcity of armour, that the bill-men be converted into pike-men, and that able bill-men unarm'd ſhould be levied in their places; becauſe the ranks of bill-men in order to battle are always environ'd with pike-men; for the bill-men ſerve ſpecially for execution, if the enemy be overthrown: only a few armed bill-men or halberdiers reſerved to guard the ranks wherein the enſigns, drums, &c. are plac'd. And becauſe, on a ſudden invaſion, 'twill be too late to provide neceſſaries; ſtore of ordinance, munition, and all other furniture, to be forthwith provided and ſent to the foreſaid garriſons. Alſo that horſe as well as foot be exerciſed in thoſe general aſſemblies; and that at Plymouth, Portſmouth, Sandwich, or other places thought fit to have the like training, the horſe-men of the next counties be alſo brought together; as at Plymouth, thoſe of Devon, Cornwal, and Somerſetſhire; at Portland, thoſe of Dorſet, Wilts, Hampſhire, and Berkſhire; and at Sandwich, thoſe of Kent, Suſſex, and Surrey. And becauſe in theſe places for training the infantry, there may want forage and conveniences for horſe-men, the lieutenants may chuſe the fitteſt for the cavalry as near the foot as they can. But as they cannot reſiſt the landing in Scotland, they propos'd ſix thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, whereof one thouſand to be lances, for that ſide. And if theſe ſhall be thought too weak for the army in Flanders when it lands there, a good part of the army appointed to guard her majeſty may be detach'd to join the army in the north, and the army of the weſt march up to ſupply their charge. They alſo conſider'd the king of Spain's hopes in the papiſts and malecontents; and that if thoſe ſmall regiments were not in readineſs, 'twould be too late to aſſemble, both for reſiſting a foreign enemy and withſtanding theſe at home in one day; for every man would reſt in fear of having his own houſe fir'd, and his family deſtroy'd; therefore, if they made any ſtir, ſevere execution upon ſuch offenders ſhould be uſed by martial law. Further, that it ſhould be bruited in Spain, a vaſt army of double or treble the number was ready in the weſt, and other coaſts of England, to embark for Portugal or the Indies; the ſame opinion being fortify'd by the preparation of ſo many ſhips making ready in thoſe parts by Sir Francis Drake. They alſo thought, that throughout all the counties of England the proportion among the armed and trained as well as unarmed pikes and bills, ſhould be eighty pikes and twenty bills in every hundred. And laſtly, caution'd the lords of the council to be wary of her majeſty's ſhips lying at Rocheſter.

BESIDES this grand ſcheme for the ſafeguard of the kingdom in general, Ralegh ſeems to have had ſome ſpecial regard to ſeveral particular places. For there has been found among the lord Burghley's papers, a remembrance for the lord-treaſurer, touching the requeſt of Sir W. R. dated it ſeems this year: which makes requeſt for five pieces of braſs cannon lying at Woolwich; alſo for letters to the marquis of Wincheſter, lieutenant of Dorſetſhire, for a hundred men and arms to defend the caſtle and iſland of Portland, with a ſupply of powder, there being but one laſt. Further, for removal of the unſerviceable ordnance there to London; and that the lord marquis would give order for his ſaid hundred men, by his commiſſion directed to the lieutenant of Portland; and he will undertake to collect men of ſufficiency, not of the trained number. Laſtly, for his lordſhip's good remembrance for the towns of Weymouth and Melcomb-Regis. From whence my author is not only inclin'd to believe this paper was ſent by Sir Walter Ralegh, but that he was now governor of Portland caſtle, and had thoſe towns under his care.[a] We may indeed hence believe this paper was written by him; and that he not only took thoſe places, but ſeveral others, under his conſideration, that they might be put in the beſt ſtate of defence: but that he was now governor of Portland caſtle, or limited to the defence of that place at the time of the invaſion, as might be imply'd from my author, ſeems not very conſiſtent with his lieutenancy in the weſt.

BUT as much engaged as Ralegh ſeems at this time to have been for the ſafety of the kingdom, he found ſome interval to conſider alſo upon means for the relief of his colony: for after governor White return'd, and had deliver'd him his letters, with other advertiſements concerning his late voyage, and the ſtate of the planters in Virginia, Ralegh immediately appointed a pinnace to be ſent thither, with all ſuch proviſions as he apprehended they might want; and alſo wrote letters to them, promiſing that he would prepare a good ſupply of ſhipping and men, with all other neceſſaries, to be with them the ſummer following. This pinnace and fleet he accordingly prepared at Biddeford in the weſt of England, under the command of Sir Richard Grenvill; and all things being now ready, they waited only for a fair wind. In the mean time, the alarm ſo increas'd throughout all England, of that vaſt and formidable armament made by the king of Spain, under the ſanction of the pope's Cruſado, for the invaſion and conqueſt of the whole iſland; that moſt of the ſhips of war then in any readineſs, receiv'd orders from the ſtate to attend in their harbours for the defence of their own country: and Sir Richard Grenvill was perſonally commanded not to depart out of Cornwal. Governor White nevertheleſs labour'd ſo earneſtly for the relief of the colony, that he obtain'd two ſmall pinnaces, call'd the Brave and the Roe, wherein fifteen planters, and all convenient proviſions for thoſe who winter'd in the country, were tranſported; but the names of the captains who commanded thoſe veſſels are not remember'd. On the 22d of April 1588, they put over the bar at Biddeford, and the ſame night came to anchor at the iſle of Lundy; but the company, minding more to make a gainful voyage than a ſafe one, run in chaſe of prizes; till at laſt one of them was met with by a couple of ſtrong men of war of Rochelle, about fifty leagues to the north-eaſt of Madera; where, after a bloody fight, the Engliſh were beaten, boarded and rifled. But it is obſervable, the French men were ſo immoderate in poſſeſſing themſelves of their ſpoil, that, by over-loading the boats with the freight of the Engliſh ſhips, they ſunk what they were too eager to ſhare; ſo the vice, which led them to conqueſt, being it ſelf unconquer'd, they loſt by their greedineſs what they had won by their ſtrength. In this maimed, ranſack'd and ragged condition, the ſaid ſhip return'd to England in a month's time; and about three weeks after returned the other, having perhaps taſted of the ſame fare; at leaſt without performing the intended voyage; to the diſtreſs of the planters abroad, and diſpleaſure of their patron at home.[b]

The fifth voyage to Virginia.

IN the mean time the king of France ſent queen Elizabeth a meſſage, aſſuring her, that the tempeſt, which had been gathering in Spain for three years, would certainly break very ſpeedily upon her kingdom; therefore adviſed her to make the beſt preparation ſhe could for its defence. Nor did the king of Spain keep it now any longer a ſecret, having about the ſame time, that is, in the month of May this year, publiſh'd at Lisbon an ample and oſtentatious account[a] of this Invincible Armada, as the Spaniards themſelves had call'd it; wherein the ſquadrons are diſtinguiſh'd according to the ſeveral provinces; the names of the ſhips, their burden, and their commanders; with the number of their ſoldiers, mariners, and other aſſociates and adventurers; their ſtores, and all other neceſſaries, likewiſe ſpecified: whence it appears the whole fleet conſiſted of a hundred and thirty, or, according to Sir Walter Ralegh[b] and Hugo Grotius,[c] a hundred and forty ſail; ſome few tenders, or others, joining them by the way, not being perhaps in the Spaniſh liſt reckon'd: carrying, by the generality of accounts, above twenty-ſix hundred pieces of braſs and iron ordnance;[d] near nineteen thouſand ſoldiers; between eight and nine thouſand ſailors; beſides officers, prieſts, galley-ſlaves, ſervants, and other attendants; amounting in all to about thirty thouſand perſons; or, according to the confeſſion of Don Diego Piementelli, one of their own commanders, who was driven into Zealand, the whole fleet, army, &c. were no leſs than thirty-two thouſand men; and coſt the king of Spain 30000 ducats every day.[e] The general of this mighty navy was the duke of Medina Sidonia, knight of the golden fleece; and John Martines de Ricalde was chief admiral. In Flanders the prince of Parma was alſo making great preparations to join this Armada; had gather'd up an army conſiſting of more than a hundred, ſome ſay two hundred companies of foot, and four thouſand horſe; and was very buſy in making rafts, ferry-boats, floating bridges, portcullices, gabions, and what not? Nor were they idle in England; for how well the directions of the council of war aforeſaid were put in execution, and how far Ralegh may be preſum'd to have been engag'd among the moſt indefatigable in this ſervice, is to be infer'd from the words of that author, who ſays, "In a very ſhort time the whole king-"dom and every corner were ſpeedily furniſh'd with armed people on horſeback and on foot; "and thoſe continually trained, exerciſed, and put into bands in ſuch warlike manner, as in "no age ever was before in this realm." And a little further, "That all concur'd in one "mind, to be in readineſs to ſerve for the realm; and ſome one country was able to make "a ſufficient army of twenty thouſand men fit to fight, and fifteen thouſand of them well "arm'd and weapon'd: and in ſome countries the number of forty thouſand able men: that "the maritime countries from Cornwal all along ſouthward to Kent, and from thence eaſtward "to Lincolnſhire, were ſo furniſh'd with ſoldiers, both of themſelves, and with reſort from "their next ſhires, as there was no place to be doubted for landing of any foreign forces, but "there were within forty-eight hours to come to the place above twenty thouſand fighting men "on horſeback and on foot, with all manner of ammunition, proviſion, and carriages, un-"der the principal nobles of the countries, and captains of the greateſt knowledge."[f] We further learn from the ſame author and others, that beſides theſe armies for the maritime countries, the city of London exerciſed before the queen ten thouſand men, and had ſeveral thouſands more in readineſs; that there were alſo two great armies raiſed, whereof one was encamp'd at Tilbury in Eſſex, between the city and the mouth of the Thames, conſiſting of twenty-two thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, under the command of the earl of Leiceſter. The queen review'd this camp ſeveral times, din'd, made orations in it, and lodged in the borders of it.[g] The other army, conſiſting of thirty-four thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe,

But one of Mr. Lediard's liſts in his Naval Expeditions, now publiſhing, folio 252. raiſes them to 145. the author of a letter ſent out of England to Don Bernardin Mendoza, ambaſſador in France for the king of Spain, 4to. 1588, ſays, p. 17, their number was 150. Alſo Van Meteran, the Dutch hiſtorian's relation of this invaſion, in Hakluyt, vol. 1. fol. 593, agrees in that number; but a little further reckons them at 134. And Stow or Howe's Abridgment of him advances the Spaniſh fleet to 158 ſhips. But the accounts above, eſpecially of the Spaniards themſelves at the very time, ſeem moſt credible: for in the examination of one of the Spaniſh priſoners, named Emanuel Fremoſa, on the 12th of September this year, I find he confeſs'd, that they were, at their coming forth from Spain, 135 ſail. Thus in a ſcarce tract, entitled, Certain Advertiſements out of Ireland, concerning the loſſes and diſtreſſes happen'd to the Spaniſh navy, 4to. 1588, in the Harleyan library, B. H.

commanded by the lord Hunſdon, was planted about the queen's own perſon.[a] And it increas'd daily by the ſeveral bands and troops, which were led from the inland countries by ſuch noblemen, knights, and gentlemen, as had no ſpecial charge or government in their reſpective counties; while the young earl of Eſſex, and others among them, entertain'd her majeſty with tiltings and tourneys, barriers, mock-fights, and ſuch-like arts, as in publick are wont to render men popular.[b] But the lieutenants of the maritime counties were otherwiſe employ'd. And as the earl of Pembroke had been aſſiduous in levying the forces of Wilts and Somerſetſhire, and the earl of Bath thoſe of Devonſhire; ſo Ralegh ſeems to have been no leſs forward and induſtrious in raiſing and reducing thoſe of Cornwal to the beſt order and diſcipline for the ſervice of his country, againſt the common enemy; notwithſtanding what he might have done, as has been ſaid before, at Portland: and, like the reſt of the lords-lieutenant, to have ſent up conſtantly his certificates to the queen of the numbers that were aſſembled; the poſture they were in; the proviſions they were ſupply'd with; or thoſe whereof they ſtood in need.

But notwithſtanding all theſe land-preparations, which moved ſome ſpeculative warriors at court to think a ſea-force unneceſſary, as if the Engliſh were ſufficient to cut the Spaniards to pieces in landing, or when they were aſhore, and run away with their ſhips at the ſame time; Sir Walter Ralegh knew better what another kingdom might do, even againſt England, by the advantage of a fleet, if we have none: no man having ſo ſolidly reſolv'd as himſelf that weighty queſtion, whether England, without the help of a fleet, is able to debar an enemy from landing? He knew that ſhips, without putting themſelves out of breath, will eaſily out-run the ſoldiers that coaſt them: he knew that a fleet after ſun-ſet may be ſeen at the Lizard, and by the next morning at Portland, which an army ſhould be ſix days in marching; and conſequently, that the ſailor may chuſe his landing-place, where there are no ſoldiers that can oppoſe him: and even ſuppoſing an invader ſhould offer to land near where our greateſt army was ready to receive him, Ralegh doubted, when the choice of all our train'd-bands and of officers were drawn together, as at Tilbury, to attend the perſon of the queen, and to defend the city of London, whether thoſe that ſhould remain to guard the coaſt could be of any ſuch force as to encounter an army like that which the prince of Parma ſhould have landed in England.[c]

By ſea therefore all poſſible defence was likewiſe made, and the chief command was very properly confer'd on the lord-admiral Howard, who, hearing the Invincible Armada was upon the point of hoiſting ſail, ſent Sir Francis Drake, who was conſtituted his vice-admiral, with fifty-ſix ſhips well appointed, to the weſtern parts, and himſelf arrived there on the 23d of May with others, which made up the fleet about a hundred ſail; while the lord Henry Seymer was ſent to lie with forty Engliſh and Dutch ſhips (according to Camden) between Dover and Calais to intercept the prince of Parma.[d] The Invincible Armada looſed anchor from Liſbon four days before; but met with ſuch ſtorms, ſickneſs, and other diſaſters, that the lord-admiral put forth towards Spain, in hopes of ſurpriſing them in their diſtreſs; till more maturely conſidering they might paſs by undiſcover'd, he return'd to Plymouth, and ſuffer'd his men to relieve

[a] But ſix years before this occaſion of raiſing the military ſtrength of England, according to Sir Walter Ralegh, there were, upon a general view and muſter, found in the kingdom, of all men fit to bear arms, eleven hundred and ſeventy-two thouſand. See his Select eſſays and obſervations 8vo. 1650, in his diſcourſe of the invention of ſhipping, p. 27.

[b] The earl of Eſſex was now maſter of the queen's horſe. See the letter to Mendoza aforeſaid, p. 25. In which Sir Henry Wotton agrees, who makes this further obſervation: "This ſervice at Tilbury camp was, in my "judgment (ſays he) the very poiſon of all that followed; "for there, while the queen ſtood in ſome doubt of the "Spaniſh invaſion, ſhe made him in field, commander of "the cavalry, as he was before in court, and much graced "him openly in view of the ſoldiers and people, even "above my lord of Leiceſter: the truth is, from thence-"forth he fed too faſt." [d] As for the naval force in theſe times, William Harriſon, in his Hiſtorical deſcription of England (with whom Sir Walter Ralegh, in his Eſſays, aforeſaid agrees) tells us, the queen had then in the 24th year of her reign (ſix years before this invaſion) already built and furniſhed four or five and twenty great ſhips (whoſe names they both recite) and three notable gallies; with the ſight whereof, and the reſt of the navy royal, ſays Harriſon, it is incredible to ſee how greatly her grace is delighted. They further ſay, there were then 135 ſhips more, whoſe burden exceeded 500 ton; beſides many more of leſſer burden, hoys, &c. Harriſon alſo obſerves, her grace doth yearly build one ſhip or other to the better defence of her frontiers from the enemy. See him in the 2d vol. of Holingſhed, fol. 201.

Michael Caſtelnau, who was ambaſſador here many years in thoſe times, and who has given the moſt noble and ingenuous character of the ſaid queen, in his memoirs, of any foreigner I have met with that knew her, comes ſo near that author, where he obſerves ſhe built a noble fleet, the bulwark of her kingdom, as to affirm, ſhe launches a large man of war every ſecond year. But by that long liſt of the Engliſh navy (which this year oppoſed the Spaniſh Armada) among the MSS. in the Royal library 14. B. XIII. lately printed by Mr. Lediard, in his Naval Expeditions, fol. 238. it appears there were very few ſhips of that burden before-mention'd among them. For tho' that liſt raiſes their number beyond all other accounts, to 197 ſail (manifeſtly omitting ſome which were there, and probably admitting ſeveral which were not;) yet there are not above ſix ſhips among them mention'd to be of 500 ton, and not above ſeven of greater burden. Therefore, as Mr Lediard well obſerves, tho' our ſeveral ſquadrons might exceed thoſe of the Spaniards in number of ſhips; yet by comparing the tonnage of the ſeveral ſhips in both fleets, and the number of men employ'd in them, the ſuperiority of the enemy's fleet will appear very conſiderable; more than double in men, and very near double in burden.

themſelves on ſhore. The queen had received ſuch aſſurance they were ſo diſabled from coming this year by that ſtorm, that ſhe made ſecretary Walſingham ſend for four of her firſt-rate ſhips to be brought home to Chatham. But their return was prevented by the intelligence which captain Thomas Fleming brought into the harbour on the 19th of July, that he had diſcover'd the enemy approaching from the Lizard-Point in Cornwal. The captains and commanders were then it ſeems at bowls upon the Hoe at Plymouth;[a] and the tradition goes, that Drake would needs ſee the game up; but was ſoon prevail'd on to go and play out the rubbers with the Spaniards. All hands were now at work to warp out the ſhips, which, with the admirable induſtry of the ſeamen, was very ſpeedily, for the difficulty thereof, perform'd, the wind blowing ſtiffly into the haven from the ſouth-weſt. The lord-admiral, with the few he could then get ready, lay all night in the road. Next day about fifty or threeſcore more join'd him, and at noon they ken'd the Spaniſh fleet; ſome with lofty turrets and decks rear'd one above another; and others rowed along with two or three hundred oars apiece; all advancing with their Spaniſh gravity, the wind being abated, in a ſemicircular order; and extended, as Camden obſerves, ſeven miles from end to end. The Engliſh ſuffered them all to paſs by, ſo got the advantage of the wind, when they began to chaſe them in the rear: nor did the Spaniards offer to land at Plymouth, their commiſſion being to join the prince of Parma, and ſail directly to London. The next day, which was the 21ſt of July, the lord-admiral ſent out a pinnace call'd the Defiance, and begun the fight. This, I take it, was near the Eddiſtone; for there we have account of the firſt conflict, and of the firſt Spaniſh ſhip that was taken or ſunk.[b] Then the lord-admiral in the Ark-Royal, Drake in the Revenge, with Hawkins, Frobiſher, and others, having thunder'd thick upon the enemy for two hours together, withdrew, forty of their ſhips not being (ſays Camden) yet come up. In this engagement the Spaniards, by endeavouring to circle in and ſhelter one of their diſabled galleons, ſhe had her foremaſt broken, and was left behind, which Drake took the next day, with Don Pedro de Valdez and other nobles in her, beſides fifty-five thouſand ducats, which were ſhar'd among his ſailors. Immediately after, another of their greateſt ſhips was ſet on fire, with all the people in her, and yet the powder eſcaped. But how the lord-admiral, all the firſt night, follow'd the Spaniſh lantern, inſtead of Drake's, into their fleet, while Drake at the ſame time was making another miſtaken purſuit; and how the Ark Royal followed the Spaniſh fleet alſo the ſecond night, ſo far, almoſt alone, that it was the afternoon following before the Engliſh fleet overtook her, with other particulars; I leave to the more ample accounts of this engagement, that I may attend the motions of Sir Walter Ralegh; who, from being at firſt the neareſt, now growing impatient at being the moſt remote from the enemy, appears to have committed his charge by land to proper officers, or detach'd part thereof to march up nearer the Spaniards, and with a gallant company of nobles and gentlemen, in ſeveral ſhips, to have join'd the Engliſh fleet; that is to ſay, on the 23d of July, when the Spaniſh fleet was advanced over-againſt Portland; where, this whole day being one continued engagement from morning till night, it proved the moſt general and bloody fight of any between them in the Britiſh channel: and here, after the taking of a great Venetian ſhip, and others of leſſer bulk, the Spaniards were driven from all intention of aſſaulting the Engliſh, till they had join'd the prince of Parma; for during this fight, or, "in "the mean while" (according to the words of my author, from Van Meteran, one of the earlieſt, moſt copious and accurate journaliſts of this expedition) "the Engliſh navy increas'd; where-"unto, out of all havens of the realm, reſorted ſhips and men; for they all with one accord "came flocking thither (to Portland) as unto a ſet field where immortal fame and glory was "to be attain'd, and faithful ſervice to be perform'd unto their prince and country."[c] In which number having mention'd the earls of Oxford, Northumberland, and Cumberland, he alſo names Sir Walter Ralegh among the foremoſt of near twenty other knights and gentlemen, whereby the Engliſh ſhips were augmented to a hundred ſail; and doubtleſs by ſome of thoſe Camden mention'd to have been left behind in Plymouth-Sound, with which Ralegh very probably advanced.[d] Theſe, ever aſunder, and always in motion, were on every ſide uſeful to annoy the enemy; now preſenting a broad-ſide, and ſheering off; then tacking about and diſcharging the other; in ſuch ſort, that Sir Henry Wotton call'd it a Morrice-dance upon the waters,[e] while d What further perſuades me to believe Ralegh enter'd the fleet at this place and time is, my having met with a certain foreign hiſtory, hereafter mention'd, which had been his own book, and wherein he has with his own hand corrected other paſſages relating to himſelf; but has let this of his joining the fleet, as above, paſs uncontradicted.

the ſluggiſh and unweildy caſtles of the enemy cluſter'd and hamper'd together, could only offer offence from one diſabled ſide; and that, when they had done, flew over the Engliſh mens heads. Camden tells us, that in this day's engagement, the lord-admiral was adviſed by ſome of his officers, with more heat than diſcretion, to grapple with and board the enemy. Now Ralegh, having made ſome excellent animadverſions upon this very circumſtance, goes nigh to prove out of his own words, that he was not only in this day's engagement; but that the counſel he might thence appear to have given, did greatly contibute to the ſucceſs of it. He has ſhewn how well he knew, that in ſuch caſe the advantage of weapons would be likelieſt to carry it, whereof the enemy was provided with far the greateſt number; alſo, that in ſuch cloſe fight, how liable the leſſer ſhips were to be cruſh'd by the greater; that theſe by their very height muſt have further advantage over thoſe that endeavour'd to board them from below; and laſtly, in theſe of more bulk and breadth being alſo more firm and more ſteady, thoſe who could beſt keep their feet would probably be beſt able to uſe their hands. But that I may not impede too much the courſe of action, his further arguments upon this head are ſubjoyn'd more cloſely in his own words.[a] Next day the Spaniards were glad to lie by, and the Engliſh no leſs pleaſed with the ceſſation, that they might take the opportunity of ſending to ſhore for a recruit of ammunition; and this, being a circumſtance taken notice of alſo by Ralegh himſelf, further confirms his having been now among them.[b] The 25th of July, the Engliſh had another ſharp battel with the Spaniſh admiral, and three great galleaſſes at the iſle of Wight, in which Camden mentions the taking of a Portugueſe galleon, and that from this time the galleaſſes durſt not venture upon any new engagement, but cloſing themſelves up again in a rundel as they call'd it, made the beſt of their way to tell the prince of Parma how they had been ſerved. The Engliſh fleet followed and kept playing upon their rear all the next day, having determined to forbear any cloſer engagement till they came to the Britiſh Frith, or ſtreights of Calais, where the lord Seymer expected their arrival. "But ſo far was this Invincible Armada from "alarming the ſea-coaſts, ſays Camden, that the Engliſh gentry of the younger ſort enter'd "themſelves volunteers, and, leaving their friends and families, did with incredible cheerfulneſs "hire ſhips at their own charge, and in pure love to their country joyn'd the grand fleet in vaſt "numbers." And here Camden names thoſe nobles and ſome of thoſe gentlemen, with Ralegh among them, which compoſed the ſquadron before-mentioned, as if it enter'd but now from Dover, or ſome of thoſe ports; not that he confines their entrance to this day, otherwiſe than naming them under it, or any other way ſuggeſts, they did not joyn the grand fleet three days before; but ſeems, by remembering them in this place, to have believed, they were moſt conſpicuous or in greateſt number at this time, unleſs he poſtpon'd the mention of them to a day, that was leaſt throng'd with circumſtances of action. Indeed, that this noble ſquadron of vo-

In "like ſort had the lord Charles Howard, admiral of "England, been loſt in 1588, if he had not been better "adviſed, than a great many malignant fools were, "that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards "had an army aboard them, and he had none; they "had more ſhips than he had, and of higher building and "charging; ſo that, had he entangled himſelf with thoſe "great and powerful veſſels, he had greatly endangered "this kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the "defence are equal to a hundred that board and enter; "whereas then, contrariwiſe, the Spaniards had a hun-"dred for twenty of ours to defend themſelves withal. "But our admiral knew his advantage, and held it; "which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have "held his head. Here to ſpeak in general of ſea-fights (contiuues he, tho' I think his obſervation may have re-ſpect to ſome further events in this particular fight, where-fore 'tis here alſo added) "I ſay, that a fleet of twenty "ſhips, all good ſailors and good ſhips, have the ad-"vantage on the open ſea of a hundred as good ſhips, "but of ſlower ſailing. For if the fleet of a hundred "ſail keep themſelves together in a groſs ſquadron, the "twenty ſhips upon any angle ſhall force them to "give ground and to fall back upon their own next "fellows; of which ſo many as entangle are made "unſerviceable or loſt. Force them they may eaſily; "becauſe twenty ſhips, which give themſelves ſcope, "after they have given one broad-ſide of artillery by "clapping into the wind and ſtaying, may give "them the other, and ſo the twenty ſhips batter "them in pieces with a perpetual volley, whereas thoſe "that fight in a troop have no room to turn, and can "always uſe but one and the ſame beaten ſide. If the "fleet of a hundred ſail give themſelves any diſtance, "then ſhall the leſſer fleet prevail, either againſt thoſe "that are arrear and hindermoſt, or againſt thoſe that, "by advantage of over-ſailing their fellows, keep the "wind: and, if upon a lee-ſhore, the ſhips next the "wind will be conſtrained to fall back into their own ſqua-"dron; then it is all to nothing, that the whole fleet "muſt ſuffer ſhip-wreck, or render it ſelf. That ſuch "advantage may be taken upon a fleet of unequal ſpeed, "it hath been well enough conceived in old time, as by "that oration of Hermocrates in Thucydides, which he "made to the Syracuſians when the Athenians invaded "them, it may be eaſily obſerved. Hiſtory of the World, Book 5. chap. 1. ſect. 6.

b Speaking of the ſuperfluity of great ordnance in the royal navy; he obſerves, that "many times there is no "proportion of ſhot and powder allowed, rateably to that "quantity of great ordnance, as was ſeen in the ſea-bat-"tel, ſays he, with the Spaniards in the year 1588, when "it ſo nearly concerned the defence and preſervation of "the kingdom. So as then many of thoſe great guns, "wanting powder and ſhot, ſtood but as cyphers and "ſcare-crows, not unlike to the Eaſterling hulks, who "were wont to plant great red port-holes in their broad-"ſides where they carried no ordnance at all." See Sir Walter Ralegh's obſervations on the royal navy and ſea-ſervice, inſcribed to Henry, prince of Wales, 8vo. 1650. p. 26.

lunteers was united to the queen's navy, when ſuch valiant ſervices were perform'd againſt the Spaniards in the great fight before Calais, another writer alſo, greatly to their commendation, agrees; but neither is he ſo expreſſive as to ſatisfy us it was the firſt appearance they made, and that they were not before at Portland. For, having mentioned the earls of Cumberland, Northumberland, and other gentlemen of diſtinction, who without any charge or knowlege of the queen, joyn'd the fleet before Calais, and ventur'd their lives in the ſaid engagement; he goes on to obſerve, how earneſt all ranks and degrees were; by inſtancing alſo, "that the earl of "Oxford, one of the moſt ancient nobles in this land, went to ſea and ſerved the queen among "them, as did Robert Cecil, lord Dudley and Sir Walter Raleigh, a gentleman of the queen's "privy-chamber, ſays he, and in his company a great number of young gentlemen, among "whom were William Cecil, Edward Darcie, and Arthur Gorge," [a] the ſame perſons mentioned with others by Camden, and alſo in larger number by the Dutch hiſtorian above quoted, three days before. "With the recital of whom, I only ſhew you (continues my laſt author, "the letter-writer) how far we have been deceived to think, that we ſhould have had a party "here for us, when, as you behold, both by land and ſea, all ſorts of men were ſo ready, at their "own charges, without either commandment or entertainment, to adventure alſo their lives in de-"fence of the queen and the realm." [b] From hence it appears, this ſquadron muſt have alſo been at the final overthrow of the Spaniſh Armada, which on the 27th of July in the evening anchor'd before Calais, intending to hold on for Dunkirk, in expectation of the prince of Parma, who was always preparing but never ready, and, the Engliſh following, anchor'd alſo within culvering ſhot of them. Here the lord Seymer joyn'd the Engliſh; and then the lord-admiral's fleet was increaſed to a hundred and forty ſail, ſays Camden; wherein he both exactly agrees with the augmentation thereof at Portland by theſe volunteers, as we have it from the Dutch hiſtorian there quoted; and alſo excludes all intermediate addition, of ſhips at leaſt, by the number himſelf has before given us of the lord Seymer's ſquadron. Next day the Engliſh reſolv'd, according to the queen's directions, upon the ſtratagem of the fire-ſhips to burn or diſperſe the Spaniſh navy; and the ſame was put in practice at or ſoon after midnight, ſo ſucceſsfully, that the enemy, cutting their cables with the utmoſt horror and precipitancy, were, ſome ſcatter'd by the wind, ſome fell foul of each other, and others ſtruck upon the ſands; the Engliſh chaſing and thundering upon them from all quarters: then was a great galleaſs taken by captain Preſton, its commander Moncada ſlain, and a booty of near as much gold fell to the conquerors as was taken in another before-mentioned. [c] On the 29th of July the Spaniards ranged themſelves into the beſt order they could within ſight of Graveling; hither the Engliſh fleet alſo purſued them, and here the Spaniards received their laſt fatal adieu, by inceſſant and numberleſs damages from the Engliſh cannon the greateſt part of the day, till their Galleons, Galleaſſes, Gallies, Urcas and Zabras were ſo miſerably ſhatter'd, having their hulls pierced through and through, their oars and rudders cut away, their tackling all rent, and their maſts broken, that ſome were deſerted as unſerviceable, ſome ſunk with the crew that was in them, and others retiring upon the neighbouring coaſts were ſeized and plundered by the inhabitants: while thoſe, that had the ability left them, moſt prudently employ'd it in running away. The Engliſh ſtill followed them into the northern ſeas, even beyond the latitude of fifty-ſeven degrees, and, leaving them paſt all thoughts of the prince of Parma, return'd on the 4th of Auguſt; when the violent ſtorms that aroſe reſumed their cauſe, and compleated their victory: for, by the tempeſts, ſhipwrecks, ſickneſs and famine in their dangerous paſſage homewards, they ſuſtained greater loſſes than even all they had met with throughout the narrow ſeas. For the particulars of thoſe loſſes we ſhall refer to the diſtinct and more copious narratives of this invaſion, [d] and cloſe this account with the ſummary thereof, which was ſoon after publiſhed to the world

[c] "It was affirmed by men of great judgment in Ca-"lais, that never was ſeen by any man living ſuch a "battery; ſo great for number, ſo furious, and of ſo long "continuance, as the Engliſh made againſt the Spaniſh: "Calais ſaw the Spaniſh navy firſt driven from their an-"chors with fire; they ſaw the greateſt galleaſs of the Spa-"niſh, whereof was commander that worthy nobleman "Moncada, ſpoil'd, and himſelf ſlain in it by the Engliſh: "Calais ſaw the next day, that the Engliſh fought and "beat the Armada from eight a clock in the morning "till four in the afternoon without ceaſing: Calais ſaw "the Spaniſh hoiſt up all their ſails and fly as faſt as the "wind could drive, and the Engliſh purſue them: Yet "Calais ſaw a ſufficient navy of England left before "Dunkirk, able to maſter all the ſhipping that the duke "of Parma had provided." Thus in a ſcarce old tract in the Harleyan library, B. H. called, A Pack of Spaniſh lyes, firſt printed in Spain, tranſlated, and now ripped up, unfolded and condemn'd, 4to. 1588. p. 6.

[d] At the end of an old pamphet before quoted, called, Certain Advertiſements out of Ireland, concerning the loſſes and diſtreſſes of the Spaniſh navy, there is one liſt of fifteen Spaniſh ſhips, which periſhed, or were taken by the Engliſh in July and Auguſt in the narrow ſeas; and another liſt of ſeventeen more, ſunk, burnt and taken on the coaſts of Ireland in September; ſo that both loſſes were thirty-two ſhips, in which were alſo deſtroy'd and taken 10185 men, whereof one thouſand were detain'd priſoners in England and Zealand; further adding, there were multitudes beſides ſlain, ſunk, or ſtarved, who were not accounted for. Inſomuch, as Van Meteran in Hakluyt more diſtinctly computes, with whom, I obſerve, moſt of our hiſtorians agree, there returned not home above fifty-three world by Sir Walter Ralegh himſelf, where giving the honour of the victory to the courage and conduct of the lord-admiral Howard, he ſays, that "notwithſtanding the victories they "pretended to have obtained, it was ſoon manifeſted to all nations, how the navy, which "they had termed invincible, conſiſting of a hundred and forty ſail, was by thirty of the "queen's ſhips of war, and a few merchant-men, beaten and ſhuffled together, even from the "Lizard point in Cornwall to Portland, where they ſhamefully left Don Pedro de Valdez "with his mighty ſhip; from Portland to Calais, where they loſt Hugo de Moncada, "with the gallies of which he was captain; and from Calais, driven with ſquibs from their "anchors, were chaſed out of the ſight of England round about Scotland and Ireland; where, "for the ſympathy of their barbarous religion, hoping to find ſuccour and aſſiſtance, a great "part of them were cruſh'd againſt the rocks; and thoſe other who landed (being very "many in number) were notwithſtanding broken, ſlain, and taken; and ſo ſent from vil- "lage to village, coupled in halters, to be ſhipped into England; where her majeſty, of her "princely and invincible diſpoſition, diſdaining to put them to death, and ſcorning either to "retain or entertain them, they were all ſent back again to their own country, to witneſs "and recount the worthy atchievements of their invincible navy."

THE ſervices of Sir Walter Ralegh againſt this invaſion, his diligence in regulating the forces of the land, and his intereſt in ſtrengthning thoſe of the ſea; the charges he was at, and the dangers he voluntarily incurr'd, however undiſtinguiſh'd more than is above expreſs'd by our common hiſtorians, and thoſe few inaccurate accounts thereof, which are deſcended to us; were yet received with ſuch approbation by the queen, that ſhe ſeems, as ſome recompence for them, to have this year made a conſiderable augmentation to his patent of wines; as if he had, beſides the grant before-mentioned, another now alſo beſtowed upon him for tonnage and poundage upon thoſe liquors,[b] except it is the ſame patent with the former, only renewed this year, or wrong dated in the author who mentions it. Be it as it ſhould, this patent ſeems to have been one of the moſt beneficial favours which Ralegh ever received of the queen, and might perhaps exceed in profit the penſion which ſhe ſettled on the lord-admiral himſelf for his conduct and courage in the ſaid overthrow. This benefit Ralegh enjoy'd as long as ſhe liv'd; tho', towards the cloſe of her reign, the number of ſuch-like grants to others being very much increaſed, they were inveighed againſt in parliament as grievous and burdenſome monopolies, by thoſe eſpecially, who had not the merit or intereſt to procure any for themſelves. Sir Robert Naunton tells us, in his concluſion of Ralegh's character, with relation to the grants he thus obtain'd; "That tho' he gained much at the court, yet he took it not out of the exche- "quer, or merely out of the queen's purſe, but by his wit, and the help of the prerogative: "for the queen was never profuſe in delivering out her treaſures; but paid many, and moſt "of her ſervants, part in money and the reſt with grace."[c] We meet with another office, which Ralegh himſelf erected, no leſs praiſe-worthy than this was profitable to him. For one writer, in the ſhort account he gives of him, having ſpoken of the diviſion he made of his time, in allowing five hours to ſleep, four to reading, two for diſcourſe, and the reſt to buſineſs and other neceſſaries, and having hinted at the diverſity of his correſpondencies, intelligence and the like, ſays, that "in the capacity of an agency for all ſorts of perſons, he ſet up "a kind of office of addreſs." And further, "that conſidering the diſpatch of ſuch variety of "engagements in the former part of his life, one muſt be much to ſeek how a man of ſo three ſail, leaving alſo behind the greater and better part of their men; and, as they all conclude, There was not a famous or worthy family in all Spain, which in this expedition loſt not a ſon, a brother, or a kinſman.

Among the Engliſh, there were not in the whole eight or nine days engagement above one hundred loſt, and among them only one captain, named Cock by Camden; Fuller, in his worthies of Devon, laments mightily, that he cannot recover his chriſtian name; but perhaps Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 771, might have helped him to it; however, the Cottonian MS. quoted by Mr. Lediard, fol. 256. puts the matter further in doubt, by calling him William Cope, and his pinnace the Delight; which William Cope is more likely to be William Cox, who did command ſuch a veſſel of fifty tun, called the Delight, in the ſaid fleet, according to the liſt, which this ingenious gentleman himſelf has exhibited; unleſs Camden's Cock is this Cox, and ſo his name may be William; tho' it will then differ from the perſon offer'd out of Hakluyt, who is named Abraham. But, as the perſon of this chriſtian name is there only mentioned in a former expedition, tho' his ſirname agrees beſt with the perſon who was loſt in this, it is left to the reader's judgment, whether he will prefer this Abraham Cock, or that William Cox, to the honourable memory that captain Cock in Camden deſerves for dying in defence of his country.

[a] In his Report of the truth of the fight about the iſles of the Azores, &c. hereafter more particularly mentioned, reprinted in Hakluyt, Tom. 2. fol. 169. Here I cannot but wonder, how the induſtrious Mr. Strype was led to ſay in his Annals, vol. 3. fol. 530. that this brief relation above-quoted of the Spaniſh invaſion was penn'd by Sir Francis Drake, of whoſe writing I never ſaw any thing in print or MS. but ſome letters; tho' he quotes even the very page in Hakluyt, whence he takes it, as I do; and where the ſaid Report, in which that relation is included, is expreſly ſaid to be penn'd by the honourable Sir Walter Ralegh.

[b] In Sir Robert Cecil's liſt of the patentees and their patents, which he produced in the houſe of commons, Anno 1601, Sir Walter Ralegh's for the tonnage and poundage of wines is mentioned to bear date, 30^mo Reginæ. " many actions ſhould write any thing, and one of ſo many writings ſhould do any thing."[a] By another little hint, that has been elſewhere preſerved, we may conceive this office did chiefly reſpect a more liberal intercourſe, a nobler mutuality of advertiſement, than would perhaps admit of all ſorts of perſons; and ſuch as advanced rather to the improvement of men themſelves, than their means. But this ſuggeſtion is drawn only from comparing it with the general tendency of thoſe other ſchemes, among which I once ſaw it mentioned, in a letter written by an ingenious perſon of great note for his writings to a nobleman, who had the greateſt correſpondence with ſuch perſons of any in his time; recommending " that long dried fountain of communication, " which Montaigne firſt propos'd, Sir Walter Ralegh put in practice, and Mr. Hartlib endea- " voured to revive."[b] This is all that occurs to me of this office of addreſs: but whatever uſeful means of this nature, for advancing the knowledge or intereſt of mankind, was inſtituted by Ralegh, 'twas probably in ſome leſs active part of his life, than at this preſent juncture.

For Don Antonio, king of Portugal, who had been expell'd from his dominions by king Philip, and was now in London, ſoon after the ſignal overthrow of the Armada aforeſaid, took this opportunity to renew his motion to queen Elizabeth for her aſſiſtance towards his reſtoration, which he propounded to the lord-treaſurer in a letter full of liberal offers, written in the Portugueſe language, all with his own hand.[c] The queen not only conſented to the enterpriſe, as thinking it more convenient to return the late viſit of the Spaniards in their own country, than ſuffer them to repeat it here, but lent ſix of her men of war, and diſburſed threeſcore thouſand pounds towards defraying the charges thereof. This encouragement, and the late provocation, ſo ſpirited up the warlike men of the kingdom, and Ralegh among the reſt to become volunteers therein, that they augmented the number of the ſaid ſhips with a hundred and twenty ſail more, and mann'd them with fourteen or fifteen thouſand ſoldiers and ſailors at their own further expence, committing the charge by ſea to Sir Francis Drake, and that by land to Sir John Norris, who were probably the moſt conſiderable contributors thereto.

But firſt Ralegh took care for the relief of his plantation in Virginia, which that he might more effectually ſecure than could be expected from his own ſingle aſſiſtance, eſpecially after the many heavy diſburſments he had made, and the great diſappointment the colony muſt doubtleſs have received by miſſing of the laſt ſupplies he ſent them, through the loſſes, which his agents too raſhly brought thereon; he made an aſſignment to divers gentlemen and merchants of London, for continuing the plantation of this new diſcover'd country with Engliſh men. And this was now no leſs adviſedly done with regard to himſelf, than affectionately with reſpect to the people employ'd therein: whom, tho' he generouſly aſſiſted with his advice and intereſt

[b] This letter, written by John Evelyn, Eſq; about forty years paſt, in a little black hand as I remember, to Henry earl of Clarendon, I ſaw among the remains of that earl's moſt numerous and expenſive collections, about eleven years ſince, at which time I made the extract above out of it. And, as I have met with the projects of thoſe other perſons mentioned in that letter with Sir Walter Ralegh, for this commodious interchange and accompliſhment of human reſearches; the recital of theirs may probably reflect a further light into the nature of his; and poſſibly quicken the publick ſpirit of ſome times or other for bringing to perfection the important and extenſive benefits, which are ſo many ways to be apprehended from ſuch a commodious and deſirable intercourſe. Montaigne's project (or his father's) was for having an office of enquiry in ſeveral towns, for every body to regiſter what they were in ſearch or want of, with their terms, 'tis ſuppos'd, for obtaining it. " Car à tous coups, ſays he, il y a des conditions qui s'entrecherchent; & pour ne s'entr'entendre, laiſſent les hommes en extreme neceſſité." There are, ſays he, ever- " more conditions, which are hunting after one another; " and for want of hearing one another's occaſions, leave " men in very great neceſſity." Then giving an inſtance of " thoſe two excellent ſcholars, Lilius Giraldus in " Italy, and Sebaſtian Caſtalio in Germany, who died ſo " poor they had ſcarce bread to eat, he believes thou- " ſands would have retained or relieved them, had they " known their wants. For the world is not ſo general- " ly corrupted, but that I knew a man (continues he) " who would heartily wiſh the eſtate his anceſtors had " left him, might be employ'd in ſecuring rare and re- " markable perſons of any kind, from thoſe misfor- " tunes, which ſometimes perſecute them to the laſt ex- " tremity." See his Eſſays, lib. 1. cap. 34. The other notice of this moſt uſeful ſcheme (ſince I have not at preſent Mr. Hartlib's own account) I ſhall here offer in Sir William Petty's ingenious repreſentation of it, directed many years ſince to the ſaid laſt projector himſelf. " We muſt recommend, ſays he, an office of addreſs, " according to the projection of Mr. Hartlib, that pain- " ful and great inſtrument of this deſign; whereby the " wants and deſires of all may be made known to all. " Where men may know what is already done, in the " buſineſs of learning; what is at preſent in doing, and " what is intended to be done; to the end, that by ſuch a " general communication of deſigns and mutual aſſiſtance " the wits and endeavours of the world may no longer " be as ſo many ſcattered coals, which, for want of union, " are ſoon quenched; whereas being but laid together, " they would have yielded a comfortable light and heat. " For, methinks, the preſent condition of men is like a " field, where, a battel having been lately fought, we ſee " many legs, arms and organs of ſenſe, lying here and " there, which, for want of conjunction, and a ſoul to quic- " ken and enliven them, are fit for nothing but to feed " the ravens and infect the air: ſo we ſee many wits " and ingenuities diſperſed up and down the world, where- " of ſome are now labouring to do what is already done; " and puzzling themſelves to re-invent what is already " invented: others we ſee quite ſtuck faſt in difficulties " for want of a few directions, which ſome other man, " might he be met withal, both could and would moſt " eaſily give him. Again, one man wants a ſmall ſum " of money to carry on ſome deſign that requires it; and " there is perhaps another, who has twice as much ready " to beſtow upon the ſame deſign; but theſe two, having " no means ever to hear the one of the other, the good " work, intended and deſired by both parties, does ut- " terly periſh and come to nothing. But this we paſs " over ſlightly, tho' very fundamental to our buſineſs; " becauſe the maſter-builder thereof himſelf has done it " ſo ſolidly." This in a Pamphlet, entitled, The advice of W. P. to Mr. Hartlib, for the advancement of ſome particular parts of learning, 4to. 1648. p. 1, 2.

in ſome future proſecutions of this undertaking; yet theſe proving improſperous, through the oblique courſes they took at firſt ſetting out upon this new foundation, like that in which they lately fail'd, it was twenty years from this time [a], before even a whole company could make a more ſucceſsful and advanced progreſs in this ſettlement, than Sir Walter Ralegh of himſelf alone had done; it having coſt him, as we are aſſur'd by one who ſhould beſt know, no leſs than 40000 l. [b] The particulars of that aſſignment we may gather from an "indenture made the 7th of March, 31 Eliz. between Sir Walter Ralegh of Coliton in Devonſhire, as he is therein diſtinguiſhed, chief governor of Virginia, and Thomas Smith with other merchants of London, and adventurers to Virginia, and John White and other gentlemen; reciting, that Sir Walter Ralegh (by her majeſty's letters patents before-mentioned) had granted, on the ſeventh of January 1587, to John White and the reſt, free liberty to carry into Virginia, and inhabit there, ſuch of her majeſty's ſubjects as ſhould willingly accompany them. And that the ſaid Thomas Smith and others the ſaid adventurers, purpoſing to be made free of the corporation and company, late conſtituted by Sir Walter in the city of Ralegh, intended to be built in Virginia, had adventured divers ſums of money, merchandizes, ſhipping, victual, and other commodities, to Virginia: wherefore Sir Walter Ralegh, by this indenture, grants to the ſaid Thomas Smith and others, and to the ſaid John White and the reſt, their ſeveral heirs and aſſigns, free trade and traffick for all manner of merchandize to and from Virginia, or any other part of America, where the ſaid Sir Walter, his heirs or aſſigns, did, or might claim any intereſt, title or privilege; free from all rents, cuſtoms and other charges, except the fifth part of the oare of gold and ſilver, which he reſerves to himſelf and his heirs. And farther, the ſaid Sir Walter Ralegh, as well for and in eſpecial regard and zeal of planting the chriſtian religion, in and among the ſaid barbarous and heathen countries, and for the advancement and preferment of the ſame, and the common utility and profit of the inhabitants therein, as alſo for the encouragement of the ſaid adventurers and other aſſiſtants in Virginia, does freely and liberally give them the ſum of one hundred pounds." His bounty for the propagation of the goſpel.

As for the expedition before-mentioned, which was ſet out under Drake and Norris, about five weeks after the ſaid aſſignment, that is on the 14th of April 1589, in which Don Antonio was by Ralegh, among the reſt, accompanied to Portugal, we need not here be circumſtantial thereon; eſpecially as to the action at the Groine, the overthrow of the Spaniards at Puente de Burgos, the taking of Peniche, with the caſtle of Caſcais, the aſſault of Lisbon, and the burning of Vigo; ſeeing our hiſtorians have not diſtinguiſhed what part Ralegh had therein: in which perhaps they ſeem not ſo grateful to him as he was to his aſſociates; [d] but particularly in not mentioning him at the taking of that great number of eaſterling hulks and other ſhips laden with Spaniſh goods, proviſions and ammunition, for a new invaſion of England, which from the 2d of June ſome or other of the adventurers (none are named) continued to bring into the Engliſh fleet, then lying in the road of Caſcais, for ſix days together. [e] This fleet of ours was but thinly mann'd at firſt, and having loſt ſome thouſands by ſickneſs and intemperance with the new wines of thoſe countries; hands could not be ſpared to bring home much above a quarter of thoſe veſſels and their lading, that were thus taken: for Sir Roger Williams, who was a colonel in the land-ſervice of this expedition, has ſaid in a letter of his, ſtill extant, "It is well known, we had above two hundred ſail of all ſorts, of which we could not carry with us above threeſcore for the want of men." Hence aroſe at their return into England, a little contention between Williams and Ralegh; for Ralegh having taken ſome of theſe prizes, Williams placed in one of them his lieutenant with ſome of his ſoldiers, "without which, ſays Williams, it could not have been carried into England:" wherefore he would have laid claim, it ſeems, both to the ſhip and its cargo; "this voyage, as he goes on, having coſt him a thou-

"ſand pounds," as it did ſeveral other of the adventurers no doubt. But his claim not being thought reaſonable, the earl of Bath, lieutenant of Devonſhire, diſcharged his men from that veſſel at Dartmouth. Williams, at this, growing very turbulent, and his clamours reaching the queen's ear, procured her diſpleaſure againſt him, which occaſion'd his ſaid letter to three of the privy-council; whence this intelligence is extracted. From this letter we farther collect, the atchievements of the Engliſh in this voyage ſo well ſatisfy'd the queen, in the diſablement of the enemy, eſpecially as to their naval powers, that ſhe honour'd the commanders or chief adventurers therein, and Sir Walter Ralegh among the reſt, with a golden chain; for Sir Roger preſum'd, the earl of Eſſex (his great friend, as appears in the hiſtories of this expedition) with the reſt who were in the action, would teſtify, "That I deſerve a chain as "well as my fellows," ſays he.[a] As for the coarſe expreſſion which follows, of "Ralegh's be- "lying his hulk, as he had done the ark of Noah, the beſt ſhip that ever was," tho' it may betray ſome impoliteneſs of manners and impetuoſity of diſpoſition in Sir Roger's civil capacity; yet in the field, and againſt an enemy, thoſe rougher qualities might invigorate his courage and experience, and illuſtrate the military character of the man.

Honour'd with a gold chain.

In the latter end of June this year, and ſome weeks before this diſpute, the Engliſh fleet return'd home; but Ralegh appears firſt to have touch'd upon the coaſt of Ireland, probably to make a ſhort viſit to his ſeigniory there, and ſee ſome of his acquaintance among the new ſettlements in the province of Munſter. We may be pretty well convinc'd that Ralegh was in Ireland this year, from his own writings;[b] and that it was upon his return from a long voyage, out of ſome verſes hereafter following in Spenſer the poet. For here we may obſerve, that while Ralegh was a commander in the Iriſh wars, under the lord Grey, as we have before related, this Edmund Spenſer, then famous for thoſe Paſtorals he had newly publiſhed, going over ſecretary to that nobleman, had frequent opportunities, by his ingenuous converſation, ſo to make his learning and other accompliſhments known, as engag'd the friendſhip of our WORTHY ſo ſubſtantially towards him, that none of the great men in queen Elizabeth's court, after the death of Sir Philip Sidney, was ſo great a patron to that extraordinary genius as Sir Walter Ralegh. Indeed the queen her ſelf, in regard that Spenſer employ'd his time ſo commendably in Ireland, as afterwards more publickly appear'd, in the excellent Political View he made of that kingdom, gave him a conſiderable tract of land out of earl Deſmond's capacious forfeitures, amounting, at the loweſt computation that has been made, to three thouſand acres of ground, lying in the county of Cork; the preſervation and improvement whereof engaged Spenſer to ſettle there; and a pleaſant ſeat he had, at Kilcolman near the river Mulla, which ran through his grounds, and which he has ſo beautifully deſcrib'd in ſome of his poems. Here it was in this retirement that Ralegh now paid him a viſit, the circumſtances whereof Spenſer himſelf has moſt agreeably celebrated in that poem, which, about two years after this time, he dedicated To the right worthy and noble knight Sir Walter Ralegh, &c. In this dedication he has theſe Viſits Spenſer the poet.

[a] Copy of Sir Roger Williams's letter to the lord-treaſurer, the lord-admiral, and Mr. ſecretary Walſingham, dated July 24. 1589. a MS. in the Harleyan library. This copy is made on the outſide leaf of the original letter which preſerves the direction, probably in Sir Roger's own hand, a moſt wretched one, which might occaſion the tranſcript; and, probably, his own ſeal; no coat of arms, but a motto; alſo the ancient manner of ſealing, by a paper band. Under the letter there is a note, in the ſame hand that tranſcrib'd it, confirming this expedition, ſet forth at the charges of Norris, Drake, Ralegh, Williams, with other gentlemen, and the ſucceſs of it, according to the particulars above-mention'd, and the publick hiſtories of this time: concluding, "They return'd with great "victory and honour to their country; but not without "heart-burnings and jealouſies among themſelves; with "the queen's diſpleaſure againſt ſome, and Sir Roger "among the reſt, occaſion'd by ſome complaint made "againſt him, in relation to one of thoſe hulks, which "it is probable he plunder'd of more than fell to his "ſhare." There is alſo another note, containing a character of Sir Roger Williams, out of Camden; from whom, and Sir Roger's own writings, I ſhall only obſerve, he was born in Wales; but whether bred at Oxford, doubtful; being taken by the young earl of Pembroke for his page, and then went to ſerve under the prince of Conde in Germany; but, having ſpent all his crowns before that prince march'd to France, was forced to return homeward. At Brabant he was engaged by Julian Romero to ſerve in the Spaniſh army, before there was any diſpute to his knowledge between the crowns of Spain and England. Afterwards he did good ſervice under Norris in Frieſland, Anno 1581, where he fought a Spaniſh captain in ſingle duel; which ended in a ſociable drinking-bout. In 1586, he boldly forced the enemy's camp as far as the prince of Parma's own tent before Venlo, and was that year knighted. He behav'd himſelf alſo bravely at Diepe in France 1591; but at Noyon loſt many Engliſh lives through his raſhneſs. He died 1595, and, as Camden obſerves, having obtained great knowledge in the arts of war, he might perhaps be allowed not inferior to the beſt ſoldiers in that age, could he have put bounds to his courage, which ran quite away with his conduct and diſcretion. However, as he goes on, for a man of no learning or education, and merely by dint of experience to write ſuch a clear and judicious hiſtory of the Low-country wars as he has done, is admir'd at; as alſo his having ſo well maintain'd the Modern Diſcipline, or manner of war, againſt the antiquated admirers of archery, whereof Sir John Smythe wrote in praiſe, 4to. 1590. Sir Walter Ralegh has alſo touch'd upon this military argument in the beginning of his fifth book, and elſewhere, in his Hiſtory of the world.

[b] Where, ſpeaking of the long lives of the patriarchs, and ſome of late memory, he ſays, "I my ſelf knew the "old counteſs of Deſmond of Inchequin in Munſter, who "lived in the year 1589, and many years ſince; who was "married in Edward the fourth's time, and held her join- "ture from all the earls of Deſmond ſince then; and that "this is true, all the nobility and gentlemen of Munſter "could witneſs." Hiſtory of the world, lib. 1. cap. 5. ſect. 5. words; words; "I make you preſent of this ſimple Paſtoral, unworthy of your higher conceipt for "the meanneſs of the ſtyle, but agreeable with the truth, in circumſtance and matter: the "which I humbly beſeech you to accept in part of payment of the infinite debt in which I "acknowledge my ſelf bounden unto you for your ſingular favours and ſundry good turns "ſhewed me at my laſt being in England; and with your good countenance, protect againſt "the malice of evil mouths, which are always wide open to carp at, and miſconſtrue my ſim- "ple meaning." In the paſtoral it ſelf,[a] the poet gives us this deſcription of Ralegh's firſt ac- coſting him in the ſaid rural retirement.

One day, quoth he, I ſat, as was my trade,
Under the foot of Mole, that mountain hore,
Keeping my ſheep amongſt the cooly ſhade
Of the green alders by the Mulla's ſhore;
There a ſtrange ſhepherd chanc'd to find me out,
Whether allured with my pipe's delight,
Whoſe pleaſing ſound yſhrilled far about,
Or thither led by chance, I knew not right,
Whom when I aſked from what place he came,
And how he hight? himſelf he did ycleep
The ſhepherd of the ocean by name,
And ſaid, he came far from the main-ſea deep.
He ſitting me beſide in that ſame ſhade,
Provoked me to play ſome pleaſant fit;
And when he heard the muſick which I made,
He found himſelf full greatly pleas'd at it:
Yet æmuling my pipe, he took in hond
My pipe, before that æmuled of many,
And play'd thereon, for well that ſkill he con'd;
Himſelf as ſkilful in that art as any.

It further appears, they now entertain'd each other with ſome of their poetical compoſi- tions; Spenſer rehearſed a pretty tale he had made of the amours between ſome of his neigh- bouring rivers; but Ralegh's muſe ran upon a more melancholy ſtrain, which, by the tranſient view it gives of ſome little cloud he had lately, but undeſervedly, been under at court, lets us into a piece of his ſecret hiſtory; where the poet tell us,

His ſong was all a lamentable lay
Of great unkindneſs and of uſage hard,
Of Cynthia the lady of the ſea,
Which from her preſence, faultleſs, him debarr'd:
And ever and anon with ſingults rife,
He cried out to make his underſong,
Ah my love's queen, and goddeſs of my life!
Who ſhall me pity, when thou doſt me wrong?

But it immediately appears to have been ſoon blown over by ſome pathetical addreſs of Ralegh's to the queen, whereby he was, at this time, reſtored to her favour, as we may fully conclude from theſe words:

——— Right well he ſure did 'plain,
That could great Cynthia's ſore diſpleaſure break,
And move to take him to her grace again.

And this is confirm'd a little further, where, through Ralegh's affection for his welfare, and his regret to behold ſo rare a genius baniſh'd to a deſart, and buried in ſuch a ſtate of ob- ſcurity, he perſuades Spenſer to go along with him into England, and proffers to introduce him to the queen. The poet, knowing his intereſt, embraced his offer. Then having given a de- ſcription of the ſea, with Ralegh's great ſhip, ſuitable to the ſimplicity of the character he aſ-ſumes;

ſumes; and having repreſented Ralegh's deſcription of the flocks and herds of that Royal Shepherdeſs, which were kept upon thoſe watry hills, under the charge of Triton and Proteus, he makes him further ſay:

And I among the reſt, of many leaſt,
Have in the ocean charge to me aſſign'd;
Where I will live or die at her beheaſt,
And ſerve and honour her with faithful mind.

Brings him into England.

He then proceeds to the progreſs of their voyage, how they paſſed by the Iſle of Lundy, and landed at St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall; ſo took their journey to the court, where the poet having expatiated on the dazling preſence of the queen, agreeable to the admiration of a ſpectator, in his paſtoral character, we have this further acknowledgment.

Introduces him to the queen's favour.

The ſhepherd of the ocean, quoth he,
Unto the goddeſs' grace me firſt enhanc'd:
And to my oaten pipe inclin'd her ear,
That ſhe thenceforth therein 'gan take delight,
And it deſir'd, at timely hours to hear;
All were my notes but rude and roughly dight.

This honour the poet further magnifies, as the more wond'rous condeſcenſion in her majeſty, in that ſhe had ſo many more learned ſhepherds about her to glorify her name. Here he takes an opportunity to give a character of the ſeveral poets and wits then ſhining in her court: among the reſt,

And there that ſhepherd of the ocean is,
That ſpends his wit in love's conſuming ſmart:
Full ſweetly temper'd is that muſe of his,
That can impierce a prince's mighty heart.

As to Ralegh's poetical talents, we ſhall hear more of them very ſpeedily. In this place, we muſt purſue his farther deſign of bringing Spenſer over into England, which was to make him oblige the publick with what he had hitherto finiſh'd of his capital work, call'd the Fairy Queen. For, tho' Spenſer had begun this grand poem through the encouragement of Sir Philip Sidney, before he went over into Ireland; yet it was there he ſeems to have writ moſt of what we have in print; and now, by the encouragement of Sir Walter Ralegh, that he was brought to publiſh the three firſt books which he had compleated thereof: 'tis certain he took his advice in the publication of them, and particularly in drawing up a plan to explain or diſcover the general intention and meaning of that allegorical poem. This he directed to his ſaid patron, The right noble and valorous Sir Walter Ralegh, &c. in a letter dated the 23d of January this year 1589; concluding with "An humble requeſt for the con-"tinuance of his honourable favours, and wiſhes for the eternal eſtabliſhment of his happineſs." This letter is printed at the end of the ſaid firſt three books of that poem, which were publiſhed at London the enſuing year. Among the commendatory verſes thereto alſo ſubjoined, the firſt two copies are both ſaid to be written by Sir Walter Ralegh, and not without great probability, being ſubſcribed with the initial letters of his name. The firſt of theſe copies, written in alternate verſe, is highly poetical; for our author, correſpondent with the viſionary manner of his author, fancying himſelf in the temple of the veſtal virgins, where his curioſity led him to the tomb of Laura, which was guarded by Love and Virtue, he was ſuddenly attracted from thence, by the appearance of the Fairy Queen, at whoſe approach the Soul of Petrarch wept; ſeeing thoſe graces deſert that miſtreſs of his, to attend upon this royal lady, and oblivion ſupply their place. The compliment is ſurely fine, and perhaps the more judiciouſly expreſs'd, in not being bounded more periodically than it is, according to the doctrine of our modern criticks in the ſtructure of verſification; for being the recital of one ſolemn and ſurpriſing thought, it may engage our attention more cloſely to the end of the two or three quadrains it is compris'd in, than if the author had affected to divide or bound the ſenſe with a full period at the end of every four lines. But every reader may eaſily judge for himſelf, the poem being in moſt editions of Spenſer, and therefore needs not here be recited. His other verſes upon this poet are compos'd in a meaſure more obſolete to the manner of our age; but what what the queen her ſelf imitated, in ſome poetry ſtill to be ſeen of her writing, being in lines of ſix and ſeven feet long; and it is no more to be objected, that an author did not in this particular apparel his mind to the mode of all ages, than his body. It may be ſufficient therefore to obſerve, there is a diſtinguiſh'd conduct alſo in this performance; for the induction is writ with great modeſty, in regard to himſelf.

The praiſe of meaner wits, this work like profit brings;
As doth the cuckow's ſong, delight, when Philomela ſings.

And, having advertiſed the poet that his portraits are to be judg'd of or improv'd by the originals of thoſe virtues whereof he has compos'd his fictitious queen, he very dexterouſly transfers or appropriates them to the real one then reigning: ſo concludes with a compliment to him; which tho' of a very tranſcendent and abſolute nature, yet in regard to the little good Engliſh poetry then in being, and the great fame of that poet ſtill ſurviving among us, is ſtill thought not more expreſſive of Sir Walter Ralegh's affection, than his judgment:

Of me no lines are lov'd, nor letters are of price,
Of all that ſpeak the Engliſh tongue, but thoſe of thy device.

We further obſerve among the copies of verſes inſcrib'd by Spenſer himſelf, at the end of his ſaid Fairy Queen, to the ſeveral miniſters of ſtate and noblemen in queen Elizabeth's court, one to the noble and valorous Sir Walter Ralegh, &c. as he again ſtyles him: and this, becauſe it not only informs us what a favourite Ralegh was at this time with the queen; but alſo gives us occaſion to dilate upon his own poetical productions a little more copiouſly than opportunity has before offer'd, I muſt here entirely repeat.

To thee that are the ſummer's nightingale,
Thy ſoveraign goddeſſes moſt dear delight,
Why do I ſend this ruſtick madrigal,
That may thy tuneful ear unſeaſon quite?
Thou only fit this argument to write;
In whoſe high thoughts pleaſure hath built her bowre,
And dainty love learn'd ſweetly to indite:
My Rhimes I know unſav'ry are and ſowre,
To taſte the ſtreams, which, like a golden ſhowre,
Flow from thy fruitful head, of thy love's praiſe,
Fitter perhaps to thunder martial ſtowre,
When ſo thee liſt thy lofty muſe to raiſe:
Yet till that thou thy poem wilt make known,
Let thy fair Cynthia's praiſes be thus rudely ſhown.

Hence we learn Sir Walter Ralegh wrote a poem, call'd Cynthia; that it was in praiſe of the queen, and that it was not now publiſh'd. Spenſer, in his letter to Ralegh above-cited, alſo mentions again ſomething of this poem, where he ſays, "In that Fairy Queen, I mean "glory in my general intention; but in my particular, I conceive the moſt excellent and glo- "rious perſon of our ſoveraign the queen, and her kingdom, in Fairy-land. And yet in ſome "places elſe, I do otherwiſe ſhadow her. For conſidering ſhe beareth two perſons; the one, "of a moſt royal queen or empreſs; the other, of a moſt virtuous and beautiful lady; this lat- "ter part, in ſome places, I do expreſs in Belphœbe; faſhioning her name according to your own "excellent conceit of Cynthia; Phœbe and Cynthia being both names of Diana." This is all I remember to have met with of that poem.

But this very year that Ralegh was in Ireland, there was a book publiſh'd by a learned and ingenious gentleman; in which others of Ralegh's poems, and perhaps that before mention'd, are quoted with great commendation;[a] as if theſe few little pieces had before

Eminent for his own poetry.

[a] This treatiſe, now very ſcarce, is call'd The Art of Engliſh Poeſy; contrived into three books: the firſt of poets and poeſy; the ſecond of proportion; the third of ornament. London, 4to. 1589. I never ſaw but one of them, and this is in the curious library of that worthy owner James Weſt Eſq; of the Middle Temple. There is a wooden print of the queen before it; and, tho' dedicated to the lord Burghley, the work is addreſs'd directly to the queen. Therefore that paſſage in the firſt book, cap. 26. where the author is ſo luxuriant upon the Epithalamies, or poetical manner of celebrating marriages; and that in the third book, cap. 23. where he makes the Imperial ambaſſador, a Bohemian born, ſo bluntly expreſs in the French tongue what a gallant horſe-woman the empreſs was, will, among ſome others, be allow'd very remarkable, in a book ſo publickly and ſo particularly tender'd to the peruſal of our virgin-queen.

before this time render'd him eminent, and advanc'd his name among the prime wits or leading poets of the age; not that we are ſure they were now in common print, or vulgarly known to be his; for the ſaid author, ſpeaking of the moſt conſiderable writers in Engliſh poetry, ſays; "In her majeſty's time ſprung up another company of courtly poets, who "have writ excellently well, if their doings could be found out and made publick with the "reſt; of which number is Edward earl of Oxford, Thomas lord Buckhurſt, when young, "Henry lord Paget, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Walter Ralegh, and many others; ſome of whom "he further names." [a] Then proceeding to give his judgment in ſhort characters of them; and having diſtinguiſh'd the earl of Oxford for Comedy, Buckhurſt for Tragedy, Sir Philip Sidney, and the other gentleman who wrote the late Shepherd's Calender (meaning Spenſer) for Eclogue and Paſtoral, he adds; "For Ditty and amorous Ode, I find Sir Walter Ralegh's vein moſt lofty, inſolent, and paſſionate." [b] But it is in the chapter of Sententious or Rhetorical Figures, that this critic illuſtrates his obſervations, by ſome examples out of Sir Walter Ralegh's poems; which, becauſe rare to be met with, and not prolix, nor violating the privileges of particular and perſonal narrative, I ſhall here rehearſe; the rather, becauſe theſe fragments may both give further light into the genius, as well as hiſtory perhaps of their author, and help the enquiries of ſuch readers, as are curious in comparing the monuments of ancient and modern wit, to recover and revive the entire pieces from whence they are extracted. That critic therefore, where he is ſpeaking of ſome elegant tautologies in poetry, and particularly the excellences of the Anaphora, or figure of Report, as he tranſlates it, gives us the following example, written by Sir Walter Ralegh; whether in his Cynthia, I cannot yet tell; but, to his greateſt miſtreſs, in moſt excellent verſes, ſays that author.

In vain, my eyes, in vain you waſte your tears;
In vain my ſighs, the ſmokes of my deſpairs:
In vain you ſearch the earth and heav'ns above;
In vain you ſeek, for fortune keeps my love. [c]

Further ſpeaking of the Epizeuxis, which he Engliſhes the Underlay or Cuckow-Spell, another ſort of repetition, when in one verſe we iterate one word without intermiſſion, he brings, as an example, that of Sir Watler Ralegh; very ſweet, ſays he.

With wiſdom's eyes, had but blind fortune ſeen,
Then had my love, my love for ever been. [d]

And in another place, to diſtinguiſh that form of repetition, called Ploche, or the Doubler, a ſpeedy iteration of one word, but with ſome little intermiſſion, he exemplifies the two cloſing verſes of a moſt excellent ditty, as he calls it, written by Sir Walter Ralegh. Theſe two cloſing verſes confirm the genuineneſs of thoſe which precede them in a tranſcript of this very ditty I once ſaw in a nobleman's library, from the copy of a celebrated lady, [e] who probably had

But for the reſt, it contains many pretty obſervations, examples, characters and fragments of poetry for thoſe times, now no-where elſe to be met with; which if ſome of our modern criticks had read, they would have been better acquainted than they were, with certain antiquities in the Engliſh meter, whereof they have erroneouſly ſpoken. The author was educated at Oxford; born about the year 1530, or not long after; and wrote ſeveral other books, whereof he gives us the titles himſelf. So that if his name was Puttenham, one of the queen's gentlemen-penſioners, as Anthony Wood thinks, he was entitled to a more diſtinct remembrance in his book of Oxford writers. That he was a courtier, is viſible; alſo had been a traveller, and ſeen the courts of foreign princes; wherefore his illuſtrations, both hiſtorical and political, are drawn ſo familiarly from thence, that he may be call'd the court-critic of that reign.

[b] Ib. p. 51. Some modern authors, and among them Edward Philips, as I remember, in his Theatrum Poetarum, 12mo. 1675, but I am ſure A. Wood. vol. 1. col. 436, and others from him, have, in the quotation of this character, changed that middle epithet for the word condolent; perhaps through an unneceſſary tenderneſs; every word of that character being ſpoken, and to be underſtood, in a ſenſe of praiſe.

[e] Lady Iſabella Thynne; the ſame who is ſo finely celebrated by Mr. Waller, tho' her ſirname is no-where to be found in any of the printed editions I have ſeen of his poems: but I have had an old MS. collection, in which one poem is directed to the lady Iſabella Thynne cutting trees in paper; which poem is printed among Mr. Waller's, but her name left out. In the print alſo we have only a fragment; but my copy had it entire. For the poem which follows it, in Mr. Waller's printed collection, is a compliment to the ſame lady for reſtoring him this piece, becauſe he deſired to print it, tho' the laſt thought was torn off and loſt; which, to his regret, he never could recollect; ſo was obliged to print it imperfectly, in his own apprehenſions at leaſt, tho' all the world beſides have looked upon what is printed of it as a perfect maſter-piece, even of that great hand: and for our conſolation it may be obſerv'd, if he had not loſt this concluſion, we ſhould have loſt that fine poem, which was the conſequence of it. The ſentiment this MS. could have reſtored him, conſiſted, as I think, of ſix lines, but that I cannot repeat them all; yet preſume, upon the favour which is due to the fair ſex, that it will not be thought an unwelcome digreſſion here to preſerve what I can of them, and as well as I can, leſt they ſhould be loſt again, by not having an opportunity to remember them elſewhere.

A poet, when he would deſcribe his mind,
Is, as in language, ſo in fame confin'd:
Your works are read, where-ever there are men;
So far the ſciſſer goes beyond the pen.

it out of the family. 'Tis there entitled, The Excuſe, written by Sir Walter Ralegh, in his younger years. And, becauſe by the foregoing parts of this admir'd ditty the concluſion will be beſt underſtood, I ſhall here repeat the whole from the aforeſaid tranſcript; not doubting but the modern readers will judge of it by its contemporary writings; or if by their own, after due conſideration, how they may be judg'd of near a hundred and fifty years hence; but more eſpecially, that the readers may ſee with what artful ſimplicity the author could reconcile himſelf to his paſſion, whether real or feign'd, when he found, upon a ſtrict examination, he had not been indirectly betray'd to it.

Calling to mind my eyes went long about,
To cauſe my heart for to forſake my breaſt;
All in a rage, I ſought to pull them out;
As who had been ſuch traitors to my reſt:
What could they ſay to win again my grace?
Forſooth, that they had ſeen my miſtreſs' face.

Another time, my heart I call'd to mind;
Thinking that he this woe on me had brought;
Becauſe that he, to love, his force reſign'd,
When of ſuch wars my fancy never thought:
What cou'd he ſay when I wou'd him have ſlain?
That he was hers--- and had forgone my chain.

At laſt, when I perceiv'd both eyes and heart
Excuſe themſelves, as guiltleſs of my ill;
I found my ſelf the cauſe of all my ſmart,
And told my ſelf, that I my ſelf would kill:
Yet when I ſaw my ſelf to you was true;
I lov'd my ſelf, becauſe my ſelf lov'd you.

This poem, I have been told, is printed under Sir Walter Ralegh's name, in a modern collection,[a] not much to be ſuſpected of having had it from any ancient manuſcript, therefore probably from ſome old copy in print, which I have not yet met with. There is one old collection I never ſaw, printed about the time we are now upon, with ſeveral of Sir Philip Sidney's ſonnets in it, and therefore I think under his name;[b] which poſſibly may contain ſome alſo of Sir Walter Ralegh's. But in that modern collection there is alſo printed, not over-correctly it ſeems, another poem of his: this I have likewiſe ſeen in manuſcript, where it is call'd the Silent Lover; and have heard ſeveral lines in it applauded, eſpecially the beginning. But the part, which would be moſt agreeable in this place to an hiſtorical reader, is that from which he might fancy he could make ſome further gueſſes at the object of Ralegh's addreſs; tho' after all it may be no other than the common object of all poets: however, the lines are theſe:

But ſeeing that I ſue to ſerve
A ſaint of ſuch perfection,
As all deſire, and none deſerve
A place in her affection;
I rather chuſe to want relief,
Than venture the revealing;
Where glory recommends the grief,
Deſpair diſdains the healing.

And a little further, very perſuaſively:

Silence in love betrays more woe
Than words, tho' never ſo witty;
A beggar that is dumb, you know,
May challenge double pity.

could break it himſelf with as much ſucceſs, as now he ſeems to have commanded the keeping it. All that I have ſeen more of his juvenile compoſitions in this kind, is a paſtoral ſonnet, which old Mr. Iſaac Walton reciting, tells us was written by Sir Walter Ralegh, in his younger years,[a] in anſwer to another, famous alſo in thoſe days, compoſed by Chriſtopher Marlow; but as both theſe ſonnets are involv'd in a collection which the bookſellers or publiſhers have called Shakeſpear's poems, printed between twenty and thirty years after his death,[b] in which I think ſeveral pieces are known to have been written by other poets; the reader is left at liberty to judge whether the authority of a writer, who ſubſcribes his name thereto, one, of Walton's noted ſincerity, and advantages for intelligence by his acquaintance among the men of literature in thoſe times; or that of an anonymous publication in the circumſtances aforeſaid, is to be preferr'd; without urging the improbability that Shakeſpear ſhould quote a ſtanza, from that aſcrib'd to Marlow, afterwards in one of his own plays, if he had been the author of that ſonnet himſelf.[c]

THERE is another poet beſides Spenſer, who writ ſomething of Ralegh relating to theſe times, tho' near twenty years after them; and as on a different ſubject, ſo with a different diſpoſition towards him. This poet was Sir John Harrington, the tranſlator of Orlando Furioſo; but that which he is here mention'd for, is a little book in proſe, yet not clear of poetry,[d] tho' it was intended for a piece of church-hiſtory, and as a ſupply to Dr. Francis Godwin's Catalogue of Biſhops. This, at the time that Ralegh was under royal diſpleaſure in the next reign, and in confinement; but growing into favour with the hopeful prince of Wales, Sir John Harrington, then a courtier, preſented to that prince: 'tis full of little jeſts and tales againſt the married clergy, and againſt ſome of the laity who had any controverſies with them, the better to inſinuate with that young prince, and engage his attention; otherwiſe the author would doubtleſs have written it with a gravity ſuitable to the ſubject; but he tells the prince, "he took "ſome kind of pleaſure with the pains of writing it, ſuppoſing (ſays he) I was all the while "telling a ſtory as it were in your highneſs's preſence and hearing."[e] Among the ſtories he tells, there is one concerning Dr. Thomas Godwin, biſhop of Bath and Wells, and Sir Walter Ralegh, it ſeems;[f] the relation of which, becauſe that biſhop died about the latter end of 1590, we ſhall not longer defer. This biſhop, he tells us, came to that ſee, among his other good qualities, unreproveable for Simony, and in the queen's good opinion: if he had held on as clear as he enter'd, I ſhould have highly extoll'd him, ſays our author; but, continues he, ſee his misfortune, which firſt loſt him the queen's favour, and after forced him to another miſchief. For being aged, diſeaſed, and lame of the gout, he married, as ſome thought, for opinion of wealth, ſays he, a London widow, his ſecond wife at leaſt: when a chief favourite of that time (whom he had named before in this kind, and therefore thought by ſome,[g] as perhaps it might be, Sir Walter Ralegh) had labour'd to get the manor of Banwell from this biſhoprick; but diſdaining the repulſe, and hearing of this intempeſtive marriage, he took advantage thereof, caus'd it to be told the queen (knowing how much ſhe miſliked ſuch matches) and inſtantly purſued the biſhop with letters and mandates for the manor of Banwell for a hundred years. The good biſhop, ſays he, not expecting ſuch a ſudden tempeſt, was greatly perplex'd; yet a while he held out, and endured many ſharp meſſages from the queen; of which my ſelf, ſays he, carried one, deliver'd to me by my lord of Leiceſter, who ſeem'd to favour the biſhop, and miſlike the knight for moleſting him; but they were ſoon agreed, ſays he, like Pilot and Herod to condemn Chriſt. And further tells us, never was harmleſs man ſo traduced to his ſoveraign; as that he had married a girl; had convey'd half the biſhoprick to her; and, becauſe he had the gout, that he could not ſtand to his marriage.—The concluſion to the premiſſes, he tells us, was, that to pacify his perſecutors, and to ſave Banwell, he was fain to part with Wilſcomb for ninety-nine years; and ſo purchaſed his peace. We may hence obſerve this matter was in agitation before Leiceſter's death, which was two years before this time; but, as the biſhop ſeems to have linger'd before he clos'd, it might be near this time before it was brought to a perfect concluſion. And, as he did not hold on ſo clear as he enter'd, it might be with reference to the Simony before-mention'd; the rather, becauſe a biſhop who would not ſcruple at his years to marry for money, might be reaſonably thought not impreghable, through the ſame motive, againſt a divorcement from his biſhoprick: which way ſoever it was, the queen ſaw it not unreaſonable, but eſpouſed the alienation; ſo that it was her gift. And the biſhop's own ſon, Dr. Francis Godwin, when he was a biſhop alſo, and reviving his Catalogue of Biſhops, in the next reign, before Ralegh was out of priſon, makes no complaint againſt him in the account of his father's life; tho' he might ſafely, if he could juſtly, have done it, and Ralegh had been poſſeſs'd of that for which this author's father had not, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, received ſatisfaction.[a] On the contrary, with much modeſty, rather laments that his father ſhould take upon him the duties of eccleſiaſtical government, when his infirmities had render'd him unable to diſcharge them.[b] His manor of Wilſcombe.

If this affair did any ways diſpleaſe the hierarchy, there was another occurrence fell out about this time, in which Ralegh, by ſhewing a generous and charitable inſtance of his power and intereſt, might give ſome further umbrage for its diſpleaſure. It was in the caſe of Mr. John Udall, miniſter of the goſpel, a good ſcholar, and a man of good parts; but very zealous for the reformation of the church, even under the epiſcopal government; for which he was reckon'd among the Nonconformiſts, or rather Puritans of thoſe times. He had been bred at Cambridge; was ſeven years miniſter of Kingſton upon Thames; and, through the favour of the earl of Huntington, about a twelvemonth at Newcaſtle upon Tine. Here he was ſilenc'd, ſent for to London by letters from the lord-chamberlain Hunſdon, in the name of the council,[c] and examin'd about a book he had newly publiſhed againſt the clergy.[d] But becauſe, contrary to the laws, he would not betray himſelf, ſays my author, he was committed cloſe priſoner to the Gatehouſe; debarr'd of all communication with his family or others; thence convey'd to Croydon in July this preſent year 1590; brought to the bar in fetters, and indicted for publiſhing a libel againſt the queen. No evidence vivâ voce produc'd to atteſt it, but only depoſitions taken in the high commiſſion-court, no court of record, and hearſay reports urg'd againſt him, his witneſſes not being permitted to teſtify in his behalf, becauſe the court ſaid it was againſt the queen: the words of the ſtatute being wreſted, ſays my author, by baron Clark and ſerjeant Puckering, as if the treatiſe call'd, The Demonſtration of Diſcipline, for which Udall was now indicted, becauſe written againſt biſhops who exercis'd their government under the queen, was therefore conſequently written againſt her royal perſon. So the ſaid judges directed the jury to find Udall author of the book without legal proof, and to leave the felony to them. The jury did as they were taught, being told it ſhould be no further danger to the author, but tend to his good; of which verdict they afterwards repented. Then he was kept half a year uncondemn'd in durance; and at the aſſizes in February following at Southwark, not relinquiſhing his tenets, he had the ſentence of death pronounc'd againſt him by Puckering.[e] But it ſeems before Udall receiv'd this ſentence, he had procur'd a friend to ſollicit Sir Walter Ralegh, that the violent and aggravated conſtructions which had been made of his doctrine and principles, might not be his utter deſtruction, till a more unprejudic'd judgment was made of them; and immediately after the ſentence was pronounc'd, the ſheriff brought him a reprieve from the queen. Then Dr. Bond, one of her chaplains, came to him in priſon with a form of ſubmiſſion for him to ſubſcribe. After two days conference, they agreed upon another. But, ſays Udall, "at the ſame time that Dr. Bond "was with me, I receiv'd a letter from a friend of mine that did ſollicit Sir Walter Ralegh for me."[f] This letter he then exhibits, and thereby it appears Ralegh had adviſed or encouraged Udall to explain himſelf to him concerning thoſe imputations which had been infuſed into her majeſty, which accuſed him with maintaining, the church of England and its ſacraments were no church and no ſacraments; that its laws and her government were againſt the word of God; that all

The horrible treaſon in this book it ſeems (which was inſerted in the indictment) lay in theſe words to the biſhops: "Who can, without bluſhing, deny you to be the "cauſe of all ungodlineſs, ſeeing your government is that "which giveth leave to a man to be any thing ſaving a "ſound chriſtian: for certainly it is more free in theſe "days to be a Papiſt, an Anabaptiſt, of the Family of "Love; yea, any wicked one whatſoever, than that "which we ſhould be: and I could live theſe twenty "years any ſuch in England, yea, in a biſhop's houſe "may-be, and never be moleſted for it. So true is that "which you are charged with in a dialogue lately come "forth againſt you, and ſince burned by you; That you "care for nothing but the maintenance of your dignities, be "it to the damnation of your own ſouls, and infinite millions "more." Strype's Life and Acts of Archbiſhop Whitgift, fol. 1718. p. 343.

This pamphlet is Udall's own account of the whole proſecution againſt him; whether printed in the queen's time, I cannot tell; but the ſame account, I think, that is reprinted in the State-Trials; tho' the title to this pamphlet is adapted to the time wherein it was now printed; and the preface is a clear abſtract of the whole.

eccleſiaſtical matters ought to be governed by a presbytery; and that ſhe ought to be ſubject to the cenſures thereof; for (ſays that correſpondent) "If ye will write half a dozen lines to "Sir Walter Ralegh concerning theſe opinions, that he may ſhew it to her majeſty, he hopes "to obtain your life. I know it is very eaſy for you to anſwer all thoſe things, therefore do "it with ſpeed; and in your writing to Sir Walter take knowledge, that he hath ſent you "ſuch word." Hereupon Udall wrote a letter, which he alſo ſets forth, directed to the right honourable Sir Walter Ralegh, Knt. lord-warden of the ſtanniaries, wherein, after the remembrance of his duty and thanks for his great and honourable care over him and for his good, he moſt humbly beſeeches him to be a means to appeaſe her majeſty's diſpleaſure for the accuſations untruly ſuggeſted againſt him.

"For God is my witneſs (continues he) I have never had any earthly thing in ſo precious ac-"count as to honour her highneſs, and to draw her ſubjects to acknowledge with all thankful-"neſs, the exceeding bleſſings that God beſtoweth upon them by her majeſty's happy govern-"ment; whereof I truſt my adverſaries will be witneſs when I am dead. I have ſent unto your "lordſhip (as in perplexity I could upon the ſudden) what I hold upon certain points declared "unto me, as from your lordſhip, praying, that it would pleaſe you to make known the truth "thereof unto her highneſs: and if neither my ſubmiſſion heretofore delivered, nor theſe things "now ſet down, will be accepted to draw her highneſs of her gracious compaſſion to pardon "me, that yet it would pleaſe her majeſty, that the land may not be charged with my blood, "to change my puniſhment from death to baniſhment. Thus truſting your lordſhip will "vouchſafe me this favour, and that it will pleaſe her majeſty thereupon graciouſly to conſi-"der me, I humbly take my leave from the White Lyon, Feb. 22. 1590." [a] Herewith he ſent the tenets he maintained, or articles of his perſuaſion, which are to be ſeen immediately following the ſaid letter in his own narrative, and elſewhere. [b] After this he remain'd, according to his own expreſſion, without great hope of liberty, yet without fear of further extremity. [c] Whence it may be righty obſerved by ſome hiſtorians, that Sir Walter Ralegh, through his generous interceſſion, did procure Udall's reprieve, or ſave him from execution. Till a few months after, being further peſter'd with ſtricter forms of ſubmiſſion, by Dr. Andrews, he was forced to make further applications, not only by the earl of Eſſex, but Sir Walter Ralegh again, and dean Nowell, againſt the menaces of the approaching aſſizes at Kingſton. [d] About the ſame time the king of Scots alſo wrote a letter to the queen in behalf of the ſaid Mr. Udall, and other learned nonconformiſts. [e] But this wrought only ſo far, when Udall was brought to Kingſton, that he was immediately returned to priſon before the firſt day of the trials, and thereupon the unlucky diſturbance of Hacket the enthuſiaſt enſuing, Udall was diſcouraged from making further ſollicitation till the lord-chancellor Hatton died. [f] The Eaſter after which, he ſued for liberty to go to church, which was denied him, being a condemn'd man: but, by the lord-treaſurer's means, getting a copy of the indictment, and a pardon fram'd according to it, he was refer'd therewith to archbiſhop Whitgift; "Unto whom (ſays he) I both ſent "divers petitions, and dutiful letters; and alſo got many of my friends, both honourable per-"ſonages and others, to ſue to him; yet could not his good-will be gotten." [g] And when the Turkey merchants apply'd to his Grace, that Udall might go over to Guinea, he would not conſent to that, unleſs they would be bound he ſhould not return till he had her majeſty's licenſe; but to this Udall would not conſent. And tho' Sir John Puckering, now lord-keeper,

His generous interceſſion for Mr. Udall.

[a] We may obſerve, that Udall, in this letter, here quoted from his ſaid narrative, addreſſes Sir Walter Ralegh (as lord-warden) by the title of his Lordſhip; but, as Mr. Strype copies it, in his life of Whitgift, fol. 376, that word is changed for his Honour, as if this author, or thoſe he takes this part of his materials from, had copied the letter out of Udall's narrative, and helped him (in their thoughts) to a title more proper for Sir Walter Ralegh. If Mr. Strype had ſeen this pamphlet, it will make ſomething againſt the character of his ſincerity, in advancing ſo much his archbiſhop's chriſtian mildneſs; ſee his life, fol. 344. and repreſenting him to have been moſt active in procuring Udall's pardon, by his effectual interceſſions with the queen; as if the queen only was inexorable at Udall's endeavour to reform her biſhops; which is partially throwing all the cruelty Udall ſuffer'd upon her; when it will plainly appear in the ſequel of this pamphlet, that Whitgift was the chief author of it; and yet, if Mr. Strype had ſeen this letter to Sir Walter Ralegh in Udall's pamphlet, 'tis to be thought, he would have corrected the date in his own copy by it, which is a whole year too late; not that he is over-correct in other dates, even of this ſtory (which is inconnectedly told, and confuſed with repetitions) for, in two places of the archbiſhop's life, he tells us, Udall died 1593, ſee fol. 344 and 345; and in a third, fol. 375, that he died, which is moſt probable, in 1592; and a little further quotes a letter of Udall's to the lord-treaſurer, dated in 1591, wherein he tells his lordſhip, he had been in durance above three years.

was at laſt moved (who indeed had much reaſon to be ſo) to deal with the archbiſhop, ſo that both promiſed to obtain Udall's pardon of her majeſty, and liberty for the ſaid voyage; yet Udall never enjoyed one or the other, for he died in priſon before they were fully confirmed. [b]

HERE we may give another inſtance of Ralegh's friendly and generous exerciſe of his power and intereſt, for an old officer in the army, ſince there is no date to it, that confines us to any particular year; and, if we may gueſs at the ſucceſs of his requeſt by the zeal of it, we ſhall not doubt, but it effectually obliged his petitioner with the fruits thereof. This officer had a ſum of money long owing him, it ſeems, from the treaſury, and, knowing how well Ralegh was acquainted with the juſtice of the debt, no leſs than what influence his applications would be of for procuring it, prevail'd on him to write to the lord-treaſurer's ſecretary, who was afterwards knighted, and well known by the name of Sir Michael Hicks, that he might obtain his lordſhip's order for the payment of the money. Theſe are the words of his letter: " I am moſt earneſtly to intreat you for this gentleman, captain Spring; that partly for love, " partly for honeſt conſideration, you will further him with my lord-treaſurer for a debt of " three hundred pounds, which her majeſty owes him. It hath been long due; and he has " got good warrant for it: beſides, he has ſerved her majeſty very long, and hath received " many wounds in her ſervice. Theſe reaſons delivered by a man of your utterance, and " having his good angel at your elbow to inſtruct you, I doubt not, but it will take good and " ſpeedy effect. (Concluding) I never wrote unto you for any man, or in any matter, " wherein you ſhall more bind me unto you, than for this bearer: and ſo not doubting of " your aſſured friendlineſs, I leave you to God; and remain your moſt aſſured loving friend." In a poſtſcript he ſays, " Always remember you muſt deal conſcionably for my ſake, and I " will requite you." [c] Examples of this kind ſhew men worthy of the power they enjoy, and ſhine brighter in their characters than many actions of a more publick and magnificent nature; power being ſo often corrupted with pride and other paſſions, as frequently render the poſſeſſors of it miſchievous, rather than beneficial to their fellow-creatures. But Ralegh, in theſe and many other inſtances, was ſo far from miſuſing, that, above the narrow apprehenſions of repulſe, or laying himſelf under obligations, he appears to have exerted it in the moſt ſtrenuous and generous manner, either for preventing or relieving the diſtreſs of others, which moved the greater compaſſion when his own miſfortunes brought him to need, and yet to fail of the like liberal and ſucceſsful mediation for himſelf. The truth is, Ralegh was ſo famous in theſe days, for ſuch-like good offices, that the queen ſeems to have diſtinguiſhed him by a title more honourable, in the proper ſenſe it is to be here taken, than any other ſhe conferred upon him: for one day, having told her he had a favour to beg of her, When, Sir Walter, ſaid ſhe, will you ceaſe to be a beggar? To which he anſwered, When your gracious majeſty ceaſes to be a benefactor. [d] With great juſtice therefore ſeems, a certain noted author of theſe times, to have adapted his work to a patron, when he dedicated a diſcourſe upon Friendſhip, which he publiſhed not long before this time, to Sir Walter Ralegh. [e]

And for captain Spring.

BUT friendſhip made ſuch a rare and laſting impreſſion on him, that it may be ſaid to have extended beyond the life of the object; and he well deſerves to be remembered in his grave, who could leave us ſuch noble patterns in memory of the dead. But this place requires only our notice of the memorial he wrote, to clear from ſome Spaniſh aſperſions, the fame and conduct of the valiant and renowned Sir Richard Grenvill, in that bloody expedition, where he made ſuch a glorious, tho' untimely end. and waited ſix months at Flores, one of thoſe iſlands, in expectation of the ſaid fleet. As there was, beſides the Engliſh Ships before number'd, one alſo of Sir Walter's in this expedition, named Bark Raleigh, commanded by captain Thynne; and as he employ'd ſome time in the latter end of this year to deſcribe that memorable engagement they had with the Spaniards; the brief abſtract I ſhall give thereof from his own words, cannot be arraign'd of prolixity, nor perhaps of digreſſion; ſince, beſides his gratitude for the paſt ſervices of his heroic kinſman, it ſo well diſplays his ſentiments at this time of the religious hypocriſies and cruelties of their common enemy. The king of Spain therefore, having had intelligence of their waiting thus for his Indian fleet, ſent an Armada to the Azores of fifty-three ſail to convoy it home, under the command of Don Alphonſo Baçan. This fleet was juſt in ſight of the Engliſh by then they had any warning of it; and they were ſo unprepar'd for its reception, that many of their crew were on ſhore, providing ballaſt, water, and other neceſſaries; and thoſe who were on board, were half of them, through ſickneſs, unfit for ſervice. The Spaniards were now ſo near at hand, that the Engliſh had ſcarce time to weigh anchor; and Grenvill, in the Revenge, was the laſt upon the place, being deſirous of receiving all his crew aboard from the iſland, whereof he had no leſs than ninety who were ſick and diſeaſed. So that, unable to recover the wind, and having but one hundred ſound men, he was perſuaded to cut his main-ſail, caſt about, and truſt to the ſailing of the ſhip; for the ſquadron of Seville was on his weather-bow: but he, through the greatneſs of his ſpirit, utterly refuſed to turn from the enemy; proteſting he would rather die than be guilty of ſuch diſhonour to himſelf, his country, and her majeſty's ſhip; aſſuring his company he would paſs through the two ſquadrons in ſpite of them, and force thoſe of Seville to give him way; which he perform'd upon divers of the foremoſt, who, as the mariners term it, ſprung their looſ, and fell under the lee of the Revenge: but while he had regard to thoſe who were neareſt, the huge San Philip, being in the wind of him, and approaching, becalm'd his ſails in ſuch manner, that the ſhip could neither make way, nor feel the helm; ſo large and high charged was the Spaniſh galleon, being of fifteen hundred ton, carrying three tire, of eleven pieces in each on a ſide, and diſcharging eight foreright from her chaſe, beſides thoſe of her ſtern-ports. After the Revenge was thus entangled with this Philip, four others looſing up alſo, boarded her, two on the larboard, and two on the ſtarboard. The fight thus beginning at three a-clock in the afternoon, on the laſt of Auguſt the year aforeſaid, continued very terrible all that evening. But San Philip having received the lower tire of the Revenge, charged with croſs-bar ſhot, ſhifted with all expedition, utterly miſliking her firſt greeting. Some ſaid ſhe founder'd hereupon; but this is uncertain. The Spaniſh ſhips were fill'd with ſoldiers; ſome having two hundred, beſides mariners; ſome five, others eight hundred men: in the Engliſh ſhip there were only mariners, with the commanders ſervants, and ſome gentlemen-volunteers. After many exchanges of great and ſmall ſhot, the Spaniards many times attempted to board the Revenge, but were as often beaten back into their own ſhips, or into the ſea; and when a London victualler, who was under the lee of the Revenge, offer'd to undertake any ſervice for her aſſiſtance, Grenvill bid him "Save himſelf, and leave him "to his fortune." The fight thus continuing while the day laſted, and ſome hours of the night, many of the Engliſh were ſlain; ſome of the Spaniſh ſhips ſunk; and in many others there was great ſlaughter: Grenvill, tho' wounded in the beginning of the cloſe fight, was never ſo diſabled as to forſake the upper deck for eight hours together; and then being ſhot into the body with a muſket, as the wound was dreſſing, he was again ſhot into the head, and his ſurgeon at the ſame time wounded to death. Still the fight continued, and as faſt as the Spaniards were beaten off by the Revenge, others came in their places; ſo that by morning ſhe had ſuſtained, for fifteen hours together, the vollies, boardings, and entries of fifteen ſeveral ſhips of war, and repulſed them all; beſides the reſt which batter'd her looſe and at a diſtance. But with the light, increas'd the diſcovery of her diſmal condition; and the more irkſome was the one, in that it would not let her conceal the other from her ſurrounding enemies. [a] Now was to be ſeen nothing

His report of the deſperate fight at the Azores.

[a] As for her friends, the lord Thomas Howard, and the other ſhips, Sir Walter Raleigh further ſays of them, "If all "the reſt had enter'd, all had been loſt; for the very hugeneſs of the Spaniſh fleet, if no other violence had been "offer'd, would have cruſh'd them into ſhivers; of which "the diſhonour, and loſs to the queen, had been far greater "than the ſpoil or harm that the enemy could any way "have receiv'd. Notwithſtanding it is true, that the "lord Thomas would have enter'd between the ſquadrons, "but the reſt would not condeſcend; and the maſter "of his own ſhip offer'd to leap into the ſea, rather than "conduct it with the reſt to be a prey to the enemy; "where there was neither hope nor poſſibility either of "defence or victory. Which alſo, in my opinion, ſays "Raleigh, had ill ſorted with, or anſwer'd the diſcretion "of a general, to commit himſelf and his charge to aſſured deſtruction, without hope or any likelihood of "prevailing thereby, to diminiſh the ſtrength of her majeſty's navy, and enrich the pride and glory of the "enemy. The Forefight of the queen's (continues he) "commanded by Mr. Thomas Vavaſour, performed a "very great fight, and ſtay'd two hours as near the "Revenge as the weather would permit, not forſaking "the fight till he was likely to be encompaſs'd by the "ſquadrons, and with great difficulty clear'd himſelf. "The reſt gave divers vollies of ſhot, and enter'd as far "as the place permitted, and their own neceſſities, to "keep the weather-gage of the enemy, until they were "parted by night." Thus in Sir Walter Raleigh's ſaid report this fight.

but the naked hull of a ſhip, and that almoſt a ſkeleton, having received eight hundred ſhot of great artillery, and ſome under water; her deck cover'd with the limbs and carcaſſes of forty valiant men, the reſt all wounded, and weltering in, or cover'd with their own blood; her maſts all beaten over-board, all her tackle cut aſunder, her upper works razed, and all in effect levell'd with the water; incapable of any further management or motion, but what the billows gave her. Grenvill, now finding their diſtreſs irreparable, commanded the ſhip to be ſunk, that the Spaniards might not carry a ſplinter home as a trophy of their dear-bought victory; dear-bought indeed! the admiral of the Spaniſh hulks, and another great galleon, called the Aſcenſion of Seville, being both ſunk by the ſide of the Revenge; another alſo in the road of St. Michael; and a fourth run herſelf a-ground to ſave her company. There were beſides ſlain and drown'd in this fight two eminent Spaniſh commanders, and near a thouſand of their men, as one of their own officers, who was ſever'd from the fight by the enſuing ſtorm, and taken by a London veſſel, confeſs'd. In that ſtorm, as well the whole Indian fleet, which had now join'd them, as the reſt of the Armada, were ſo diſpers'd and damag'd, that fourteen ſail were caſt away upon the Iſle of St. Michael. On the reſt of the iſlands they alſo loſt fifteen or ſixteen more of their ſhips of war; and of their Indian fleet, which was a hundred and odd ſail, there were alſo above ſeventy conſum'd and taken by our ſhips of London; beſides a very rich one which ſet her ſelf on fire, and five others taken by Mr. Wats's ſhips. Three thouſand carcaſſes were found two or three days after on the Iſle of Tercera; and, by the Spaniards own confeſſion, no leſs than ten thouſand of their countrymen were loſt in this expedition.[a] But to return: Sir Richard exhorted the remainder of his company to truſt in God's mercy, and to none elſe; and, as they had thus long and reſolutely repulſed ſo many enemies, that they would not now leſſen the honour of their country, by any overtures to lengthen for a few hours or days their own lives. Several join'd in opinion with him; but the majority prevail'd, who urg'd, the Spaniard would be as ready to entertain a compoſition, as they to offer it; and that there were divers valiant men yet living, who might do their prince acceptable ſervice, and revenge this action upon the enemy; that the ſhip could be of no uſe either to one or the other, for upon the firſt working of the ſea ſhe muſt needs ſink, being ſo cruſh'd, riv'd, and leaky, having ſix foot water in the hold, that ſhe could never remove out of the place. Accordingly the Spaniſh general Don Alphonſo Baçan did make very honourable conceſſion; yielding that all their lives ſhould be ſav'd, the company ſent into England, and the better ſort only to pay a reaſonable ranſom, free from all gallies or impriſonment. Tho' it may be thought it was not difficult to diſſuade men from death to life, the maſter-gunner would have ſlain himſelf when he found their reſolution thus by reaſon over-borne; but that he was by force with-held. Then the general ſent many boats aboard the Revenge, and divers of the Engliſh ſuſpecting Sir Richard's deſperate diſpoſition to blow up or ſink the ſhip, ſtole away to the Spaniards. But the general prevail'd upon him to remove out of the Revenge, being very unſavory, fill'd as it was, like a ſlaughter-houſe, with the bodies and blood of the dead and wounded. Sir Richard told them, they might do with his body what they pleas'd, for it was now of no uſe to him; and, as he was carried out of the ſhip, he ſwooned, but revived again, and deſir'd the company to pray for him. The general uſed him with the utmoſt humanity, and left nothing unattempted for his recovery; highly reſpecting, or rather admiring, the wonderful and unconquerable reſolution in ſo rare a ſpectacle of conſummate and approv'd intrepidity, who could make ſuch reſiſtance for ſo long time, and ſuch havock upon ſuch an Armada, with a ſingle ſhip and ſo few men. Sir Richard linger'd two or three days, and then died aboard the general, who greatly bewailed his loſs;[b] but the Revenge, with two hundred Spaniards in her, being overtaken by the ſtorms

[a] Linſchoten, in the 99th chapter of his voyages to the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies, ſays, that of the whole fleet and Armada, being 140 ſhips, there were but 32 or 33 arriv'd in Spain and Portugal; and thoſe with ſuch difficulty and diſperſion, that not any two arriv'd together; all the reſt were caſt away upon the iſlands and overwhelm'd in the ſea by that violent ſtorm: ſo that for twenty days after it they did nothing but fiſh for dead men.

[b] The ſame Dutch author, tho' he miſtakes in ſome particulars; as making this engagement to have happen'd a fortnight later, &c. yet agrees with Sir Walter Raleigh that Sir Richard made a wonderful oppoſition; for he mentions, "no leſs than ſeven or eight ſhips boarding the "Revenge; that ſhe reſiſted them at leaſt twelve hours; "that the Spaniards loſt above 400 men in the fight; and "that when Sir Richard was convey'd into the Spaniſh ad"miral's ſhip the St. Paul, all the captains were aſtoniſh"ed at his ſtout and couragious heart, for he ſhew'd no ſign "of faintneſs, nor change of colour; but, feeling the hour "of death approach, ſaid in the Spaniſh tongue, Here die I "Richard Grenvill, with a joyful and quiet mind, having "ended my life like a true ſoldier, that has fought for his "country, queen, religion, and honour, &c. He gives us "further, as an inſtance of his bravery, that while he "continued amongſt the Spaniſh captains, and they were "at dinner or ſupper with him, he would carouſe three or "four glaſſes of wine, and take the glaſſes between his "teeth and cruſh them in pieces, and ſwallow them down; "ſo that often the blood would run out of his mouth, "without any other harm to him." Which I can believe without ſcruple, having ſeen an officer of the army in a frolick do the like, and ſwallow the glaſs he had drank in, all but the ſolid ſtem, or that part which is not mandible; but more cautiouſly than Sir Richard ſeems to have perform'd it, for he drew not a drop of blood from any part of his mouth. As for Grenvill's pedigree, it may be ſeen in the late collection of Engliſh baronets, 12mo. 1728; but the memorials that are attempted of him in H. Holland, Fuller, and Prince, are far ſhort of his actions and deſerts.

aforeſaid, was ſunk with the others above-mention'd, at St. Michael's Iſland. In this manner did they honour the burial of that renown'd ſhip; and thus did ſhe to the laſt make good her name upon them.

THUS have we gather'd from Sir Walter Ralegh what is here moſt material of this extraordinary action; but when he further obſerves the general's former promiſe was not perform'd, of ſetting the priſoners at liberty; ſo that they petition'd to be landed upon the iſlands, hoping to be thence tranſported into England: and alſo the endeavours that were made to corrupt their loyalty, by Morrice Fitz-John (ſon of old John of Deſmond before-mention'd) who ſent to the Engliſh from ſhip to ſhip, perſuading them to ſerve the king of Spain, through the motives of trebling their pay, advancing their condition, and improving their faith, to the ſafety of their ſouls, he is moved to make ſome ſharp and lively reflections upon theſe topicks; on the laſt whereof he expreſſes himſelf in this manner. "For matter of religion, it would re"quire a particular volume to ſet down how irreligiouſly they cover their greedy and am"bitious practices with that veil of piety; for, ſure I am, there is no kingdom or common"wealth in all Europe, but if reform'd, they invade it for religion-ſake: if it be, as they
"term, Catholick, they pretend title; as if the kings of Caſtile were the natural heirs of all "the world; and ſo between both, no kingdom is unfought. Where they dare not with "their own forces invade, they baſely entertain the traitors and vagabonds of all nations;
"ſeeking by thoſe and their renegade jeſuits to win parts; and have by that means
"ruin'd many noble houſes and others in this land, and have extinguiſh'd both their lives and "families. What good, honour, or fortune, ever man yet by them atchiev'd, is yet unheard of,
"or unwritten. And if our Engliſh papiſts do but look into Portugal, againſt which they "have no pretence of religion; how the nobility are put to death, impriſon'd; their rich
"men made a prey, and all ſorts of people captiv'd; they ſhall find, that the obedience
"even of the Turk is eaſy, and a liberty, in reſpect of the ſlavery and tyranny of Spain.
"What have they done in Sicily, Naples, Milan, and the Low-Countries? Who hath there "been ſpared for religion at all? And it cometh to my remembrance of a certain burgher of "Antwerp, whoſe houſe being enter'd by a company of Spaniſh ſoldiers when they firſt
"ſack'd the city, he beſought them to ſpare him and his goods, being a good catholick, and "one of their own party. The Spaniards anſwer'd, They knew him to be of a good conſcience
"for himſelf; but his money, plate, jewels, and goods, were all heretical; and therefore lawful
"prize. So they abuſed and tormented the fooliſh Fleming, who hoped that an Agnus Dei
"had been a ſufficient target againſt all force of that holy and charitable nation. Neither
"have they at any time, as they proteſt, invaded the Indies or Peru, but rather to reduce
"the people to Chriſtianity, than either for gold or empire; whereas in one only iſland, cal"led Hiſpaniola, they have waſted three millions of the natural people, beſides many mil"lions elſe in other places of the Indies: a poor and harmleſs people, created of God, and "might have been won to his knowledge, as many of them were, and almoſt as many "as ever were perſuaded thereunto. The ſtory whereof is at large written by a biſhop of "their own nation, called Bartholomew de las Caſas, and tranſlated into Engliſh, and many "other languages, entitled, The Spaniſh Cruelties. Who would therefore repoſe truſt in ſuch
"a nation of ravenous ſtrangers; and eſpecially in thoſe Spaniards, who more greedily
"thirſt after Engliſh blood, than after the lives of any other people in Europe? For the "many overthrows and diſhonours they have received at our hands, whoſe weakneſs we have "diſcovered to the world, and whoſe forces at home, abroad, in Europe, in India, by ſea and "land, we have, even with handfuls of men and ſhips, overthrown and diſhonour'd. Let "not therefore any Engliſhman, of what religion ſoever, have other opinion of the Spaniard,
"but that thoſe whom he ſeeketh to win in our nation, he eſteemeth baſe and traiterous,
"unworthy perſons or unconſtant fools: and that he uſeth his pretence of religion for no
"other purpoſe, but to bewitch us from the obedience of our natural prince; thereby hoping
"in time to bring us to ſlavery and ſubjection. And then none ſhall be unto them ſo odious
"and diſdain'd as the traitors themſelves, who have ſold their country to a ſtranger, and "forſaken their faith and obedience, contrary to nature and religion; and even contrary to
"that human and general humour not only of Chriſtians, but of heathen and irreligious na"tions, who have always ſuſtain'd what labour ſoever, and imbraced even death it ſelf for "their country, prince, or commonwealth. To conclude: it hath ever to this day pleaſed
"God to proſper and defend her majeſty, to break the purpoſes of malicious enemies, of "forſworn traitors, and of unjuſt practices and invaſions. She hath ever been honour'd of "the worthieſt kings; ſerved by faithful ſubjects; and ſhall, by the favour of God, reſiſt, "repel, and confound all whatſoever attempts againſt her ſacred perſon or kingdom. In the

RALEGH had no ſooner done with his pen, but he took up arms againſt the Spaniards, intending to ſeek reparation of them for the loſſes aforeſaid. He had formed an enterpriſe upon Panama, with a deſign alſo of meeting the Spaniſh plate-fleet; was at great expence in fitting out a maritime force for that purpoſe; and uſed his utmoſt intereſt and diligence to engage many worthy friends in the adventure. The ſcheme he laid down appear'd ſo feaſible to her majeſty, having provided no leſs than thirteen ſhips of his own and his aſſociates, all well mann'd, and plentifully furniſhed with arms, proviſions, and all other neceſſaries, that ſhe added to them two of her own men of war, named the Garland and Foreſight, and gave him a commiſſion, conſtituting him general of the fleet.[b] The honour of lieutenant-general was given to Sir John Burgh, a gentleman altogether worthy of the command. And indeed all his conſorts, officers, ſoldiers and ſailors, were men of notable reſolution; ſuch as had given ſufficient proof of their valour in divers ſervices; and, to give them their right, ſays my author, ſo well qualified in courage, experience and diſcretion, that the greateſt prince might repute himſelf happy to be ſerved by the like. With theſe ſhips thus equipp'd, Ralegh departed in February, the year aforeſaid, to the weſt of England, there to ſtore himſelf with ſuch further conveniences as he thought he ſhould need; but the weſterly winds blowing for a long time contrary to his courſe, bound him to keep harbour ſo many weeks, that the fitteſt ſeaſon for his purpoſe was expir'd, and much of his proviſions conſum'd. The queen, underſtanding how unluckily he was detain'd, it being the ſixth of May following, that is, in the year 1592, before Ralegh could put to ſea, ſhe ſent Sir Martin Frobiſher after him, who overtook him the very next day, with letters of revocation. But Ralegh finding his honour ſo far engag'd in the undertaking of this voyage, that, without proceeding, he ſaw no remedy either to ſalve his reputation, or ſatisfy his friends, who had contributed ſo largely to this adventure; and interpreting the queen's letters, as if her commands had been propounded in terms of latitude, either to advance or retire at his own diſcretion, would by no means conſent to leave the fleet, now under ſail. So he continued his courſe upon the ſeas, till he met with a ſhip belonging to Monſieur Gourdon, governor of Calais, in which was one Mr. Nevel Davies, who was return'd from a twelve years captivity in Spain; and who aſſur'd him, there was little hopes of any ſucceſs this year in the Weſt-Indies; for the king of Spain had ſent expreſs orders to all the ports, both of the Iſlands and Terra Firma, that no ſhips ſhould ſtir that year, nor any treaſure be laid aboard for Spain. But neither this diſagreeable news, nor the other diſcouragements, could deter him from proceeding; till on the eleventh of May, when he was off Cape Finiſter, a moſt raging tempeſt ariſing, ſo ſcatter'd the greater part of the fleet, and ſunk his boats and pinnaces, that, as the reſt were driven and divided, Ralegh himſelf, in the Garland, was in great danger of being ſwallowed up in the ſea. Hereupon, conſidering the ſeaſon was too far gone for his enterpriſe upon Panama, and his victuals too much conſum'd; that the ſame conſumption might further diſable him from lying upon the Spaniſh coaſt, or at the Iſlands, to meet with the Indian fleet, for which he had received ſuch little encouragement to wait, Ralegh made a diviſion of his fleet into two ſquadrons, committing one under the charge of Sir John Burgh, and the other to Sir Martin Frobiſher; and gave his inſtructions for Sir Martin, in the Garland, with captain George Gifford, captain Henry Thynne, captain Grenvill, and others, to lie off the ſouth cape to terrify and keep the Spaniards on their own coaſt; while Sir John Burgh, with captain Robert Croſs, Thomſon, and others, ſhould lie at the Azores for the carracks from India. The ſucceſs of theſe directions was anſwerable to the excellent judgment that contriv'd them. For the Spaniſh admiral, receiving intelligence that the Engliſh fleet was cruiſing upon their coaſt, gather'd all his naval power to watch Frobiſher, and defend the ſouthern parts of Spain; while the carracks, unguarded, were left a prey to Sir John Burgh. Before the fleet ſeparated, they met on the Spaniſh coaſt with a great Biſcayan, called Sanƈta Clara, a General of an expedition to Panama.

Recall'd.

In a dangerous ſtorm.

His inſtructions to his fleet.

[a] See a report of the truth of the fight about the iſles of Azores, this laſt ſummer, betwixt the Revenge, one of her majeſty's ſhips, commanded by Sir Richard Grenvill, and an Armada of the king of Spain: 4to. 1591. reprinted, fol. in Hakluyt, vol. 2. 1599. part 2. p. 169. where it is ſaid to be penn'd by the honourable Sir Walter Ralegh.

[b] Sir William Monſon, in his Naval Tracts, obſerves upon this enterpriſe, " That Sir Walter Ralegh, who had " taſted abundantly of the queen's love, finding it now begin " to decline, reſolved to undertake an expedition to ſea; " and engaged ſeveral of his friends, of great quality, to " be concern'd with him." 'Tis pity but this author had ſatisfy'd us more expreſly about that declenſion of the queen's love. For, I think, that her lending Ralegh her ſhips of war, and the honourable commiſſion ſhe gave him, to be general in this expedition, ſeem rather to contradict, than any ways confirm that inſinuation.

ſhip of ſix hundred ton; which, after a fight for ſome time, they maſter'd, and found freighted with all ſorts of little iron-work, valued by the Engliſh at ſix or ſeven thouſand pounds; but of treble the value to the Spaniards. This, having clear'd, they ſent to England. Then Sir John Burgh, in a ſhip of Sir Walter Ralegh's, named the Roebuck, coaſting along towards the ſouth cape of St. Vincent; and, by the way ſpying a ſail, gave her chaſe; which being a flyboat and good ſailor, drew him far ſouthward, before he could fetch her; at laſt ſhe came under his lee, and ſtruck ſail. The maſter confeſs'd a great fleet was prepar'd at St. Lucar and Cadiz; for the rumour of Ralegh's putting out ſtrong for the Weſt-Indies had ſo alarmed the king of Spain, that he raiſed this fleet to oppoſe and encounter him; tho' looking for the arrival of his Eaſt-India carracks, he firſt order'd thoſe ſhips to convoy them from the Azores; but perſuading himſelf if Ralegh's fleet did make for the Weſt-Indies, that then the iſlands would be infeſted only by ſome ſmall men of war which the carracks of themſelves would be able to cope with, his order was to Don Alphonſo de Baçan to purſue Ralegh's fleet, and engage him, what courſe ſoever he held: and the Engliſh ſoon found this information true. For Sir John Burgh, not long after his having taken that flyboat, as he return'd to his company, deſcry'd the Spaniſh fleet to ſea-ward of him; which having likewiſe diſcover'd him, made full account to bring him into the Spaniſh harbour; but he dexterouſly eſcaped them, and ſhaped his courſe to the Azores, according to Ralegh's directions. Here he took ſeveral ſmall caravels; but learnt little intelligence from them. Arriving at Flores on the 21ſt of June, and making to the ſhore of a village there, call'd Santa Cruz, he found them all in arms; but, ſhewing ſigns of amity by a white flag, he was accommodated by the inhabitants with whatever he wanted. Here he learnt news of the Eaſt-Indian carracks, one whereof had lately paſſed by for Lisbon, and that four more were behind. He made after, and ſoon diſcover'd the foremoſt, named the Santa Cruz; which was preſſed ſo cloſe upon by the Engliſh, that ſhe fir'd her ſelf; but they took, beſides ſome ſpoil, certain priſoners out of her, who confeſs'd, that within fifteen days three other greater carracks would arrive at the ſame iſland. Sir John, having taken counſel with his officers, departed ſix or ſeven leagues to the weſt of Flores, cauſing the ſhips in his company to ſpread themſelves north and ſouth two leagues diſtant from each other, by which extenſion they could diſcover two whole degrees. Thus they lay till the third of Auguſt, when captain Thomſon firſt ſaw that prodigious great carrack, called the MADRE DE DIOS, or Mother of God, one of the greateſt burden belonging to the crown of Portugal. Captain Thomſon firſt attack'd her, but with the loſs of ſeveral men; then Sir John Burgh, in the Roebuck aforeſaid, intangled her; and Sir Robert Croſs faſten'd himſelf to her at the ſame inſtant: but Sir John was forced to diſengage a-while, for fear of ſinking, being ſhot under-water. At laſt Croſs fell athwart her all alone, prevented her running aſhore to fire her ſelf, as the other had done, and gave the reſt time to come up to his ſuccour; which, after he had fought with her three hours, he receiv'd by the lord Cumberland's ſhips: and then, having made a great ſlaughter of the Spaniards, they boarded and poſſeſs'd themſelves of her with little difficulty.

A prize.

THIS prize was reckon'd the greateſt and richeſt that ever had been brought into England; and when the news of her being taken arriv'd, Ralegh was no leſs diligent to have her ſafely conducted home, than the officers aforeſaid had been in the taking of her. For, after conſultation with Sir John Hawkins, his chief partner in this enterpriſe, they wrote a letter to the lord admiral, in theſe words; "Our very good lord, we have confer'd together about the Eaſt-
"Indian ſhip to be brought to Plymouth by Sir John Burgh; and, in our opinions, ſhe can be "no leſs worth than five hundred thouſand pounds; being a ſhip of ſo great burden, and laden
"with ſo rich commodities as appeareth ſhe is: wherefore we have conſider'd, that the Spaniſh
"men of war, lying upon the coaſt of Bretagne, hearing of ſo great a prize taken from the "king, or the merchants of the country; and, envying that ſuch a benefit ſhould grow to us,
"to their hinderance and diſhonour, will endeavour by all poſſible means, being diſtant but a "day or night's ſailing, either to recover the ſhip again, or to burn her and all her lading,
"rather than ſhe ſhall be deliver'd here; ſeeing that the places of defence where the ſhip may "remain, are not able to reſiſt their power: in our opinion therefore we think fit, and do pray
"your lordſhip, that the three ſhips of her majeſty's which are appointed to keep the narrow ſeas,
"may, by your lordſhip's letter and directions, be appointed to go weſtward, and there to "guard the Indian ſhip for a time, until the Gardland and ſome of the ſame fleet be return'd, "whoſe arrival cannot be any long time expected; or till ſome order may be taken for the "unlading or keeping of her otherwiſe; which we pray your lordſhip may be done with "ſome expedition. And ſo we humbly take our leave, this 27th of Auguſt 1592. Your "lordſhip's

Another of great value.

" lordſhip's humbly at commandment, W. Ralegh (and underneath) John Hawkins." [a] By this means probably ſuch care was taken, that this mighty ſhip was brought ſafe into Dartmouth on the 7th of September following, where it daily drew vaſt numbers of ſpectators from all parts to admire at the hugeneſs of it, being far beyond the model of the biggeſt ſhipping then known among us either for war or burden. [b] But as to the lading, tho' Sir John Burgh did prudently ſeize upon the whole to her majeſty's uſe, to prevent all licentious ſpoil; whereby the treaſure brought home was ſufficient to recompenſe the adventurers coſt, and the ſailors peril, however, the dividends are not known, more than that her majeſty had the largeſt ſhare; and tho', through the varieties thereof, our nation was let into the diſcovery of thoſe merchandiſes, whereof we had before but an imperfect knowledge; yet the whole cargo, when it came to be landed and valued in England, fell ſhort above two thirds of the computation which had been made by Ralegh and Hawkins, as above. [c] For it ſeems there were a large quantity of jewels, and of great value, which were never brought to light; and ſo much of her other goods was alſo purloin'd by the ſailors, ſoldiers, and officers, that at her arrival in England, ſhe drew five foot leſs water than ſhe did when ſhe was firſt freighted at Cochin in the Eaſt-Indies. And indeed the ſailors themſelves, whom neither order, oath, nor proclamation, could reſtrain, boldly confeſs'd, They had rather truſt their ſouls to a merciful God by Perjury, than their fortunes to the hands of unmerciful men. [d]

THE latter end of this year, and beginning of next, we meet with Sir Walter Ralegh in the parliament houſe, whether return'd for a county or a borough, and for which, does not at preſent particularly occur; but much engaged we find him there throughout this ſhort ſeſſion, [e] among the ableſt heads both in committees, and as a publick ſpeaker. A late author of his life obſerves, " that his ſpeeches were full of reaſon and eloquence, no man in his days being more a " maſter of language than himſelf;" [f] and matter too, he might have added; none more ſatisfactorily confirming his arguments with facts and experience than he did, even in his unpremeditated ſpeeches, no leſs than in the more deliberate compoſitions of his pen; ſo full of obſervation he was upon all times and countries, and ſo readily he could apply it upon all occaſions; which now won him great regard, as a ſpeaker in the houſe, and afterwards as an author, to the whole world. Soon after the opening of the ſeſſion, we find him upon the committee for the liberties and privileges of the members, to examine and make report of all ſuch caſes touching the elections and returns of any the knights, citizens, burgeſſes, or barons of the houſe, as ſhould ariſe during the ſaid ſeſſion of parliament: alſo in another againſt popiſh recuſants. And when the bill for certain ſubſidies to be granted her majeſty was in debate, and ſome members were for having it expreſly diſtinguiſh'd in the bill, that the ſaid ſubſidies ſhould be for maintaining a war impulſive and defenſive againſt the Spaniard, that the conqueſts we made over them might be legal and warrantable; Sir Walter Ralegh ſeconded thoſe ſpeeches, and ſaid, " He knew many, who held it not lawful in conſcience, as the time was, to take prizes " from the Spaniard; and he knew, that if it might be lawful and open war, there would be " more voluntary hands to fight againſt the Spaniard than the queen ſhould ſtand in need of to [b] This carack was in burden no leſs than 1600 ton, whereof 900 were merchandiſe: ſhe carried 32 pieces of braſs ordnance, and between ſix and ſeven hundred paſſengers; was built with decks ſeven ſtory, one main orlop, three cloſe decks, one forecaſtle, and a ſpare-deck of two floors apiece. According to the obſervations of Mr. Robert Adams, an excellent geometrician, ſhe was in length from the beak-head to the ſtern 165 foot; in breadth near 47 foot; the length of her keel 100 foot; of the main-maſt 121 foot; its circuit at the partners near 11 foot; and her main-yard 106 foot.

[a] This, from the original, among the ineſtimable treaſures in the Harleyan library; tho' written neither by Ralegh nor Hawkins, but perhaps by ſome ſecretary, or other perſon belonging to one of them; for it is ſign'd by their own hands, as above. It has alſo a ſeal (on ſoft yellow wax) of Ralegh's coat of arms (hereafter mention'd) in a triangular eſcutcheon; but the creſt (a ſtag, or other-like horned animal) is different from what he afterwards bore, as will be alſo obſerved in the ſequel of this work.

[c] As to her lading, according to the catalogue taken at Leadenhall the 15th of September this year, the principal wares conſiſted of ſpices, drugs, ſilks, callicoes, carpets, quilts, cloth of the rind of trees, ivory, Porcellan or China ware, ebony; beſides pearl, muſk, civit, and ambergris; with many other commodities of inferior value. The Cargaſon freighted ten of our ſhips for London, and was, by moderate computation, valued at 150000 l. Sterling. See a true report of the honourable ſervice at ſea, perform'd by Sir John Burrough, lieutenant-general of the fleet, prepar'd by the honourable Sir Walter Ralegh, lord-warden, &c. in Hakluyt, vol. 2. part 2. p. 194. There was alſo printed another account of this great ſhip, while it lay in the port aforeſaid, in Quarto, under this title, The Seaman's Triumph, declaring the honourable actions of ſuch gentlemen, captains, &c. as were at the taking of the great carack lately brought to Dartmouth, with her burden and commodities: alſo the manner of the fight with and burning of another at the Iſle of Flowers, of the burden of 900 ton, written for truth, to a Gentleman of great worſhip in London. This gentleman, tho' his name is not prefix'd to the dedication, was Sir Walter Ralegh, as may plainly appear to thoſe who have read it, and are acquainted with the hiſtory of this action. I never ſaw but one of theſe pamphlets, which is in the poſſeſſion of a nobleman, curious in collections of this kind; and remember to have read in it, that ſome jars of civit were, through unadviſedneſs of the ſailors, thrown overboard; they not knowing what it was. But in the whole, this tract, as I remember, is not ſo particular and accurately written, as that account in Hakluyt aforeſaid.

"ſend to ſea." Accordingly he was appointed of the committee for drawing the articles and preamble of the ſaid bill.[a] Further, when the neceſſity of the ſaid ſubſidy came to be enforc'd, Ralegh ſpake for it, "not only (as he proteſted) to pleaſe the queen, to whom he was infi-"nitely bound above his deſerts; but for the neceſſity he both ſaw and knew." He very well diſcover'd the great ſtrength of the king of Spain; and, to ſhew his mightineſs, he told how he poſſeſs'd all the world; as alſo that his malice and ill purpoſe was evident to this realm, he ſhewed how on every ſide he had beleaguer'd us. "That in Denmark, the king being "young, had corrupted the council and nobility; ſo as it was very likely he would ſpeed "himſelf of ſhipping from thence. In the marine towns of the Low-Countries, and in Nor-"way, he laid in great ſtore of ſhipping. In France, he had the parliament-towns at his "command; in Britany, he had all the beſt havens; and in Scotland, had ſo corrupted the no-"bility, that he had promis'd them forces to aſſiſt the papiſts; that they were ready to join "with any foreign forces that would make them ſtrong, to be by themſelves and reſiſt others; "for, as he thought, there were not ſix gentlemen of that country of one religion. In his "own country, there is all poſſible preparing; and he is coming with ſixty gallies, beſides "other ſhipping, with purpoſe to annoy us. We muſt then have no ſhips, if he invade us "riding at anchor; all will be little enough to withſtand him. At his coming, he fully re-"ſolveth to get Plymouth, or at leaſt to poſſeſs ſome of the havens this ſummer within our "land; and Plymouth is a place of moſt danger, for no ordnance can be carried thither to re-"move him, the paſſages will not give leave. Now the way to defeat him, is to ſend a royal "army to ſupplant him in Britany, and to poſſeſs our ſelves there; and to ſend a ſtrong navy "to ſea, and to lye upon the Cape and at Lambuck; to which places come all his ſhips with "riches from all parts, and then they may ſet upon all that come. This we are able to do, "and undoubtedly with fortunate ſucceſs, if we undertake it."[b] But ſome diviſion ariſing upon the queſtion how they ſhould make the motion for this ſupply to the lords, Ralegh made ſo judicious a diſtinction of the cauſe thereof, and ſo clearly demonſtrated the erroneous manner in which it had been propounded, that it appears plainly, the ſucceſsful turn which follow'd thereupon was owing to him alone. For, ſaid Ralegh, "had the queſtion but been "put, whether they ſhould only yield to a conference in general with the lords? the houſe "would not have been againſt it;" therefore deſir'd the ſpeaker to put it to the queſtion, whether they ſhould confer with the lords generally or not, without naming the ſubſidy? This motion was ſo well liked, that Ralegh was deſir'd by the houſe to repeat it over again, that it might be better heard by them all. Thereupon he ſaid, "that as it had been lately receiv'd "in the negative, he would not make it a queſtion again, for by the order of the houſe he could not;" but propounded it as a new queſtion, "Whether the houſe would be pleaſed to have a "general conference with the lords, touching the great and imminent dangers of the realm and "ſtate, and the preſent neceſſary ſupply of treaſure to be provided ſpeedily for the ſame, ac-"cording to the proportion of the neceſſity?" Being ſtated in this manner, it was aſſented to by the whole houſe, without one negative voice.[c] But one of the members, Mr. Oliver St. John, making ſome miſconſtruction of the vice-chamberlain's ſpeech upon this occaſion, Sir Walter Ralegh further explain'd the matter agreed upon by the houſe to him, in theſe words. "If we confer generally, it muſt be of our dangers, and of the remedies, which muſt be by "means; if of means, it muſt be of money and aid. So our conference muſt needs be of "ſubſidy, or rather aid: but to agree upon this with any reſolution either in the matter or ſub-"ſtance, it is not our meaning."[d] After this conference, ſeveral forms of proviſion were propos'd by way of treble ſubſidies, and like proportionable fifteenths and tenths, with other kinds of benevolence: and many excellent ſpeeches paſſed upon that part of this important affair. Sir Thomas Cecill was for three ſubſidies to be paid in four years, and to be charged upon men of ten pounds and upwards, to ſpare thoſe who were under. Sir Henry Knivet alledged the poverty of our country againſt the reaſons uſed, and imputed that poverty to the bringing in more foreign wares, than we vented commodities, whereby our money was carried out of our country, which was thus become like a pond that was fed with a ſpring, but having a breach, through which more paſſed away than came in: thereupon moved for a ſurvey to be taken of all mens lands and goods in England, and ſo much to be yearly levied as might maintain the queen's wars, the proportion being ſet a hundred thouſand pounds yearly; or, if that was miſliked, every man on his word ſhould deliver in, to his power, the profits of his lands and goods; goods; ſo a proportion to be ceſs'd accordingly. To him who argued of the poverty of the land, from the multitude of beggars, Ralegh gave theſe reaſons: "That the broken companies "in Normandy and the Low-Countries, who returned maimed hither, never went back again "to the towns from whence they came: for a multitude of clothiers, taking their looms into "their hands, ſpun their wool themſelves; and except we would work for them cheaper than "they can make themſelves, they will ſet none to work. This engroſſing of ſo many trades "into their own hands, beggars ſo many as uſually lived by the trade." As for the ſurveying of ſo many mens eſtates, he thought it inconvenient. "For many, being eſteemed richer than "they are, would be found beggars, and increaſe the opinion of their number, by loſing their "credit, which is now their wealth. He further reported of his own knowledge, that the "Weſt-Country, ſince the parliament begun, had taken from them the worth of four hundred "and forty thouſands pound; and that thoſe of Newcaſtle lay ſtill for fear, becauſe the Bour- "deaux fleet was taken this year by the enemy. For the enemy approaching us, and being be- "come our neighbour, our trades will decay every day, and ſo our poverty increaſes. Thus "it is moſt certain; the longer we defer aid, the leſs able we ſhall be to yield it; yet in the "end, the greater aid will be required; ſo ſparing them now, we ſhall charge them when they "ſhall be leſs able to bear it: for it is moſt true, one hundred thouſand pounds would have "done the laſt year, that which three will not now do; and three will do this year, that "which ſix will not do hereafter." In the concluſion, he agreed to three ſubſidies; in them, the three pound-men to be ſpared; the ſum which came from them, to be levied upon thoſe of ten pound and upwards; and the payment to be ſpeedy.[a] Mr. Francis Bacon aſſented to three ſubſidies; but not to the payments under ſix years: but to his reaſons of difficulty and danger in a ſpeedier levy, which might hazard a double peril, by making it four ſhillings in the pound, a double payment; Ralegh anſwer'd, "I ſee no reaſon that the ſuſpicion of diſcontent- "ment ſhould croſs the proviſion for the preſent danger. The time is now more dangerous "than it was in eighty-eight; for then the Spaniard coming from Spain, was to paſs dangerous "ſeas, and had no place of retreat or relief if he fail'd: but now he has in Britany great ſtore "of ſhipping; a landing-place in Scotland; and men and horſes there as good as any we "have. But for the difficulty in getting this ſubſidy, I think it ſeems more difficult by ſpeak- "ing, than it would be in gathering."[b] In the end, it was carried agreeable to his propoſitions; the grant of a triple ſubſidy being agreed to, and of ſix fifteenths and tenths; to be levied and paid in four years, by a certain form which they had ſet down in articles; that is to ſay, one entire ſubſidy and two fifteenths and tenths at one payment in the firſt year; and one other entire ſubſidy, with two fifteenths and tenths at another payment in the ſecond year; and one entire ſubſidy and two fifteenths and tenths at two payments in the third and fourth years.[c]

Soon after there was a bill read in the houſe againſt counterfeiting the hands of counſellors or principal officers; and upon the ſecond reading, it was committed to Sir John Woolley and Sir Walter Ralegh, with others. But after a meeting in the Middle Temple hall, Sir John made report to the houſe, that himſelf, and the reſidue of the committee, upon the end of their examination and travel therein, did all of them think it a very dangerous bill; and not fit, in their opinion, to paſs the houſe; to whoſe conſideration they further thought proper to leave it. And becauſe it was a bill which came from the lords, they thought good, with the ſaid report firſt made, to deliver the ſaid bill again into this houſe, and there to leave it as it is, and not otherwiſe. But the bill againſt aliens ſelling foreign wares among us by retail, produced ſeveral weighty arguments and ſpeeches in the houſe, which have been tranſmitted to us. Theſe foreigners it ſeems were Dutchmen, who had neſtled themſelves in St. Martins, anciently allow'd for a ſanctuary, and therefore ſtill had this privilege: here they practis'd ſpinning and weaving, to the great detriment and complaint of merchants and regular dealers in our own city; inſomuch that threeſcore Engliſh retailers had been ruin'd by them ſince the laſt parliament, to the diminution, beſides their own private ſubſtance, of the queen's ſubſidy and the publick treaſure of the kingdom; twenty thouſand pounds a year at leaſt having been carried out of the realm by them. They had indeed ſome learned council who pleaded for them at the bar, and ſome of the members ſpoke in their behalf. One of them ſaid, this bill was thruſt into the houſe by our mercantile engroſſers; that their beggaring the domeſtick retailers might be imputed to the ſtrangers retailing. But he was anſwered by another with arguments to prove that engroſſing was ſufferable among merchants. Others again ran upon the more univerſal topics of charity, in giving ſhelter and means of getting livelihood to poor deſtitute ſtrangers, who fly to us for religion and relief: that we have been ſtrangers, and allow'd the liberty we deny; that now they are ſtrangers, and we may be ſo hereafter. Again, that it was an honour for one country to be hoſpitable to another; would extend its renown; increaſe its riches; ſtrengthen its intereſt; and induce them to a mutual return of favours: laſtly, that their example is profitable, through the patterns of piety and induſtry they diſperſe among us. Other arguments were uſed; but againſt theſe, Ralegh concur'd with thoſe who thought that denization ought not to circumvent birth-right; and that to behave our ſelves like citizens to foreigners, was but making our ſelves ſtrangers to our neighbours. His ſpeech againſt foreign Retailers. "Whereas it is pretended (ſays he) that for ſtrangers, "it is againſt charity, againſt honour, againſt profit, to expel them; in my opinion, it is no "matter of charity to relieve them. For firſt, ſuch as fly hither have forſaken their own "king; and religion is no pretext for them, for we have no Dutchmen here, but ſuch as come "from thoſe princes where the goſpel is preach'd; yet here they live, diſliking our church. "For honour: it is honour to uſe ſtrangers as we be uſed among ſtrangers; and it is a lightneſs in a commonwealth, yea, a baſeneſs in a nation, to give a liberty to another nation "which we cannot receive again. In Antwerp, where our intercourſe was moſt, we were never ſuffer'd to have a taylor or a ſhoo-maker to dwell. Nay, at Milan, where there are "three hundred-pound Engliſhmen, they cannot ſo much as have a barber among them. And "for profit; they are all of the houſe of Almoigne, who pay nothing; yea, eat out our profits, "and ſupplant our own nation. Cuſtom indeed they pay; paying fifteen-pence where we "pay twelve-pence; but they are diſcharged of ſubſidies. The nature of the Dutchman is to "fly to no man but for his profit; and they will obey no man long; now under Spain; now "under Mountfort; now under the prince of Orange; but under no governor long. The "Dutchman, by his policy, hath gotten trading with all the world into his hands; yea, he is "now entering into the trade of Scarborough-fiſhing, and the fiſhing of the Newfoundlands, "which is the ſtay of the Weſt-Countries. They are the people that maintain the king of "Spain in his greatneſs; were it not for them, he were never able to make out ſuch armies "and navies by ſea; it coſt her majeſty ſixteen thouſand pounds a year the maintaining of "theſe countries; and for all this, they arm her enemies againſt her. Therefore, I ſee no reaſon that ſuch reſpect ſhould be given to them: and, to conclude; in the whole, no matter "of honour, no matter of charity, no profit in relieving them."[a] This ſpeech we may meet with in ſome modern writings, quoted in Sir Walter Ralegh's praiſe, both for his knowledge in the intereſt of his country, and his unbiaſs'd affection in exerting it. As for the bill, he was one to whom it was committed, and who, after the travels of the ſaid committee upon it, offer'd it again to the houſe with the addition of a proviſo. On the 27th of March following, that is to ſay, in the year 1593, it was read the third time; and, after many long ſpeeches, which are not ſpecify'd, paſſed upon the queſtion, by the diviſion of the houſe, with the difference of fourſcore voices; the Yeas being a hundred ſixty-two, the Noes eighty-two. About a week afterwards there was a bill, for explaining a branch in an act to retain the queen's ſubjects in due obedience, read; and many ſpeeches paſs'd in the houſe before it was committed, through the many imperfections in the preamble and body of the ſaid bill. For it pretended a puniſhment only of the Browniſts and other ſectaries; but, alledging nothing againſt them in particular, contained ſome enſnaring clauſes that might comprehend more innocent perſons. As the ſpeeches before Sir Walter Ralegh's, on this occaſion, are not rehearſed, we can only gueſs at them, by what is preſerv'd of his; who ſaid, "In my conceit, the Browniſts are worthy to be rooted out And upon the bill againſt the Browniſts. "of a commonwealth:[b] but what danger may grow to our ſelves if this law paſs, were fit to be

[b] This ſect was ſo call'd from Robert Brown, ſon of Anthony Brown Eſq; of Tolethorp in Rutlandſhire, and grandſon of Francis Brown, whom king Henry VIII, Anno Regn. 18. privileg'd by charter to wear his cap in preſence of himſelf, his heirs, or any of his nobles, and not to uncover but at his own pleaſure. This Robert ſtudied divinity in Cambridge, and was ſoon diſcover'd by Dr. Still, maſter of Trinity-College, to have ſomewhat extraordinary in him that would prove a great diſturbance to the Church. He travell'd to Zeland, and return'd, as we are told, confirm'd in error and obſtinacy, which he firſt preach'd at Norwich Anno 1581, and wrote a book to juſtify his doctrine; for which biſhop Pbreak of that dioceſe confin'd him: but being related to the lord Burghley, and he rather imputing it to zeal than malice, interceded to have him charitably perſuaded out of his opinions, and releaſed. The latter being done, he was ſent home in 1585, but remain'd incorrigible; wherefore his good old father would own him for his ſon no longer than his ſon own'd the Church of England for his mother; but he choſe rather to part with his aged ſire than his new ſchiſm: ſo, with Richard Harriſon a ſchoolmaſter, he ſet up for an orator againſt biſhops and all eccleſiaſtical authority. When gentleneſs was found ineffectual, ſeverity was ſo long, and upon ſo many occaſions exercis'd, that this Brown uſed to boaſt he had been committed to Thirty-two priſons, and in ſome could not ſee his hand at noon-day; yet did he to the laſt ſave his life and living, which was Achurch in Northamptonſhire. This favour is conceived to proceed from the promiſes he made of conformity, together with the intereſt of his powerful kindred. He allowed a ſalary for one to diſcharge his cure; and tho' he oppoſed his pariſhioners in judgment, yet agreed in taking their tithes. He was of a nature uncontrolable, ſo far from the Sabbatarian ſtrictneſs, afterwards eſpouſed by ſome of his followers, that he ſeemed rather a libertine therein. In a word, he had (ſays my author) a wife with whom he never lived, and a church in which he never preached, tho' he received the profits thereof; and as all the other ſcenes of

" be conſider'd. For it is to be fear'd that men not guilty will be included in it: and that " law is hard, that taketh life, and ſendeth into baniſhment; where mens Intentions ſhall be " judged by a jury; and they ſhall be judges what another means. But that law, which is " againſt a fact, is but juſt; and puniſh the fact as ſeverely as you will. If two or three thou- " ſand Browniſts meet at the ſea, at whoſe charge ſhall they be tranſported, or whither will " you ſend them? I am ſorry for it, but I am afraid there are near twenty thouſand of them in " England; and when they are gone, who ſhall maintain their wives and children?" [a] A committee was therefore appointed to reviſe and correct this bill, among whom Ralegh is the foremoſt named; who, after many ſubſtractions, alterations and debates, moved it might be read to the houſe for their approbation: and, after many arguments and conferences, being read the third time, as were alſo the additions and amendments, it paſſed upon the queſtion. Ralegh was frequently in committees upon other bills during this ſeſſion, till it was diſſolved on the 10th of April following; but as his arguments upon them are not preſerv'd, we ſhall refer to the titles of theſe bills in the journals of parliament, whence we have extracted his ſpeeches upon thoſe before mention'd.

THIS year we met with a notable libel in print, ſet forth by a Lover of his Country, as he calls himſelf, to expoſe and ſcandalize certain miniſters and counſellors of ſtate, who had been inſtrumental in framing that ſearching proclamation againſt the Seminaries which was publiſh'd about two years before. [b] For the king of Spain having lately founded an Engliſh cloyſter at Valladolid, as a nurſery to ſupply us with treaſon and rebellion; ſo many hopeful ſtocks of that ſpecies were ſoon tranſplanted into England, as occaſion'd the ſaid proclamation to extirpate them. Now this Anſwer was publiſh'd to calumniate the ſuppoſed authors of it; and as Ralegh appears, among other very good company, to have his ſhare of the ſlander therein; ſo he might probably have had a hand in thoſe wholſome articles for the ſafety of the realm, which occaſion'd it. For, to the great honour of his knowledge in the conſtitution of his country, and his conſtant zeal for its ſecurity and welfare, he was, tho' no counſellor of ſtate, often call'd to the council table; where no ſmall difference was paid to his arguments and obſervations in the various debates that aroſe upon matters in church or ſtate, in war or peace. After this libel has revil'd the greateſt and wiſeſt miniſters of the nation, it ſeems to have reſerved the quinteſſence for him, who had the ability ſo many ways to cruſh the pernicious purpoſes which were daily hatching by the viperous brood which brought it forth; tho' after all, by embarking his character in ſuch an old and ſhatter'd bottom of detraction, 'tis much they could ſo long keep its weather-beaten credit a-float: and indeed, how they came to launch firſt out into ſuch an improbable contumely, ſeems a myſtery comprehenſible only to the patron of their iniquity. For Ralegh had given ſuch proofs of his ſound and ſincere affection to religion, ſome of which have in the foregoing pages been noted, that his ſentiments were made uſe of to reform or regulate even the profeſſors of it; yet now his head muſt be turn'd ſo exceſſively to its detriment, as to provoke this libeller's pious ſpleen againſt nothing leſs than Sir Walter Ralegh's School of Atheiſm; compendiouſly inſinuating, as if truly he was not ſatisfied with being a diſciple, but ſet up for a doctor in his faculty, and won young " gentlemen into his ſaid ſchool; wherein " the Old and New Teſtament were jeſted at, and ſcholars taught to ſpell God backwards." Then he complains, " what a miſerable thing it is, that her majeſty ſhould make laws " and proclamations according to theſe mens ſenſes and opinions." [c] But there may need little of his life were ſtormy and turbulent, ſo was his end; for the conſtable of his pariſh requiring ſomewhat roughly the payment of certain rates, his paſſion moved him to blows, whereof complaint being made to Juſtice St. John, he rather inclin'd to pity than puniſh him; but Brown, at fair words alſo diſguſted, ceaſed not till he was ſent to Northampton jayl on a bed in a cart, being very infirm, and aged above eighty years; where ſoon after he ſicken'd and died Anno 1630. Thus the church hiſtorians have painted out this ſtory, but in larger dimenſions. See Fuller, &c. As for Brown's tenets, 'tis ſaid one Bolton firſt broach'd them among us, and that they are only revived from the ancient Donatiſts; but thoſe, who think it worth while to hunt more diſtinctly after them, may read Dr. Fulk; Rogers on the ſixteenth article; Dayrel againſt the Browniſts; Bredwell's Detection of Glover the Browniſt; Gifford's Treatiſe of Engliſh Donatiſts; with his Reply to Barrow and Greenwood; and Stow's Chronicle; where it appears the Browniſt's books were prohibited by authority, and that ſome were hang'd for diſperſing them, with ſuch-like writings. There is a volume (containing ſome ingenious remarks) aſcribed to the earl of Angleſea, and named the Happy future State of England, which fol. 280. quotes from this ſpeech of Sir Walter Ralegh's, his obſervation above, to what number the Browniſts were ſo early multiply'd; yet, as he adds, the name of theſe ſchiſmaticks is now evaporated, and their tenets almoſt univerſally unknown.

pains to blunt the point of this dart, when we ſhall further conſider that it came out of a jeſuitical quiver; for by whom ſhould it be levell'd againſt him but Robert Parſons, the notorious traitor and incendiary! however deeply he diſguis'd himſelf into a Lover of his Country. So that, till we ſhall find a more credible father for the aſperſion, we may ſafely enough believe it no genuine iſſue of truth: nevertheleſs, ſome ten years after, when Raleigh was trampled down by the court, and there was a turn of ſtate to ſerve, this might be a good ſerviceable obloquy enough to upbraid him with, and depreciate him in the eye of the populace. But theſe prejudic'd repreſentations will probably be thought of ſo little authority, that the reaſons and matter of fact which have been produc'd in a poetical performance, may be ſufficient to make thoſe ſtains even befriend his reputation, and brighten it in clearing them away.[a]

INDEED there is a traditional author who accounts for the grounds of this aſperſion, in the following words; "Sir Walter Raleigh was the firſt (as I have heard) who ventur'd to tack "about, and ſail aloof from the beaten tract of the ſchools; and who, upon the diſcovery of "ſo apparent an error as a Torrid Zone, intended to proceed in an inquiſition after more ſolid "truths: till the mediation of ſome, whoſe livelihood lay in hammering ſhrines for this ſuper-"annuated ſtudy, poſſeſſed queen Elizabeth that ſuch doctrine was againſt God, no leſs than "her father's honour; whoſe faith (if he owned any) was grounded upon ſchool divinity: "whereupon ſhe chid him; who was (by his own confeſſion) ever after branded with the ti-"tle of an atheiſt, tho' a known aſſertor of God and Providence."[b] That he was ſuch aſſertor, ſeems to be affirmed by an author of his acquaintance, who introduces the apparition of Sir Walter, ſpeaking to him in this manner. "Thou well knoweſt that the world hath, at-"ſundry times, caſt a foul and moſt unjuſt aſperſion upon me for my preſumed denial of a "Deity; from which abominable and horrible crime I was ever moſt free; and not any man "now living better knows the ſame than thy ſelf; in whoſe preſence I was often accuſtom'd "highly to praiſe and eſteem the book of Leſſius, written in proof of the being of a Deity." So requeſts, that he would tranſlate the ſame into Engliſh, "which I my ſelf, ſays the ghoſt, had "done, if cruel fate had not untimely cut off the thread of my mortality; and let the title bear "my name; that ſo the readers may acknowledge it was done by my ſollicitation." Then the ſaid tranſlator of that book ſays in his own perſon to the reader, "It is well known that "Sir Walter was a man of great natural parts; and yet was ſuſpected of the moſt foul and exe-"crable crime of atheiſm; how truly God and himſelf only knows; yet I have reaſon to think "it a falſe aſperſion."[c] If thus much is ſaid of Raleigh by an author who knew him; what credit ſhall we pay to another who wrote many years later? never knew him, produces no authority for the principles he charges upon him; yet pretends to give us the tutor's name from whom he imbib'd them; and that, a man of no leſs learning and merit than the famous Mr. Thomas Hariot?[d] This was that Engliſh philoſopher from whoſe illuſtrious diſcoveries, he, who was the glory of the French philoſophers, is not denied to have borrowed much of the "thing that ever I think was written by the papiſts." See the ſaid Miſcellanies, p. 164. Will. Watſon the ſecular prieſt, ſpeaking of Blackwell the arch-prieſt's inhibition againſt certain catholic books, ſays, "Among other er-"rors committed by him therein, it was one, that he "would ſuffer all Parſons's ſeditious books to paſs cur-"rent; as his Philopater, ſpeaking moſt rebelliouſly "againſt her majeſty and the whole ſtate and nobles of "the land." See his Quodlibets of religion and ſtate, 4to. 1602. p. 107. There was alſo the like extract of this Philopater made in ſome Collections of Poetry, Hiſtory, &c. by John Heyward of Gray's-Inn Eſq; which I have ſeen in a Quarto volume among the MSS. of the late curious Thomas Granger Eſq; which Collections are likewiſe mention'd in the Catalogue of the remaining part of his MSS. p. 6. N°. 18.

a The late Dr. George Sewell, in his tragedy of Sir Walter Raleigh, 8vo. 1719. Act I. Scene I. makes the following reflexion on the attorney general's ſtarting from the queſtion in debate at Raleigh's trial, to upbraid him with this imputation of atheiſm.

Sir Julius Cæſar. When prejudice and ſtrong averſions work,
All whoſe opinions we diſlike are Atheiſts;
Now 'tis a term of art, a bugbear word,
The villain's engine, and the vulgar's terror.
The man who thinks and judges for himſelf;
Unſway'd by aged follies, rev'rend errors;
Grown holy by traditionary dullneſs
Of ſchool-authority; he is an Atheiſt!
The man, who hating idle noiſe, preſerves
A pure religion ſeated in his ſoul;
He is a ſilent, dumb, diſſembling Atheiſt!
Lord Howard. I had forgot it—yes the baſe-tongu'd gownſman
Did call him Atheiſt—ſo men judge at home,
Who never trac'd a Providence at ſea;
And ſaw his wonders in the mighty deep.
The Atheiſt-ſailor were a monſtrous thing,
More wonderful than all old ocean breeds!
But I will witneſs for my Raleigh's faith;
Yes, I have ſeen him when the tempeſt rag'd,
When from the precipice of mountain-waves,
All hearts have trembled at the gulph below;
He with a ſteddy, ſupplicating look,
Diſplay'd his truſt in that tremendous pow'r,
Who curbs the billows, and cuts ſhort the wings
Of the rude whirlwind in its midway courſe,
And bids the madneſs of the waves to ceaſe.
O fellow-ſoldier! were that folly thine;
Tho' thou wert dearer than the love of honour
To this old boſom; I would pluck thee hence, Tho' my heart crack'd———————

light wherewith he ſhone: [a] this was that excellent mathematician, who, ſays our author Wood aforeſaid, "coming to the knowledge of this heroic knight Sir Walter Ralegh, was entertain'd "by him in his family, who allow'd him a yearly penſion, [b] and was inſtructed by him at "leiſure hours in that ſcience." [c] This was that virtuous and religious man, who, being ſent over by Sir Walter Ralegh with his firſt colony to Virginia, but did not bear him company, as the ſaid author miſtakes, to ſurvey the bounds of the Engliſh diſcoveries, with the commodities and cuſtoms of the country, did firſt communicate the goſpel to thoſe heathen inhabitants; and, "in every town where he came, explained to them the contents of the Bible; declaring, "that therein was ſet forth the true and only God, and his mighty works; that therein was "contain'd the true doctrine of ſalvation through Chriſt; with many particulars of miracles "and chief points of religion, as I was able then to utter (continues he) and thought fit for the "time. And tho' I told them the book, materially and of itſelf, was not of ſuch vertue as I "thought they did conceive, but only the doctrine therein contain'd; yet would many be glad "to touch it, to embrace it, to kiſs it, to hold it to their breaſts and heads, and ſtroke over "all their bodies with it, to ſhew their hungry deſire of that knowledge which was ſpoken "of." [d] Yet this is the man whom the above-cited Anthony Wood charges with having had ſtrange thoughts of the ſcripture; with undervaluing the old ſtory of the creation; with never believing that trite poſition Ex nihilo nihil fit; with making a philoſophical Theology, wherein he caſt off the Old Teſtament; ſo that conſequently the New would have no foundation. Further, with being a Deiſt, and imparting his doctrine to the earl of Northumberland, into whoſe ſervice Ralegh had recommended him, and of whom he alſo receiv'd a yearly penſion of a hundred and twenty pounds. Laſtly, with infuſing thoſe principles likewiſe into Sir Walter Ralegh himſelf, when he was compiling his Hiſtory of the World. This laſt inſinuation, and probably all the reſt, is ſurely a manifeſt ſlander, as Wood himſelf muſt have own'd, if he had ſufficiently read that Hiſtory of the World; where Sir Walter Ralegh has, in many places, given ſtronger evidences of his Chriſtian faith, than any of his detractors ever did of theirs. And however Hariot might controvert certain theological matters with ſome divines of thoſe times, which made them have no good opinion of him (ſays Wood) and look upon the manner of his death as a judgment; not unlike the charity of ſome divines in all times; yet enough of his religious character [e] might be ſaid, as there has been of his patron, Sir Walter Ralegh's, to clear them both from this common and threadbear calumny.

As for Ralegh, what might not a little ſharpen theſe detractions againſt him, was perhaps a grant about this time made him from the crown of ſome church-lands; a courſe of reward uſual with queen Elizabeth towards ſuch as had perform'd any conſiderable ſervices for the ſtate. The

[a] This aſſertion will further appear to any who ſhall have the curioſity to conſult the late learned Dr. John Wallis, in his treatiſe of Algebra, where he compares the improvements which Hariot made, with what Deſcartes has advanced, as his own, without mentioning the name of this Engliſhman in his Geometry; and gives it clearly on Hariot's ſide. Nay, this Plagiariſm was ſo well known, as to have been objected againſt Monſieur Deſcartes in his own country; and the Frenchman, who has paid the ſingular honours to his memory of writing his life, having confeſs'd it was the opinion of ſome, that he ſtole his method of Algebra from one Hariot, an Engliſhman, does not go about to contradict it. See the life of Monſieur Deſcartes, tranſlated from the French by S. R. 8vo. Lond. 1693. p. 283.

[e] For would Dr. Richard Corbet, as orthodox a divine as any of them, and afterwards a biſhop of the Church, tell Sir Thomas Aylesbury, That Hariot's deep mine was without droſs, if it had any ſuch allay? See his Poems, 8vo. 3d edit. 1672. p. 56. Would another as grave and virtuous an author as any in thoſe times, Mr. George Chapman, his contemporary, tell all who knew him, in the preface to his Homer's Iliad, "That ſome places he had "ſhewn to his worthy and moſt learned friend Mr. Hariot; "whoſe judgment and knowledge in all kinds I know "(ſays he) to be incomparable and bottomleſs; yea, to "be admir'd as much, as his moſt blameleſs life, and the "right ſacred expence of his time, is to be honour'd and "reverenc'd; if this were not his true character." Nor is it likely the earl of Northumberland would alſo have made ſuch a man a domeſtic, and allowed him ſo handſome a ſalary, to have infected his ſons with atheiſtical principles: neither would Hariot's noble executors, Sir Thomas Aylesbury, and Robert Sidney, viſcount Liſle, have beſtowed on him in St. Chriſtopher's Church, London, where he was buried in July 1621, a monument, ſince deſtroyed by the great fire, with an inſcription that might have been contradicted by all the town, if it had been falſe; beginning as follows: Omnes ſcientias calluit, & in omnibus excelluit; Mathematicis, Philoſophicis, Theologicis, veritatis indagator ſtudioſiſſimus, Dei Triniunius cultor piiſſimus, &c. As to the manner of his death, Dr. Alex. Rhead, in his works, Lond. 1650. treat. 2. lect. 26. ſpeaking of the lip, ſays, "That cancerous ulcers often ſeize "on that part; and that this grief haſtned the end of "that famous mathematician Mr. Hariot, with whom I "was acquainted (ſays he) but a ſhort time before his "death." He adds none of thoſe ſcandalous reflections aforeſaid; and whether it begun firſt in his lip, ſeems not to have known; tho' poſſibly the braſs inſtruments which mathematicians are ſo familiar with, and, for readineſs, often hold in their mouths, might occaſion ſuch a diſeaſe. But I have ſeen an epigram in MS. as old as the time of his death, which makes an alluſion or compariſon between the ulcer in Mr. Hariot's Noſe, and that in Count Gondomar's Poſteriors (who had a Fiſtula) and my reader may ſee that Epigram too, if he pleaſes; for it is lately printed by Mr. Morgan, in his Phœnix Britannicus, or Revival of ſcarce Tracts, 4to. 1731. p. 368. As to his learned writings, they are mentioned by Ant. Wood; but not all of them, for he wrote a Chronicle of Virginia, beſides the Brief Report thereof before quoted; and mentions the particulars of that Chronicle in the ſaid Brief Report. See Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 280.

ſtory, as we are forc'd to gather it from thoſe authors, by whom it has not been over-favourably told, is, That about the year 1594[a] the biſhop of Salisbury, Dr. John Coldwell, who had been bred a phyſician, gave his ſee a ſtrong purge, by alienating the manor of Sherborne to Sir Walter Raleigh. Sir John Harrington, before quoted, ſpeaks of an ominous preſage, to make his tale as affecting as he can to prince Henry, and inſinuate the diſpleaſure even of Heaven againſt Sir Walter Raleigh; where he obſerves, "That Sir Walter, uſing often to ride "poſt in theſe days, upon no ſmall employments, between Plymouth and the court, when "Sherborne caſtle being right in the way, he caſt ſuch an eye upon it, as Ahab did (ſays he) upon "Naboth's vineyard; and once above the reſt being talking of it; of the commodiouſneſs of "the place; of the ſtrength of the ſeat; and how eaſily it might be got from the biſhoprick; "ſuddenly, over and over came his horſe; that his very face, which was then thought a very "good face, plough'd up the earth where he fell. This fall was ominous, I make no queſtion "(ſays he) as the like was obſerv'd in the lord Haſtings, &c. but his brother Adrian would "needs have him interpret that, not as a courtier, but as a conqueror, it preſaged the quiet "poſſeſſion thereof. And this, through the queen's favour, came to paſs:"[b] for after Dr. John Piers was tranſlated to York, this Dr. Coldwell was elected to ſucceed him in the ſee of Salisbury; but it lay vacant three years: in which dangerous juncture for denial, all the Doctor's church-preferments being diſpos'd of, yet before his election was confirm'd, Sir Walter Raleigh (as the church-hiſtorians have colour'd it out) aſſaulted his conſent; importun'd him to paſs Sherborne to the crown, and effected it; ſo ſhot the good old man (as one of them phraſes it) between wind and water; tho' indeed (confeſſes) a good round rent was reſerved to the biſhoprick.

His manor of Sherborne,

Then Sir Walter begg'd the ſame of the queen, and obtain'd it; much after the ſame method Sir William Killigrew got the manor of Crediton (a bough almoſt as big as the reſt of the body) from the church of Exeter, by the conſent of biſhop Babington.[c] We ſhall leave it for Harrington to determine whether Raleigh, who was now ſo high in the queen's favour, might with leſs ſuit than he was fain to make to her before he could perfect this purchaſe (as he perhaps at laſt juſtly calls it) and with leſs money than he beſtowed afterwards on Sherborne, in buying out leaſes and in drawing the river through rocks into his garden, have compaſſed a better, without giving umbrage to church or ſtate: while from others we obſerve, that Raleigh embelliſh'd his ſoveraign's bounty with great magnificence and commendation; not that he was in danger thereby of falling under the remark he has made on common builders of ſumptuous ſeats, That men are rather known by their houſes, than their houſes by them;[d] it not being eaſy for him, who had been ſuch a ſolid architect in the temple of fame, to make his habitation more conſiderable than its inhabitant, or raiſe any edifice with his fortune, which ſhould be more illuſtrious than what he had already founded by his virtue. Yet his elegant taſte in building is ſufficiently atteſted by an author who ſurvey'd the improvements he made upon this eſtate when they were freſh and in their ſplendor, and who tells us, "That the queen having

And buildings there.

"granted the fee-farm of Sherborne to Sir Walter Raleigh, he began to build the caſtle very "fairly; but altering his purpoſe, he built in the park adjoining a moſt fine houſe, which he "beautified with orchards, gardens, and groves of much variety and great delight: ſo that, whe-"ther you conſider the pleaſantneſs of the ſeat, the goodneſs of the ſoil, or the other delica-"cies belonging to it, it reſts (ſays he) unparallel'd by any in theſe parts."[e] How he came afterwards to be juggled out of it, may alſo ſufficiently appear when we arrive at the latter part of his life. But here, ſince we have touch'd ſomething upon gardening, we may take an opportunity of remembring a plantation of his, which is ſomewhat obſervable. A late author mentions it with reſpect to him, but in a diſtant manner; where, telling us, "That "Beddington near Croydon in Surrey, is a neat curious ſeat, built by Sir Francis Carew,"[f] he further adds; "The orchards and gardens are very pleaſant, and eſpecially famous for

Where he alſo obſerves, that among the acts paſſed in king James the firſt's parliament, none were more beneficial for the church, than that which made the king himſelf and his ſucceſſors incapable of any ſuch church-land to be convey'd to them; yet ſome (adds he) were ſo bold as to conceive this law void in the very making of it, and that all the obligations thereof conſiſted (not in the ſtrength of the law) but only in the king's and his ſucceſſors voluntary obedience thereunto: accounting it injurious for any prince in parliament to tie up his ſucceſſors, who neither can nor will be concluded thereby further than it ſtands with their own convenience: however, it was to ſtand in force till the ſame power ſhould be pleaſed to reſcind it.

[f] Fuller, in his Worthies of Surrey, ſays, it was Sir Nicholas Carew (put to death by king Henry VIII. for retorting ſome ſharp words upon him, with more truth than diſcretion) who built the fair houſe, or palace rather, at Beddington, which by the advantage of the water is a paradiſe of pleaſure. However Sir Francis, who was a curious and polite gentleman, and lived very nobly here the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign, did enrich it with conſiderable improvements.

" the orange-trees, which have now grown there above theſe hundred years; being planted in the " open-ground, under a moveable covert, during the winter months; they were the firſt that were " brought into England, by a knight of that noble family; who deſerves no leſs commenda- " tion than Lucullus met with for bringing cherry and filbert-trees out of Pontus into Italy; " for which he is celebrated by Pliny and others."[a] Now it has been a conſtant tradition at Beddington, that this knight of that noble family was Sir Walter Ralegh, who was allied thereto, if not otherwiſe, by the laſt of that ſirname's adopting his near kinſman, a Throgmorton, to be his heir, on condition that he would aſſume the name and arms of Carew;[b] and how Ralegh became related to the Throgmortons, will in a little ſpace appear. But that we might not here want ſuch further confirmation, as the place will afford, of the firſt planter of that famous orangery, whereof there are ſeveral trees ſtill flouriſhing of the original plantation, which are the ſtatelieſt and moſt perfect bearers of this fruit in England, I have been oblig'd with the gentleman's Anſwer to the Enquiry, who now dwells at the ſeat; and his words are, " 'Tis the common opinion " of this family, that Sir Walter Ralegh, who was related to it, brought over and planted the " old orange-trees here."[c] But in the houſe they preſerv'd a fine cabbin-bed which was his, having furniture of green ſilk and legs carved like dolphins, gilt with gold. In ſhort, the ſeat was now ſo frequented, that not only Ralegh and other courtiers, but the queen received here many agreeable entertainments;[d] for ſome of which ſhe could not eſcape the cenſure of her jeſuited enemies.

Of the other places of reſidence which Ralegh might have, beſides what is before-mention'd, to compaſs a perfect knowledge, would need more time and pains than at laſt perhaps might be thought neceſſary here to beſtow. As to the ſeat at Weſt-Horſely in Surrey, there is good authority that it was in the poſſeſſion of his ſon, as will be further obſerv'd, if not his own; and in the hall of that houſe, there are in ſeveral places of the walls and cieling the arms of Ralegh ſtill viſible.[e] But there is a houſe no farther from London than Iſlington, about a bow's-ſhot on this ſide the church, which, tho' I think it has no ſuch evidences remaining upon its walls, cielings, or windows, that will prove him to have been its owner, the arms that are ſeen there, above a hundred years old, being of a ſucceeding inhabitant; is

[a] Addit. to Camden's Britan. tranſlat. by the preſent biſhop of London, fol. 1695. p. 166. upon which we may obſerve, tho' the Engliſh have not been ſo grateful as the Romans were in celebrating thoſe worthy perſons who have made the like beneficial importations to the laſting ornament and fertility of their country; yet that we have had ſome authors not altogether ſilent in theſe vegetable antiquities, from whom we learn, that Dr. Linacre firſt brought into this land that prince of flowers the Damaſk Roſe; that the Perdigwen Plum, with two kinds more, were firſt made natives of this ſoil by Thomas lord Cromwell, when he return'd from his travels; and the Apricock, by a prieſt named Wolſe, gardener to king Henry VIII. In this reign were alſo firſt propagated among us Hops and Artichokes; and then were Cherry orchards firſt planted here, about Sittingborne in Kent, with a more improv'd kind of that fruit, brought from Flanders by one Harris, another of that king's gardeners: but what effect Cardan's recommendation of Olive-trees had with king Edward VI. I find not. In the reign of queen Elizabeth, when Edmund Grindal, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, return'd from exile, he firſt tranſported the Tamerisk, ſo uſeful in medicine againſt diſeaſes of the Spleen. Then alſo after our opening a trade with Zant, the ſhrub which bears the currans was firſt tranſplanted hither. In 1578 the Tulip firſt ſhewed her gaudy garment in Engliſh ground; and, laſtly, not to extend further on this ſubject now, as for the profitable plant Tobacco, and that princely one the Orange-tree, enough is ſaid above, in the body of this work, to the honour of Sir Walter Ralegh.

[c] Extract of a letter from Beddington, dated Dec. 19. 1733.

[d] Sir Hugh Plat informs us, " That delicate knight " Sir Francis Carew, once making a ſplendid entertain- " ment for queen Elizabeth at Beddington, led her majeſty, " after dinner, to a Cherry-tree in his garden, which had on " it fruit in their prime, then above a month after all cher- " ries had taken their farewell of England. This retardation " he perform'd by ſtraining a tent or canvas cover over the " whole tree, and wetting it as the weather requir'd with " a ſcoop; ſo by obſtructing the ſun-beams, they grew " both great, and were very long before they gain'd their " perfect cherry-colour; and when he was aſſur'd of the " time her majeſty would come, he remov'd the tent, and " a few ſunny days brought them to their full maturity." See his Garden of Eden, 12mo. 1655. p. 165.

[e] With a draught whereof having been oblig'd (among many other uſeful particulars) by the ingenious Mr. George Vertue, I find that coat agree with the arms upon Sir Walter Ralegh's ſeal in yellow wax to the letter before exhibited; and alſo with the draught repreſented before his life, in Prince's Worthies of Devon; where, as this author blazons it, he bears Gules, three Fuſils in Bend Argent. But Prince further adds, a Label of three Points Azure; which the draught from Horſely-Hall does not ſpecify: neither do I remember to have obſerved this diſtinction in the impreſſion of Sir Walter Ralegh's ſaid ſeal. Nor is it in that ſeal, of which a fair impreſſion remains, upon another letter he wrote about this time to the lord-treaſurer's ſecretary Hext or Hicks, alſo before-mention'd; and lately communicated to me by the obliging James Weſt Eſq; where the creſt is the ſame with that in the other ſeal; but in the dexter-chief of the ſhield, that other family-diſtinction of a martlet, as I take it. As for his creſt, it appears in thoſe ſeals as I before remark'd, to have been a ſtag, or other like animal; but at Horſely, and under the ſculpture of Sir Walter Ralegh, before his Hiſtory of the World, it is, I think, a Cap of Honour; to which poſſibly it might afterwards be chang'd for his further merits of it. And as for the motto, it is at Horſely, Amore & virtute; as alſo to his arms before the hiſtory aforeſaid. Hooker, in his dedication of the Iriſh chronicles; often before-quoted, explaining or mythologiſing the ſignatures of Ralegh's arms, ſhews us at the ſame time what they were. For telling him he is taught to be careful in reſtoring the houſe of his decay'd fore-fathers, not only by their good examples, but alſo by the enſigns of their and his own nobility; he adds, " the " Fuſils being an inſtrument of travel and labour, adver- " tiſe you that you are one of the ſons of Adam, born to " walk in a vocation, and therein to be a profitable " member of the Church of God, and in maintenance " of the common ſociety. The white colour or ſilver " metal, doth teach you virtue, ſincerity, and godli- " neſs, &c. And therewith alſo, which by the gulie co- " lour is meant—You be bold and valiant for the defence " of your country, and for the ſafety thereof to ſpend " both life and goods: ſuch were your anceſtors, and " ſo it ſhall be with you," &c. which, by the way, was a perfect prophecy.

yet popularly reported to have been a villa of his. For the preſent tenant affirms, "his land-"lord[a] was poſſeſs'd of ſome old-account-books, by which it appears beyond all doubt this houſe "and fourteen acres of land, now let at about ſeventy pounds per Ann. did belong to Sir Walter "Ralegh; and that the oldeſt man in the pariſh[b] would often declare his father had told him, "Sir Walter purpoſed to wall in that ground, with intention to keep ſome of his horſes therein; "further, that ſome huſbandmen ploughing up the ſame a few years ſince, found ſeveral pieces "of queen Elizabeth's money, whereof they brought, whatever they might reſerve to them-"ſelves, about fourſcore ſhillings to their maſter, the ſaid tenant," in whoſe hands I have ſeen of the ſaid coin. As for the houſe, it is, and has been for many years, an inn; ſo that what it was, is not clearly to be judg'd from its preſent outward appearance, it being much impair'd, or very coarſely repair'd, and diminiſh'd perhaps from what it might be when perſons of diſtinction liv'd in it. For there is now to be ſeen but a narrow front, which ſoon coming to an angle, ſhoots down backwards only one range of buildings; as if another part of the front was wanting on this ſide, for the gateway to appear in the middle, and ſuch another range of buildings where the new parſonage-houſe now ſtands, to make the whole uniform. However, there are within-ſide ſome handſome ſpacious rooms; the parlour was painted round the upper-moſt part of the wainſcot in about a dozen pannels with ſcripture hiſtories; but now ſo old and decay'd, as to be ſcarcely diſtinguiſhable. There is alſo a noble dining-room, the cieling whereof is all over wrought in plaſtic or fret-work, with repreſentations of the Five Senſes; and the chimney-piece, with the Three principal Chriſtian Virtues. But the arms in the window, as well as in that of the hall, are by the preſent inhabitants erroneouſly call'd Sir Walter Ralegh's; there being a date under one of the coats, which ſhews it was aneal'd ſix years after his death. So that we are not ſure the decorations aforeſaid were done by his direction, or that others more rich and elegant were not in their ſtead before them. As for his dwellings in London, we have read before that he had apartments in the court at Somerſet-houſe, and ſhall read hereafter of ſome acquaintance reſorting to him at Durham-houſe in the Strand: that he had a houſe by the Thames-ſide, which might be the ſame; and another at St. James's, or apartments alſo in the court there; but to be diſtinct and particular in theſe, would be a task perhaps more difficult than profitable to attempt.

THE truth is, Sir Walter Ralegh did not live ſo long at court, and ſo much about the dazling beauties in it, without having the wings of his glory, at laſt, ſomewhat ſindg'd in the flames thereof: yet love, which in ſome other great courtiers of thoſe times, was the grand buſineſs of their life, ſeemed only an interlude in his. And tho' a gratification of this paſſion is uſually thought lighter of in martial men, and thoſe embarraſs'd with the weight of public action, as a convenient relaxation of their cares, or reward of their toils and perils; yet a more ſevere conſtruction was made of a little indulgence Ralegh might about this time take of that kind, than was in ſome others, who more frequently and notoriouſly made a practice thereof. Whether it was that his greater merits, in other parts of his conduct, made malice more poinant in this; or that little failings are not thought ſuch in thoſe where we commonly ſee, and therefore conſtantly expect, great virtues; whereby men of ſuperior qualifications undergo greater diſcredit than their inferiors for the ſame miſdeeds; as any diſproportion or disfigurement in a ſtatue of gold or alabaſter gives us more diſpleaſure than one in ſtone or common clay; and we look with regret upon the flaws in a diamond, while even greater in the flint do not affect us: but this ſeems to have been Ralegh's caſe. For there was among the queen's maids of honour a beautiful young lady (as her picture repreſents her) named Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, an able ſtateſman and ambaſſador, whoſe negociations and character are recorded both by the French and Scotch, as well as Engliſh hiſtorians of thoſe times.[c] With this lady, Ralegh had it ſeems an amour; and, as he was a man of nervous addreſs, won her heart even to the laſt favour (if we may uſe the phraſe of a polite author) incluſive. This intimacy came at laſt to the queen's knowledge; whether enviouſly betray'd by any female confident, as ſome might apprehend, from a character Ralegh would beſtow upon the ladies of the privy-chamber and bed-chamber; being wont to ſay, They were like witches who could do hurt, but could do no good:[d] or whether the intrigue could not be long conceal'd for the fruits of it, as ſome, who manifeſtly ſlander Ralegh in other particulars, have not ſcrupled to ſuggeſt, the reader has it in his choice to believe. But in ſuch colours this matter of devirginating a maid of honour was heighten'd, that Ralegh was out of favour again; alſo in confinement for ſeveral months; and when enlarg'd, forbidden the court;[e] whence the lady alſo was diſmiſs'd from her attendance. Yet, as heinous as this miſdemeanor was in Ralegh, her majeſty did not puniſh it in Leiceſter, Eſſex, and other courtiers, noted in their days for ſuch intrigues; eſpecially the former, who turn'd off Douglas Sheffield, by whom he had a ſon, to marry the earl of Eſſex's mother. But Ralegh very readily made the moſt honourable reparation he could, and cemented this flaw in their conduct, by marrying the object of his affection. Married. It appears they lived together ever after in the moſt exemplary degree of conjugal harmony; and when he was in his greateſt troubles, there are teſtimonies from one, who was otherwiſe none of his greateſt friends, of her extraordinary diligence and fidelity in making intereſt and applications to aſſuage them.[a] What his thoughts were of a married life, in compariſon with a ſingle one, may ſomewhat appear in that obſervation he made upon a certain nobleman's growing plump after matrimony, who was meagre before; for another perſon in company remarking thereupon, that it fared with him contrary to what it did with other married men, who uſually at firſt became lean after it; Ralegh very pleaſantly obviated the rarity, by ſaying, Why there is no beaſt, that, if you take him from the common, and put him into the ſeveral, but he will grow fat.[b] Many years afterwards, when Ralegh wrote his inſtructions to his ſon, he ſufficiently explained this ſentiment in the grave and paternal manner he is then writing, among others there laid down for his conduct in the choice of a wife; which topic he concludes, with adviſing him "to beſtow his youth ſo, that he may have comfort to remember it when it has forſaken "him." And further, amongſt the judicious precepts he there gives, one of them is; "That his ſon would evermore care to be beloved by his wife, than be beſotted on her." That in regard to the alterations of youthful affection, "If he cannot forbear to love, yet for-"bear to link." However, approves of a mature and ſettled choice at laſt, even while he is upon the ſtage of his virility. "For, believe it, the young wife betrayeth the old huſband; "and ſhe that had thee not in thy flower, will deſpiſe thee in thy fall." But not to marry for beauty only; "leſt thou bind thy ſelf for life, to that which perchance will never laſt or "pleaſe one year." Nor yet an uncomely woman; "as much regard being due at leaſt to "our own iſſue as to any other race of creatures; and comelineſs in children is riches, if no-"thing elſe be left them. He remains perhaps pretty ſafe in this opinion from many cenſures by the hard-favour'd part of the ſex, becauſe he knew that few ladies would be poſitive upon this head in their right to reprove him; nor will widows believe he has treated them with rigor, while they remain in that ſtate, ſince he has ſaid, "Leave not thy wife to be a ſhame unto thee "after thou art dead; but that ſhe may live according to thy eſtate; eſpecially if thou haſt "few children, and thoſe provided for." Tho' he does alſo further ſay, "Leave her no "more than of neceſſity thou muſt, but only during her widowhood; for if ſhe love again, let "her not enjoy her ſecond love in the ſame bed wherein ſhe loved thee; nor fly to future "pleaſures with thoſe feathers which death hath pulled from thy wings."[c] Not that he was averſe to ſecond marriages, for he adviſed his own wife to marry again when he was in expectation of being ſuddenly divided for ever from her.[d] Many other weighty admonitions may be found relating to that ſex among his writings, ſome of which we meet with, quoted by our moſt accompliſh'd humaniſts and critics in the manners and paſſions of life, as from an author who had read their hearts through all their veils and diſguiſes: but one of thoſe writers, tho' he allows him all the advantageous views of life through ſuch a variety of ſcenes; as "having lived "in courts and camps; travell'd through many countries; ſeen many men under ſeveral cli-"mates, and of as various complexions;" yet thinks (in which every body will not agree) "he ſpeaks of our impotence to reſiſt the wiles of women, in very ſevere terms;"[e] where Ralegh has upon the ſolid ground of the greateſt examples admoniſhed us, to what fatal inconveniences mankind is allur'd by their reſtleſs curioſity of knowing what is unfit for their knowledge, and the prevailing expedients to gratify it of diſſimulate ſorrow and unquietneſs.[f]

While Ralegh was under the diſpleaſure aforeſaid, and in retirement, he projected a further removal from the court; the better by that diſtance, and ſome memorable exploit, to allay the malice of his enemies, and recover his ſoveraign's love. Some thought this an impolitic courſe; as if his foreign actions could not work ſo effectually to his advantage, as the applications of his adverſaries to his diſparagement.[g] And hereupon Sir Robert Naunton ſays, "That find-"ing his favour declining, and falling into a receſs, he undertook a new peregrination to leave

"that

" that Terra infirma of the court, for that of the wars, and by declining himſelf, and by ab-
" ſence to expel his and the paſſion of his enemies; which in court (ſays he) was a ſtrange
" device of recovery; but that he knew there was ſome ill office done him, that he durſt not " attempt to mind any other ways than by going aſide, thereby to teach envy a new way of " forgetfulneſs, and not ſo much as to think of him: howſoever, he had it always in mind ne" ver to forget himſelf; and his device took ſo well, that at his return he came in, as rams do
" by going backwards, with the greater ſtrength; and ſo continued to the laſt great in her " grace." [a] Thus alſo ſays another author, " His enemies of greater rank kept him under;
" ſometimes in, ſometimes out; and then he would wiſely decline himſelf out of the court-road;
" and then you found him not but by fame; in voyages to the Weſt-Indies, Guiana, New Plan-
" tations, Virginia, or in ſome expeditions againſt the Spaniard." [b] And thus writes a third to the ſame purpoſe: " 'Tis obſervable, that Sir Walter Ralegh was in and out at court ſo
" often, that he was commonly call'd the Tennis-Ball of Fortune which ſhe delighted to ſport " with. His enemies perpetually brought him into diſgrace with his miſtreſs, and his merit in " a little time reſtor'd him again to her favour: and as ſhe always grew cold to the earl of " Eſſex after abſence; ſo ſhe ever receiv'd Ralegh with greater marks of her eſteem; and he " was too hard for his rivals by the very means which they intended for his deſtruction." [c]
Certainly he deſerved ſuch good fortune, beyond all others, of a reſtitution to royal favour, who could ſo much more hazardouſly and heroically than any of them aſpire to earn it; as now he abundantly manifeſted, in that grand and gallant undertaking to diſcover and conquer the large, rich, and beautiful empire of Guiana; an enterprize which had baffled the repeated efforts of ſome of the ableſt and moſt renowned captains and cavaliers in Spain for near a hundred years paſt: for, in one of their own authors, we may read the names of many brave commanders, and their commendations for the miſeries they endur'd, who within that ſpace had trod this maze, and loſt themſelves, with ſome, five hundred, ſome a thouſand men apiece, in finding out this country. [d] And yet none of all their own authors have more nobly and liberally celebrated theſe, and other ſuch like adventurers of the Spaniſh nation, than Ralegh himſelf has done. [e] How juſtly therefore his painful and perilous enterpriſe for the ſame diſcovery, will entitle him to praiſes equal with the moſt worthy of them, may ſoon appear, now that we are lanching forth into the ſpacious and meandrous channels thereof.

FOR Ralegh, induſtrious in diving into the cauſes of ſo many failures, having inform'd himſelf what ambient courſes the preceding adventurers had taken to arrive at the heart of the country they ſought, and which was the ſhorteſt way to make a ſucceſsful diſcovery, found that moſt of the Spaniſh attempts in theſe parts had fail'd, through the mutinies and diſcords which they had fomented among themſelves; as moſt of their conqueſts in others, were much owing to the like factions among the Americans: and if " there was not an expert ſoldier or ſeaman
" but he conſulted (as one author obſerves upon his character in general) nor a printed or
" manuſcript diſcourſe but he peruſed; whereby it came to paſs, there were not exacter rules
" or principles for both ſervices then he drew:" [f] much more may we believe he now particularly made uſe of theſe helps and lights to draw thoſe rules and directions by which this year (laſt mention'd, 1594) he gave to an old officer, captain Whiddon, whoſe experience he had before try'd, for a voyage to the country aforeſaid: and this ſame year that captain alſo return'd from thence, with ſeveral inducing confirmations of the grandeur and opulency of Guiana, having learnt the ſame from ſome of the grand caſiques, or principal rulers, upon the borders thereof; but not without complaints of ſome barbarous treachery from the Spaniſh governor, who had then got ſome footing there; and, after promiſes of ſuffering the Engliſhmen to furniſh themſelves with what ſupplies they wanted, decoy'd ſeveral of them to their deſtruction. Ralegh had thus more ſpurs than one, inciting him to viſit theſe regions in perſon; and the ſcheme he form'd upon an anſwerable return, might, according to the probability of his own propoſitions, which will not be paſs'd over, being founded upon the teſtimonies of the beſt inform'd writers, and intelligence of travellers into the country, have ſubjugated not only the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, but Spain it ſelf, to the crown of England: for if we could but compaſs golden territories in America, as the Spaniards had done, he doubted not to extend the empire of his royal miſtreſs as far beyond the dominion of other European princes, as ſhe ſurpaſs'd them in her magnanimous virtues. And now this golden country made ſuch invitations, being then no leſs, if not more confidently deſcrib'd and atteſted for ſuch, than any other in thoſe parts of the world,[a] at leaſt before they were perfectly diſcover'd; he chearfully determin'd, in queſt thereof, tho' through an ocean of difficulties, to waſh away the malice of his adverſaries at court, and render his character more impenetrable againſt the little cenſures which ſwarm in that theatre of circumvention to ſting and feſter ſuperior merit: as if he thought no foreign expedition could be more hazardous to the brave, or ſuch as cannot live without diſtinguiſhing themſelves, than the buſy factions and parties which are daily undermining them at home; but that, like Chabrias, and others of the greateſt Athenians in his time, he ſhould be remov'd from envy, as far as he was diſtant from his native country. With ſuch like views Ralegh very ſpeedily fitted out a fleet, and at a great expence; tho' the lord admiral Howard and Sir Robert Cecyl were at the further charge of augmenting it; ſuch opinion they alſo had of this enterpriſe. We may diſtinguiſh five ſhips under him, beſides barges, wherries, and other neceſſary tenders, in his own excellent narrative of this voyage, tho' he names them not at firſt ſetting out; becauſe he ſeems not to have been then accompanied with more than one of them: but, as they afterwards join'd him, he mentions them. Whence we underſtand, the ſhip himſelf went in was his own, which he does not name; but the Lion's Whelp, which was the lord-admiral's, was commanded by captain George Gifford; captain Keymis had the command of a galego, beſides a bark, which was committed to captain Croſs, and another to captain Calfield. The whole number of men in this fleet is not mention'd; but the ſelect company of officers, gentlemen and ſoldiers, he us'd in his diſcoveries, exceeded not one hundred. Thus prepar'd, he departed from Plymouth on the ſixth of February following, and made to the Grand Canaries, and ſo to Tenerif, where he waited a-while for the Lion's Whelp, and for captain Amias Preſton. But this captain diſappointed him, and went upon another adventure, which proved ſome diſadvantage in the proſecution of his diſcoveries. After ſeven or eight days, not ſeeing them, he proceeded for Trinidad with his own ſhip and captain Croſs's only (for the galego which ſet out with them linger'd behind on the coaſt of Spain) They reach'd that iſle on the 22d of March, and caſt anchor at Point Curiapan, which the Spaniards call'd Punta de Gallo, ſituate in eight degrees or thereabouts. In the four or five days he continued here, he came not to the ſpeech of any Indian or Spaniard. On the coaſt he ſaw a fire, but for fear of the Spaniards none of the Indians dared to approach him. Then Ralegh, in his barge, coaſted cloſe along the ſhore, and landed in every cove, the better to know the iſland, while his ſhips kept the channel. From hence he remov'd in a few days up north-eaſt, to recover that place the Spaniards call Puerto de los Eſpannoles, but the inhabitants Conquerabia; and as before (revictualling his barge) he left the ſhips, and kept by the ſhore, that he might better ſpeak with the inhabitants, and obſerve the rivers, watering-places, and ports in the iſland; of all which he took draughts as he paſſed along, which he re-

His voyage for the diſcovery of Guiana.

[a] The empire of Guiana is directly eaſt from Peru towards the ſea, and lies under the equinoctial line, was then governed by the ſame laws, and under the ſame religion. There are many atteſtations of the wonderful riches in theſe parts, eſpecially the imperial city, which they called Manoa, where, Franciſco Lopez, ſpeaking of the magnificence of the emperor's court, ſays, "That all "the veſſels of his houſe, table and kitchen, were of "gold and ſilver; that in his wardrobe were hollow ſta-"tues of gold, which ſeemed giants; and the figures, in "proportion and bigneſs, of all the beaſts, birds, trees "and herbs that the earth brings forth, and of all the "fiſhes that the ſea or waters of his kingdom breeds. "Finally, there was nothing in his country whereof he "had not the counterfeit in gold," vid. Fran. Lopez de Gomara, Hiſt. gen. de las Ind. cap. 120. Further, that city of Manoa was by Juan Martinez, the firſt Chriſtian who ſaw it, call'd El Dorado, or the Golden City, upon ſeeing the Guianians there, and all about the borders, in their drunken revels, anoint themſelves with a glutinous balſom, and powder their naked bodies over with gold duſt till they all glitter'd from head to foot. The ſubſtance of which report is at the end of the navigation of the great river of Marannon, written by Gonzalo Fernando de Oviedo to cardinal Bembo, and printed in the Raccolta delle Navigazioni, &c. da Giovanni Batiſta Ramuſio, vol. 3. fol. 416. We may read alſo in Martin Fernandez de Enzica's diſcourſe of the ports, creeks, and havens of the Weſt-Indies, dedicated to Charles the emperor Ann. 1518. in Lopez Vaz, and ſeveral other authors, repeated aſſurances of the mountains and rivers in this country abounding with gold. And this very year, that Ralegh ſent for intelligence thither, there were Spaniſh letters taken at ſea by captain Popham (who laid them before the council) wherein were many teſtimonies of gold and jewels found there in vaſt plenty; and a great idol weighing forty-ſeven quintals, with a bark brought from thence to Madera, containing two millions of gold. Confirming alſo the natives beſprinkling themſelves over with the powder of gold when they enter'd their Borracheras or Bacchanalian feaſts, which the honourable Mr. Rob. Duddely, in his voyage to the iſle of Trinidad, alſo mentions. See Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 634, 699, 778, 576, &c.

duced at laſt to one general map. At Parico he found a freſh-water river, and at Terra de Brea, another port, call'd by the natives Pitche, great quantities of very good oyſters growing upon the branches of certain trees, here ſo numerous, that he travell'd for a dozen miles together under them; which enabled him afterwards to rectify the ancient accounts of this tree, and the fond conceits of ſome moderns, that it was the tree of knowledge.[a] In ſhort, he coaſted three parts of the iſle of Trinidad, in the month he ſtaid there for captain Preſton, the more exactly to make his draught thereof aforeſaid.[b] At Puerto de los Eſpannoles he met with his ſhips, and found a company of Spaniards keeping guard at the deſcent, who, in doubt of their own ſtrength,[c] offer'd ſigns of peace. He ſent captain Whiddon to parley with them, whom he afterwards left buried in the iſland to his great grief, being a man, ſays Ralegh, moſt honeſt and valiant. From ſome of the Spaniſh ſoldiers, whom he found means to make free of their tongue by the help of wine; and from one of the Indian rulers, named Cantyman, whom captain Whiddon had been acquainted with, he gather'd what ſtrength the Spaniards were of, and how far it was to the city they had built under their governor Don Antonio de Berreo. Here he found occaſion of ſtaying a-while; both to have ſome reckoning with Berreo for his treacherous dealings with the Engliſh under Whiddon; and to learn alſo the ſtrength, riches, and paſſages to ſeveral other parts of the country. But when Ralegh was credibly inform'd that the Spaniſh governor had ſent for a recruit of ſoldiers, and how lamentably the natives ſuffer'd under his cruelties; that the very lords of the country were made his ſlaves; that he had put one of them, named Morequito, to death; that ſeveral others were then lying in chains, and languiſhing under the moſt exquiſite tortures, he found ſufficient occaſion not only to revenge the loſs of his countrymen, but a good opportunity to gain the hearts of the Indians, by attempting to reſcue them from this yoke of tyranny: and indeed without this attempt, in vain had any other been towards his intended diſcoveries. For, conſidering he was to enter Guiana in ſmall boats, and to leave his ſhips ſome hundred miles behind, he was not unapprehenſive how indiſcreet he ſhould be thought by all men, if he left alſo a garriſon of enemies at his back, intereſted in the ſame enterpriſe, and in daily expectation of reinforcements from Spain: therefore, taking his advantage, he boldly ſet upon the Corps du Garde in the duſk of the evening; and having put them to the ſword, advanced with a hundred men, and by brake of day took their new city call'd San Joſeph, which, at the entreaty of the Indians, he ſet on fire. Then were the natives in confinement, ſet at liberty. Among them were five Caſiques, or petty kings in thoſe parts.[d] Theſe, all bound together in one chain, almoſt dead with famine, and waſted with torments; having had their naked bodies baſted or dropp'd over with burning bacon; Ralegh alſo, to his great reputation, deliver'd from their captivity; and ſeveral years after, when this, with Ralegh's other noble acts among theſe Indians, was mention'd by ſome of our Engliſh adventurers to Guiana, it was freſhly retain'd and gratefully acknowledg'd by them to his honour; when alſo one of their braveſt princes, who had been in England, and chriſten'd Leonard Ragapo, came above a hundred miles to viſit them, for the great love he bore to Ralegh; manifeſtly ſhewing, how durably he had engag'd their affection and deſires for his return to be their ruler and protector.[e] But for the governor, who had impriſon'd ſo many of them, he was now become a priſoner himſelf; and Ralegh, by his courteous treatment of him, reaped the fruit of that knowledge and experience he had gather'd in the many years he had conſum'd, with great ſums of money, upon the diſcovery of Guiana.[f] The ſame day that Ralegh made this conqueſt, arrived captain Gifford and captain Keymis, and in their ſhips divers gentlemen and others, which to his little army was a great ſuccour and [b] Martin Fernandez de Encica, before quoted, ſays this iſland of Trinidad is twenty-five leagues in length, and as many in breadth; but Ralegh, who knew it much better, ſays it is but narrow, and in the form of a ſheep-hook; that the north part is mountainous; the ſoil excellent, and will bear ſugar, ginger, or any other commodities the Indies yield; has ſtore of deer, wild porks, fruits, fiſh, and fowl. Mr. Duddely, in his voyage thither before-mention'd, call'd the bay under the point of Curiapan, Pelicans Bay, from the abundance of thoſe birds there; ſays they had alſo parrots in great number and variety; and, according to Sir Walter Ralegh's account, divers beaſts which the Indies have not, who adds, the Spaniards confeſs'd they had found grains of gold in ſome of the rivers; but he tarried not in ſearch thereof, through his deſire of entering Guiana.

[c] And yet the Spaniards had now gotten ſome three hundred ſoldiers there, as Mr. Duddely, in his voyage above-cited, informs us, which was the reaſon he could not attempt to diſplant them. Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 575.

ſolace. Then proceeding upon his diſcovery, Ralegh firſt call'd all the chiefs of the iſland together, who were enemies to the Spaniards; for ſome of them Berreo had brought out of other countries, and planted there, to eat out and waſte the natives; then by his Indian interpreter, whom he carried out of England, he made them underſtand "he was the ſervant of a queen, "who was the greateſt Caſique of the north, and a virgin, who had more Caſiqui under her "than there were trees in that iſland: that ſhe was an enemy to the Caſtellani, in regard of "their tyranny and oppreſſion; and having freed all the coaſts of the northern world from their "ſervitude, had ſent him to free them alſo; and withal to defend the country of Guiana from "their invaſion and conqueſt." Then he ſhew'd them her majeſty's picture, which they ſo admir'd and honour'd, that it had been eaſy for him to have made them idolatrous thereof. The like and larger ſpeeches he made in ſolemn manner to the reſt of the nations, both in his paſſage to Guiana and to thoſe of the borders: ſo as in that part of the world the queen of England's fame was diffus'd with great admiration. This done, Ralegh return'd to Curiapan, and tho' he had learnt of Berreo, that Guiana was ſome hundred miles further than the accounts he receiv'd of captain Whiddon had repreſented it, he kept the knowledge thereof from his company, whom he fear'd would have been diſcourag'd thereby from proſecuting the diſcovery. When Ralegh had further gather'd from Berreo the proceedings of the paſt adventurers and his own, of all which he gives us a ſuccinct and curious hiſtory, he told him he was come upon the ſame deſign, and was reſolved to ſee Guiana. Berreo uſed many arguments to diſſuade him; as that he muſt venture in very light and ſmall boats to paſs ſo many dangerous ſhallows, and could not carry victuals enough above half the way; that none of the country would ſpeak with him; and, if he followed them, would burn their towns; beſides, the way was long, the winter at hand, and the rivers beginning to ſwell; but above all, that the kings and lords, who bordered upon Guiana, had decreed, that none of them ſhould trade with any Chriſtians for gold, becauſe the ſame would be their own overthrow. Ralegh, reſolving however to make trial, directed his vice-admiral, captain Gifford, and captain Calfield, to turn eaſtward againſt the mouth of the river Capuri, and gave them inſtructions to anchor at the edge of the ſhoal, and upon the beſt of the flood to thruſt over; but they labour'd in vain: nor did the flood continue ſo long, but the water fell before they could have paſſed the ſands. Then Ralegh ſent one King, maſter of the Lion's Whelp, to try another branch, called the Amana, if either of the ſmall ſhips would enter; but when he came to the mouth, he found it as the reſt. After him went John Dowglaſs, who diſcover'd four goodly entrances; but all ſhoal'd and ſhallow in the bays leading to them. In the mean time Ralegh, fearing the worſt, cauſed his carpenters to cut down an old galego boat, to fit her with banks for oars, and ſo as ſhe might draw but five foot; in this went Ralegh, with gentlemen and officers to the number of threeſcore. In the Lion's Whelp boat and wherry they carried twenty; captain Calfield, in his wherry, carried ten; and a barge of Ralegh's ten more. This was all the means they had, having left their ſhips at Curiapan, to carry a hundred men, with weapons and proviſions for a month, expoſed to all the extremes of the weather, all the hazards of the water; to lie open to the air, and upon hard boards by night; in ſtorms of rain, or under the burning ſun by day; to ſmell the wet cloaths of ſo many crowded together; the dreſſing of their food, and that moſtly ſtale fiſh, in the ſame place; to be in ſuch a labyrinth of rivers, in ſuch a remote and unknown region; what priſon could be more loathſom and unhealthy? what proſpect more fearful and deſolate? At firſt ſetting out, they had twenty miles of a high ſea to croſs in theſe ſcanty boats; ſo that they were driven before the wind into the bottom of the bay of Guanipa, inhabited by inhuman cannibals, who ſhot poiſon'd arrows: and from thence to enter one of the rivers of which Dowglaſs had brought tidings. After four days, they were paſt ebbing and flowing, and might have wander'd a whole year about, and never been able to extricate themſelves, in ſuch a general confluence or rendezvous of ſtreams were they now bewilder'd; and ſo reſembling one another, as not to be diſtinguiſh'd; but imperceptibly circulating and driving them about into the ſame places where they had been before; paſſing between many iſlands and ſtreights, whoſe borders were ſo thickly arched and over-ſhadowed with trees, as bounded their ſight to the breadth of the river and length of the avenue, while the gloomineſs of the proſpect added horror to the loneſomeneſs of the place. At length, on the 22d of May 1595, they fell into a river; which, becauſe it had no name, they call'd the Red-croſs River, theſe being the firſt Chriſtians who ever enter'd the ſame. When they drew into the creek, which led to a town upon this river, their Indian pilot, named Ferdinando, landing, was ſet upon by his countrymen, who hunted him with dogs; whereupon Ralegh ſeiz'd an old man paſſing that way, and threaten'd to cut off his head if he would not procure his pilot's liberty: but he, by his agility, ſoon eſcaped them, them, and ſwam to Ralegh's barge: however, they kept the old man, and uſed him kindly, aſſuring themſelves of uſeful information from a native ſo long converſant in thoſe parts. And indeed, but for this accident, they had never found their way forward to the country they ſought, nor back to that where their ſhips lay; the old man himſelf being often in the utmoſt perplexity which river to take, ſo numerous and intricate they were. Thoſe people who dwell in the flooded lands of this inſular and broken world, or in all the tracts towards Guiana, which the eight branches of the Orenoque faſhion into iſlands, are generally called Tivitivas, but diſtinguiſhed into two tribes, a hardy and valiant generation; who, though they inhabited houſes on the ground in ſummer, yet in winter were forced to aſcend and reſide in the trees, where they built themſelves artificial towns, and whole families were to be ſeen lodg'd in an arm or branch of thoſe aireal or vegetable tenements; as, it is written in the Spaniſh hiſtory of the Weſt-Indies, thoſe people alſo did in the low-lands, near the gulph of Uraba; for between May and September thoſe iſlands are over-flow'd in ſome places twenty foot high by the ſaid grand river of Orenoque.

Among the Tivitivas.

DEPARTING from this quarter of the Tivitivas, which was under the diviſion or tribe call'd Ciawani, he kept paſſing up the river with the flood, and anchoring in the ebb; yet the third day of his entering the river aforeſaid his galley ran a-ground, and ſtuck ſo faſt, they all thought their diſcovery was at an end, and that the greateſt number of them muſt live like rooks, and build them neſts in the boughs; but, after emptying her ballaſt, and much labour, they got her a-float at the end of the fourth day, and ſtruck into another river call'd the Great Amana, ſpacious and without winding, being one of the faireſt branches of the grand Orenoque: but here the flood of the ſea left them, and every man, from the higheſt to the loweſt, was forced to tug by turns at the oar for ſeveral days, againſt a rapid current, and in a moſt ſultry clime; for they were now in five degrees of the line. Many goodly rivulets they paſs'd on either ſide, which Ralegh nam'd in his map, and ſhewed their riſe and deſcent. When three days more were paſſed over, his company began as well to deſpair at the length of the way, as to languiſh through exceſſive heat; and well might their courage, now their proviſion alſo began to fail; yet now had they moſt need of ſtrength and vigor, when the current of the river grew moſt boiſterous and violent againſt them. Here Ralegh had a great task to keep up the ſpirits of his diſconſolate companions, which could not be done by exhortations, without example; without being ever foremoſt to endure labour, and the laſt who gratify'd himſelf with refreſhment. He alſo ſtrictly commanded his pilots to promiſe an end every next day; which honeſt deceit he uſed ſo often, they were forced to aſſure it would be at every reach. Thus while he was giving them hopes of attaining the land where their patience ſhould be rewarded with plenty; while he was wringing out every man's thoughts of returning, by the ſtrongeſt arguments which could be oppos'd; as that they were now got ſo far, and reduced to ſuch ſlender accommodations, they could not avoid periſhing if they return'd; but might find relief in proceeding: Providence ſeems to have rewarded his truſt in her, by happily ſhifting the ſcene, and preſenting the moſt beautiful landskip they had ever beheld. For here mountains, crowned with garlands of fruitful trees, invited one ſenſe; and verdant plains of many miles extent, enamell'd with groups of odorous flowers, regal'd another. Birds of ſuch ſorts and colours as they had never ſeen,[a] tempted them to ſupply themſelves by their fowling-pieces; and fiſhes of various kinds, by their nets; without which, having little or no bread, and leſs drink, only the thick and troubled water of the river, they had been in the greateſt extremity. Now the old Ciawanian they had taken (as before-mention'd) perſuading them he would lead them to a town up the branch of a river on the right hand, where they might be ſupply'd with all conveniences, and return before night; Ralegh leaving his galley, took eight musketiers in his barge, and with Gifford and Calfield in their wherries, having eight musketiers more, enter'd the mouth of that river; but rowed till ſun-ſet, and ſaw no ſign of the town even till they were forty miles diſtant from the galley, and the rowers were ready to give up the ghoſt. They had certainly hang'd this pilot, but that their neceſſities were his ſecurity; for it was quite dark, and they knew not their way back again; but as they proceeded, the river grew ſo narrow, and was ſo over-ſpread with trees from ſide to ſide, that they were all forc'd with their ſwords to cut a way for their oars, being ſtill in hopes of a ſupper that would make amends for their breakfaſt. About one a-clock after midnight they diſcern'd a light, and heard the barking of dogs; ſoon after they found the village, and there they were ſtored with proviſions, according

[a] Sir Walter Ralegh afterwards made ſome very judicious philoſopical obſervations on the birds and beaſts that have been diſcover'd in ſtrange lands; tending to prove that the difference of colour or magnitude in many of them made not a difference of ſpecies. to the promiſes of the old pilot. In the mean time, the company in the galley mann'd out a boat in ſearch of them; but next day they return'd, and continu'd their courſe, after they had made this hungry and hazardous voyage for fourſcore miles in that river; which, beſides other ſtrange fiſhes of marvellous bigneſs, abounded with thoſe ugly ſerpents call'd Crocodiles; whence the people nam'd it the river of Lagartos. Ralegh had a very proper young negro attending upon him in his galley, who, leaping out to ſwim in the mouth of this river, was, in the ſight of them all, inſtantly devour'd by one of theſe amphibious animals. Not long after, being again in want of victuals, they took two canoes laden with excellent bread, being run aſhore by the Indians in them call'd Arwacas, who fled to hide themſelves in the woods; fearing, through the prepoſſeſſions of the Spaniards, that Ralegh and his company were Canibals. Ralegh purſuing them, in hopes of ſome intelligence, found, as he was creeping through the buſhes, a refiner's basket, there being in it quickſilver, ſaltpetre, and divers other materials, for the trial of metals; and alſo the duſt of ſome ore that had been refin'd: but in two other canoes which eſcaped them, they heard of a good quantity of ore and gold. Ralegh then landed more men, and offer'd five hundred pounds to any of his ſoldiers who ſhould take one of the Spaniards, whom they thought to have alſo landed in theſe laſt canoes; but they eſcaped while he was purſuing the former: however, while he was in ſearch of the Spaniards, he found the Arwacas hidden in the woods, who had been pilots for the Spaniards; of which Ralegh kept the chief for his pilot, and carried him to Guiana; by whom he underſtood in what parts the Spaniards labour'd for gold, which he divulged to few of his company, knowing both the ſeaſon of the year and other conveniences would be wanting to work any mine himſelf. Therefore he haſted away from this place, his purpoſe being at that time rather to diſcover what he could of the country, and win over the people to ſubjection. Here Ralegh's own words are: "To ſtay "and dig out gold with our nails, had been opus laboris, but not ingenii. Such a quantity as "would have ſerved our turns we could not have had; but a diſcovery of the mines to our "infinite diſadvantage we had made; for thoſe mines (defended with rocks of hard ſtone, which "we call white ſpar) are not eaſily broken or open'd in haſte; and I could have return'd a good "quantity of gold ready caſt, if I had not ſhot at another mark than preſent profit." Beſides this reſtraint from all greedineſs after their gold, there was another virtue he no leſs ſtrictly obſerv'd, which highly advanced him in the eſteem of all thoſe Indians. For, whereas the Spaniards were wont to ſatisfy their luſts without controul upon their wives and daughters, Ralegh ſuffer'd not a man of his ſo much as to touch any of their women. "I proteſt (ſays he) be- "fore the majeſty of the living God, that I neither knew, nor believe that any of our com- "pany, one or other, by violence or otherwiſe, ever knew any of their women; and yet we "ſaw many hundreds, and had many in our power, and of thoſe very young and excellently "favour'd, which came among us without deceit, ſtark naked." And becauſe he found it a very troubleſome work to keep the meaner ſort from pilfering and ſpoil, when they went to any of the Indians houſes, Ralegh cauſed his interpreter at every place, when they departed, to enquire after, and know the loſſes or wrongs that had been done; and if he found any thing had been ſtolen or taken by violence, either the ſame was reſtor'd, and the party puniſh'd in their ſight, or elſe it was paid for to their utmoſt demand.

And juſtice.

AFTER he was recruited as aforeſaid with bread and other proviſions, which greatly encourag'd his men, who now cry'd out, Let us go on, we care not how far; Ralegh ſent back in one of the canoes the old Ciawan, and Ferdinando, his firſt pilot; giving them ſuch things as they deſir'd for their voyage, and wrote a letter to his ſhips, which they deliver'd, and then he went on under the pilotage of one of thoſe Arwacas he had taken, whom the Spaniards had chriſten'd Martin. But the next or ſecond day after, they run a-ground again with their galley, and ſhe was very near being caſt away with their new ſtore of victuals: they lay on the ſand one whole night, and were in far greater deſpair of diſengaging her than before, becauſe they had no tide of flood to help them. In the midſt of their fears, they bethought them of faſtening an anchor upon the land, and with main ſtrength drew her off. So the fifteenth day (of their abſence from their ſhips) they diſcover'd at a diſtance, to their great joy, the mountains of Guiana; and towards the evening were brought by a northerly gale in ſight of the great Orenoque,[a] which they ſoon after enter'd; a river of vaſt extent and magnitude, lying moſtly eaſt and weſt even from the ſea to Quito in Peru, thought to be three hundred miles wide at the mouth, a thouſand miles navigable for ſhips, two thouſand for leſſer veſſels, and diſcharging it ſelf by ſixteen arms into the ſea, whereby many parts of the Spaniſh Indies might moſt eaſily be invaded. From other obſervations, it appears in many places of the channel to be twenty fathom deep; and in few that are ſhoally, leſs than two and a half. It was called by the ſucceeding voyagers to this place, in honour of Sir Walter, after his name. One of them gives his reaſon for it in theſe words: "Of the worthineſs of this river becauſe I cannot ſay enough, "I will ſpeak nothing; we have preſumed to call it by the name of RALEANA, becauſe your ſelf "was the firſt of our nation who ever enter'd the ſame."[a] Now when Ralegh had procur'd of one of the bordering princes, named Toparimaca, a skilful old pilot, who was his brother, and who perfectly knew this river, he ſail'd up a branch thereof, having on the left hand a great iſland which they call Aſſapana; and thence along the banks of ſeveral other iſlands, which they choſe rather to anchor at than by the main land, becauſe of the tortoiſes eggs, which they found there in abundance, to their great relief; and for the convenience of caſting their nets from the rocks, of a blue metalline colour, which looked like ſteel ore. So keeping always weſtward up the river, there open'd after a while a land on the right ſide, which appear'd a ſpacious champain, and the banks perfectly red. Ralegh ſent captain Gifford, Thynn, Calfield, his couſins Grenvill and Butſhead Gorges; alſo his nephew John Gilbert and ſome others, with a guard of ſoldiers, to march over the banks, and diſcover what proſpect it afforded; and finding it a level of an unbounded ſpace, it proved, as their pilot inform'd them, the plains of Saima, reaching to Cumana and Caracas in the Weſt-Indies, which are a hundred and twenty leagues to the north, and inhabited by four principal nations, whereof one were the Aroras, as black as negroes, but of ſmooth hair; a deſperate people, uſing the ſtrongeſt and moſt deadly poiſon of all others on their arrows. Ralegh was moſt curious to know the compoſition of this poiſon, and what remedies could be had againſt the dreadful effects of it. For, beſides the mortality of the wound, the patient is afflicted with moſt inſufferable torment, and accompanied with ſuch irkſome ſymptoms, that the phyſician cannot abide the cure. None of the Spaniards could ever extort this ſecret either by kindneſs or cruelty; and indeed but few of the Indians, beſides their prieſts and ſoothſayers, knew it.[b] Ralegh was therefore more beholden to the Guianians than any body; for Antonio de Berrio told him, that he could never attain to the knowledge thereof. "And yet they taught me (ſays Ralegh) the beſt way of healing as well "this, as all other poiſons." Then he tells us thoſe medicines which are vulgar, and ſerve for the ordinary poiſon, are made of the juice of a root call'd Tupara,[c] which alſo marvellouſly quenches the heat of burning fevers, and heals inward wounds; and that thoſe of common poiſon'd arrows were wont to be heal'd by ſome of the Spaniards with the juice of garlic. But this he commuicates as a general rule for all men that ſhall hereafter travel the Indies where poiſon'd arrows are uſed, that they abſtain from drink; for if they take any liquor into their body, whereunto they will be exceedingly provok'd by drought, and drink before the wound is dreſs'd, or immediately upon it, there is no relief but preſent death.

Call'd Raleana.

His skill in the cure of poiſons.

AFTER having paſs'd the mountain Aio, and a great iſland, which he mentions, he reach'd on the fifth day of his entering the great river aforeſaid, as high as the province of Aromaia, and anchoring at the port of Morequito, which is ſome three hundred miles within the land, upon the ſaid great river Orenoque, he ſent a meſſenger to the old king of Aromaia, named Topiowary, who came the next day before noon on foot from his houſe, and return'd the ſame evening, being twenty-eight miles backwards and forwards, tho' himſelf was one hundred and ten years of age. He had many attendants of both ſexes, who came alſo to wonder at the Engliſh, and brought them great plenty of fleſh, fowl and fiſh, with divers ſorts of fruits, and among them abundance of pinas, the moſt excellent of all kinds,[d] eſpecially thoſe of Guiana;

[a] Relation of the ſecond voyage to Guiana by captain Laurence Keymis. vid. Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 681, 682.

[b] Whether the poiſon they uſed in Guiana was the ſame with that in ſome other parts of the Weſt-Indies, Ralegh has not told us; but Sir John Hawkins informs us, that about Cumana, where they are very expert archers, "their "poiſon is of ſuch force, that a man being ſtruck there-"with, dies in twenty-four hours: and, that in his judg-"ment, there can be no ſtronger; uſing thereunto apples, "which are fair and red of colour; but are a ſtrong poi-"ſon (perhaps the Manchineil) of which with venomous "bats, vipers, adders, and other ſerpents, they make a "medley, and anoint their arrows." See Hawkins's voyage to Guinea and the Indies of Nova Hiſpania, in Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 508.

[c] Captain Robert Harcourt, in his voyage to Guiana before quoted, ſays the juice of the leaf Uppee cures the wounds of their poiſon'd arrows. See Purchas's Pilgrims, vol. 4. fol. 1276.

[d] Whether Ralegh, at his return, brought of this fruit into England, which is otherwiſe call'd the Ananas, and vulgarly the pine-apple, from ſome reſemblance it bears in ſhape to the cones of the pine-tree; or any of that moſt delicious wine made thereof, which he there alſo taſted, has rather been ſuggeſted than confirm'd; but afterwards, when, a ſpeedy voyage, ſome of the fruit was brought over and by preſented to king James, in greater perfection than we can conceive from taſting what is forced out of hot beds here, he diſcover'd one of the noble maxims in his king-craft, by declaring, It was a fruit too delicious, for a ſubject to taſte of. See a book call'd, Advice to the planters of both Indies, 8vo. without date. But had he known the profuſeneſs which the Engliſh have ſince been at to eat them, how imperfectly ſoever, of their own raiſing, he might perhaps have more juſtly ſaid, It was a fruit too extravagant, for a ſubject to taſte of.

beſides bread, wine, and a ſort of parroquites no bigger than wrens. And one of them preſented Ralegh with a little beaſt, which the Spaniards call Armadilla, having his body ſcal'd or plated over like the Rhinoceros, with a white horn growing in his hinder parts as big as a hunting horn. This horn is recommended in medicine,[a] and the fleſh for food, ſince Ralegh ſoon after made a feaſt of it.

His conference with the king of Aromaia.

When the old king had reſted himſelf a while in a tent which Ralegh had cauſed to be pitch'd for him, they enter'd, by the interpreter, into diſcourſe about the murder of Morequito, his predeceſſor, and the other violations of the Spaniards. Then Ralegh acquainted him with the cauſe of his coming thither, whoſe ſervant he was, and that it was his queen's pleaſure he ſhould undertake this voyage for their defence, and to deliver them from the tyranny of the Spaniards; dilating at large (as he had done before at Trinidad) on her majeſty's power, her juſtice, and her clemency towards all oppreſſed nations: all which, being with great reverence and attention receiv'd, he began to ſound the old man touching Guiana; as what ſort of commonwealth it was, how govern'd, of what ſtrength and policy, of what extent; with whom in alliance or enmity; laſtly, the diſtance and way to enter the heart of the country? The king gave ſuch ample and perfect account of theſe particulars, that Ralegh wonder'd to find a man of ſuch gravity, judgment, and good diſcourſe, without the help of learning or breeding. After his departure, Ralegh ſailed weſtward to view the famous river Caroli, both becauſe it was ſo wonderful in it ſelf, and led to the ſtrongeſt nations of all the frontiers, who were enemies to the Epuremei, ſubjects to the Inga, or emperor of Guiana and Manoa. Even when he was ſhort of it, or lower down than the port of Morequito, he heard the roaring falls of this river; but when he enter'd it with his barge and wherries, thinking to have gone up ſome forty miles to the Caſſipagotos, he was not able with a barge of eight oars to row one ſtone's throw in an hour; and yet the river is as broad as the Thames at Woolwich. Therefore encamping on the banks, he ſent off an Indian to acquaint the nations upon the river of his arrival, and his purpoſe; and that he deſir'd to ſee the lords of Canuria, who dwelt in that province. Then one of the princes came down, named Wanuretona, with many of his people, and brought great ſtore of proviſions, as the reſt had done. By him Ralegh found, the Carolians were not only enemies to the Spaniards, but moſt of all to the Epuremei, who abounded in gold; and that there were three mighty nations at the head of that river which would join him againſt them. He was further inform'd by one captain George, whom he had taken with Berreo, that near the banks of this river there was a great ſilver mine; but the rivers were all now ſo riſen, that it was not poſſible for the ſtrength of man with any boat to row againſt the ſtream. Therefore he diſpatched a party between thirty and forty to coaſt the river by land, while himſelf, with two or three officers and half a dozen ſhot, marched over-land to view the ſtrange and wonderful overfalls of the ſaid river Caroli, which roar'd at ſuch a diſtance, and the plains adjoining, with the reſt of the province of Canuri. When they had got to the top of the firſt hills over-looking the river, they beheld that prodigious breach of waters which pour'd down Caroli, and how it ran in three ſtreams for twenty miles together. No leſs than ten or a dozen of theſe ſteep cataracts appear'd in ſight, each as high above the other as a church-tower; which ruſhed down with ſuch violence, that the very rebound of the waters made the place ſeem as if it had been all over cover'd with a great ſhower of rain; and in ſome places they took it at firſt for a thick ſmoak which had riſen out of ſome great town, till they drew nearer down in the valley to this thunder of waters, where they better diſcern'd and diſtinguiſh'd the effects of it. And here Ralegh ſays, he never ſaw a more beautiful country, nor more lively proſpects; the hills ſo raiſed up and down about the valleys; the waters winding into ſuch various branches; the plains ſo clear of buſh and ſtubble, and cover'd all with fair green graſs; the ground of hard ſand, and eaſy for the march either of horſe or foot; the deer croſſing in every path; the birds, towards the evening, ſinging on every tree a thouſand ſeveral tunes, with cranes and herons of white, crimſon and carnation, pearched along the river banks; the air refreſh'd with gentle eaſterly breezes; and every ſtone they ſtoop'd to take up, promiſing either gold or ſilver by its complexion. His company, at their return, brought ſeveral of theſe ſtones home; which they rather found colour'd outwardly like gold, than any of that metal fixed in them; for thoſe who had leaſt judgment or experience, kept only ſuch as glitter'd, and would not be perſuaded but they were rich, becauſe they ſhone, thereby bred an opinion, that all the reſt were no better. Yet ſome of theſe ſtones Ralegh ſhewed afterwards to a Spaniard of the Caracas, who told him it was El madre del oro, that is, the mother of gold; and that the mine was further in the ground.

His report of the Ewaipanoma.

AMONG the goodly rivers beyond the Caroli, there is one named Caora. Upon this branch, it was atteſted to Ralegh by the moſt intelligent and credible chiefs of the adjacent parts, there dwelt a nation of people whoſe heads appear not above their ſhoulders; which, becauſe every body in the provinces of Aromaia and Canuri alſo affirm'd, he was inclin'd to believe. They are call'd Ewaipanoma, and reported to have their eyes in their ſhoulders, and mouths in their breaſts (or in a level with them.) It was further avouch'd to him, they uſed bows, arrows, and clubs thrice as big as any of the Guianians; and that one being taken priſoner the year before, was brought into Aromaia. When Ralegh doubted of ſuch a race to the prince, hereafter men-tion'd, who came with him into England, he anſwer'd, it was no wonder among them; for they had lately ſlain many hundreds of his father's people. Ralegh obſerves, "That Mandevill "had before written of ſuch a nation;[a] and that, ſince the Eaſt-Indian diſcoveries, we find "many of his relations true, which were before held incredible." Further, that when he after-wards arriv'd at Cumana, he ſpoke with a Spaniard eminent for his travels, and withal for his credit and veracity; who, hearing that Ralegh had been as far in Guiana as Caroli, immediately ask'd him if he had ſeen thoſe people, and declar'd he had ſeen many of them. Then Ralegh names ſome French merchants of London, who were there preſent, and heard what this Spaniard had thus aſſerted. "Whether it is true or no (ſays he) the matter is not great, neither can "there be any profit in the imagination; for my own part, I ſaw them not; but am reſolv'd, "that ſo many people did not all combine or fore-think to make the report." After all, whe-ther the obſervation of any garment looſely riſing above the ſhoulders of theſe people, or the crouching poſture in which they were ſo much ſeen, by their conſtant exerciſe of archery, might not firſt give ſome riſe to this report, I leave for others more largely to explain;[b] and how far the ſame perſon ſhould here be condemn'd for an implicit faith, who was, as we have read, cenſur'd for the want of it. This conſideration may be further offer'd for what Ralegh alſo repeats, not only from the writers of all nations, concerning the modern

And of the Amazons.

Amazons in theſe parts,[c] but from their very neighbours. For having told us, that Orellana firſt diſcover'd Marannon, which is call'd the river of Amazons,[d] and alſo after the ſaid diſco-verers own name, Ralegh was inquiſitive to know whether there were any of thoſe warlike women, from whom this river ſhould be ſo call'd, in theſe American parts, who are ſo fam'd in ancient hiſtories to have been in Aſia and Africa; and was aſſur'd by an ancient Caſique, that there was ſuch a nation of women on the ſouth of the ſaid river, in the provinces of Topago, whoſe manners and cuſtoms, as they deſcrib'd to him, did ſomewhat conform with what is recorded of the ancient Amazons: as, that they cohabited with men but one month in the year; ſent them the male children, and kept only the females; "but that they cut off their right breaſt (ſays "he) I do not find to be true." He was further told, they ſcrupled not to accompany with the priſoners they took in war at any time; but in the end conſtantly put them to death: and that, as others of the bordering nations, theſe women wore certain plates of gold, which they had

Hiſt.* lib. 7. cap. 2. and lib. 5. cap. 8. But the no-tion of ſuch a people did now ſo prevail, captain Keymis bringing freſh aſſurances of men with mouths in their breaſts, exceeding wide, from Guiana the year after, that Shake-ſpear, in his Tempeſt, tells us every adventurer would now bring good warrant of them. He repeats the deſcription again of thoſe people; where Othello relates the wonders of his travels, to charm the attention and concern of his Deſdemona: and this, as 'tis thought, in compliment to Sir Walter Ralegh's authority; for Shakeſpear had certainly read his diſcovery of Guiana, as by other paſſages in his plays might be proved.

[b] Mr. Theobald thinks, we may be able to account, in a few lines, for the myſtery of theſe ſuppoſed headleſs peo-ple: for Olearius ſpeaking (ſays he) of the manner of cloathing of the Samojeds, a people of north Muſcovy, ſays, "Their garments are made like thoſe call'd Coſaques, open "only at the necks. When the cold is extraordinary, "they put their Coſaques over their heads, and let the "ſleeves hang down, their faces being not to be ſeen but "at the cleft, which is at the neck; whence ſome have "taken occaſion to write, that in theſe northern countries, "there are people without heads, having their faces in "their breaſts." Theobald's Shakeſpear, 8vo. 1733. vol. VII. p. 393.

ſometimes exchang'd with other countries for ſpleen-ſtones, which are of a green colour; and whereof (ſays Ralegh) I ſaw divers in Guiana; for every king or caſique commonly has one, which their wives chiefly wear, and eſteem as great jewels. Theſe ſtrange reports, however difficultly digeſted by thoſe who had only travell'd at home; which made Ralegh afterwards produce many learned authorities, both ancient and modern, to juſtify himſelf from impoſing any inventions of his own;[a] foreigners, it ſeems, thought not ſo extravagant, being more familiar and current among them; and Hugo Grotius, intimates as if Ralegh ſhew'd no more regard to theſe accounts than any other traveller would have done; where, mentioning this his diſcovery of Guiana, he ſays, "That as to the Amazons, and thoſe who had their faces in "their breaſts, having only heard talk of them, he left it for others to find them out."[b] But to return:

WHILE Ralegh, with his company, lay at anchor on the coaſt of Canuri, and had taken knowledge of all the nations upon the head and branches of the Caroli; had found out many tribes who were enemies to the Epuremei and the new conquerors, having now ſail'd and wander'd for the ſpace of near a month, diſtant from his ſhips above four hundred miles; beſides the long digreſſions up many arms and branches on every ſide by the way, they found the winter-ſeaſon advance apace,[c] and the Orenoque threaten them with greater fury every day than other; the time they ſpent at Trinidad, and the company they there in vain waited for, being both wanted here to compleat their enterpriſe. For the moſt violent ſtorms of thunder and lightning which now ſo frequently broke out, pour'd down ſuch floods of rain, as made all the rivers riſe and rage moſt fearfully; ſo that if they waded them over-ſhoos in the morning outward, homeward they could not come, even the ſame day, without wading to their necks, or ſwimming before they could reach their boats. Beſides, they all grew very uneaſy to themſelves and one another for want of ſhifting, no man having room to beſtow any other apparel than what he wore on his back; and that was waſh'd through to his skin often ten times a day. Theſe inconveniences, with thoſe of having no inſtruments to try any mines, or men ſufficient to ſecure them againſt the guarded nations nearer the imperial city of Manoa, captain Preſton having fail'd them, as was before ſaid, made Ralegh conclude there was now no advancing thither, or ſtaying longer here; but that he might well content himſelf for this voyage with the various diſcoveries of the ſituation, products and riches of the country, which he had thus far made; with the intereſt and friendſhip he had thus ſpaciouſly procur'd; and which no adventurer to thoſe regions ever had in a much larger ſpace of time, with much greater aids and proviſions, the diligence and dexterity to equal.

As he return'd therefore to the eaſt, he ſpent ſome time in diſcovering the river towards the ſea which he had not ſurvey'd, and which he thought alſo neceſſary to do. In a day's time he arriv'd again at the port of Morequito; for, gliding down the ſtream, he went without labour, tho' againſt the wind, little leſs than a hundred miles a day. When he came to anchor, he was very deſirous of ſome further conference with old Topiowari, who ſoon, upon notice, came, with a multitude of his people, flocking down to Ralegh's tent upon the ſhore, every one loaded with preſents. When the old king was refreſh'd, and the crowd retir'd, Ralegh, by his interpreter, enter'd into a long conference with him; telling him that as both the Epuremei and the Spaniards were his enemies; the one having conquer'd Guiana already, and the other endeavour'd to get it from both, he deſir'd to be inſtructed both in the beſt ways to the golden parts of Guiana, and the civiliz'd towns, or apparell'd people of Inga. The king anſwer'd, he could not perceive Ralegh meant to proceed to the great city of Manoa, becauſe neither the ſeaſon of the year nor the ſtrength of his company would enable him; for he remember'd that in the plains of Maqureguarai, the firſt civil town of Guiana, where all the gold plates were made which were ſcatter'd over the neighbouring nations, and about four days journey from his own, three hundred Spaniards were deſtroy'd, who had no friends among the borderers; therefore adviſed Ralegh never to invade the ſtrong parts of Guiana, without the help of all thoſe nations which were their enemies. Ralegh ask'd, if he thought the company he had with him were ſufficient to take that town: the king thought they were, and proffer'd to aſſiſt him with all his borderers, if he would leave him a guard of fifty men upon his departure; but Ra- legh knowing if they ſhould eſcape the Guianians, the Spaniards expecting ſupplies, would repay upon them his treatment at Trinidad, very plauſibly excus'd himſelf. Hereupon the king deſir'd he would forbear him and his country at this time; for if the Epuremei ſhould know he had given Ralegh any aid or intelligence, he ſhould ſoon be over-run by them; nor could he avoid the Spaniards, if they ſhould return, who had before led him ſeventeen days in a chain like a dog, till he paid a hundred plates of gold and ſeveral chains of ſpleen-ſtones for his ranſom: but if Ralegh would return in due ſeaſon next year, he would engage all the borderers in the enterpriſe; for that he could not more deſire to make himſelf maſter of Guiana, than they to aſſiſt him; having been plunder'd in their wars by the Epuremei of their women, whom to recover they would willingly renew the war, without hopes of further profit; for the old king complain'd of it as a matter of grievous reſtraint, that now they were confin'd to three or four wives apiece, who were wont to enjoy ten or a dozen; while the lords of their enemies had no leſs than fifty or a hundred. But they ſeem to have had a political reaſon for this recovery, to ſtrengthen their alliance and increaſe their forces, theſe frontiers having been much depopulated between the ſubjects of Inga and the Spaniards. Ralegh, after further conſultation, finding it abſolutely improper either to leave any of his company, or attempt war upon the Epuremei till the next year, apply'd himſelf now only to learn how theſe people wrought thoſe plates of gold which were diſpers'd about, and how they divided it from the ſtone. The king told him, that moſt of their plates and images were not ſever'd from the ſtone; but that on the lake of Manoa, and many other rivers thereabouts, they gather'd the perfect grains of gold, and mingling a proportion of copper, the better to work it, put it in a great earthen pot, under which they increas'd the fire by the breath of men, through long canes faſten'd to the holes round the ſaid pot, till the metal diſſolv'd, which then they caſt into moulds of ſtone and clay, and ſo made thoſe plates and images; whereof Ralegh brought two ſorts into England, more to ſhew the manner of them than their value: for he gave more pieces of gold of the twenty ſhilling coin, with the queen's effigies upon them, among theſe people, to wear in honour of her majeſty, and to engage them in her ſervice, than he receiv'd; ſo little did he make his deſire of gold known to them. He alſo brought over ſome gold ore of their mines, "whereof I "know ſome is as rich (ſays he) as any the earth yields, and of which I know there is ſuffi-"cient, if nothing elſe were to be hop'd for;" but they wanted time, hands and inſtruments to break the ground, without which there could be no working of mines. "We ſaw (adds he) "all the hills with ſtones of the colour of gold and ſilver, and we try'd them to be no Mar-"queſite; and therefore ſuch as the Spaniards call El madre del oro, or, the mother of gold, "which is an undoubted aſſurance of the general abundance thereof; and my ſelf ſaw the out-"ſide of many mines of the Sparre, which I know to be the ſame that all covet in this world; "and of thoſe, more than I will ſpeak of." Now Ralegh, beſides having learn'd the riches of the country, having alſo won the affections of the people, and receiv'd a faithful promiſe of the chiefs in thoſe provinces of Aromaia and Canuri to become ſervants to her majeſty, took his leave of old Topiowari, and receiv'd his ſon prince Cayworaco as a pledge betwixt them, whom he brought into England, where he was chriſten'd Gualtero with great ſolemnity, leaving with the old king two of his own people in exchange; the one named Francis Sparrow, who being a good draughtſman, and could deſcribe a country with his pen, deſir'd to be left for that purpoſe, whom Ralegh inſtructed to travel as far as he could to Manoa with ſuch merchandiſe as he committed to his care; the other was a boy, who waited upon him, named Hugh Goodwin, for whom he left orders to be taught the language of the country. This done, he weigh'd anchor, and coaſted the river on Guiana-ſide, becauſe he came towards it on the north-ſide by the lawns of Saima.

THERE was a powerful caſique named Putijma, who accompanied Ralegh and his men from Aromaia, with promiſes to lead them to a mountain call'd Iconuri, which contain'd a mine of gold; and which (ſays Ralegh) he perform'd. Ralegh travell'd a great way towards it himſelf along the river Mana, till, through wearineſs, he was forced with ſome of his attendants to reſt on the banks of a lake in the delightful valley of Oiana; where one of his guides kindling a fire with two ſticks,[a] they ſtay'd a while to dry their ſhirts, which, with exceſſive heat, were very wet and heavy upon them; ſending captain Keymis the while with a party under that caſique to take cognizance of the ſaid mine, and promis'd to meet him at the river Cumaca, in his way to Emeria, the province of Carapana, one of the greateſt lords of the Orenoqueponi, with whom he ſought to eſtabliſh a league. And as Ralegh return'd by the river Mana towards the ſaid province, he ſaw himſelf many rocks like gold ore, and on the left hand a round mountain of mineral ſtone. From hence returning down the ſtream, he coaſted the province of Parino; but the branches of the rivers he here paſſed, with Aio and other mountains, he reſerv'd to the repreſentation in his map; which, for the numerous and diſtant rivers and countries therein occaſionally refer'd to, appears to have been a very accurate and comprehenſive performance.[a] In the river of Winicapora he ſaw what they call'd the mountain of cryſtal, which look'd at a diſtance like a white church-tower of exceeding height, over the top of which a mighty river ruſh'd down with prodigious noiſe. Berreo told him, there were diamonds and other ſtones of great value thereon, which blaz'd at a great diſtance. Upon this river Ralegh reſted a while, and marched to a town of the ſame name, where he found the natives all as drunk as beggars, it being the time of their feſtival. Here Ralegh refreſh'd himſelf with the proviſions of the place, and the delicate wine of Pinas, which the people brought him and his company in great plenty. But underſtanding that Carapana was retir'd from Emeria; and imagining, becauſe he was an old ſubtil prince, it was to wait till he ſhould return next year, then join him, if the Engliſh were ſtrong enough to tempt his alliance; if not, that he might excuſe his retirement to the Spaniards, as tho' it were in fear of theſe new viſitors; Ralegh ſpent no more time in ſeeking after him; but making to the river Cumaca, he met with Keymis, and took his leave of Putijma, who, of all others, moſt lamented his departure; for the Orenoque was now ſwoln moſt dreadfully, ſo that it was impoſſible to return by the way he enter'd, for the river of Amana could not be ſailed back by any means, the breeze and current of the ſea were ſo outragious: therefore he follow'd the branch of Capuri, which enter'd into the ſea eaſtward of his ſhips, that he might bear with them before the wind; and great need there was ſo to do, having by that way as much to croſs of the main ſea, in their little boats, after they came to the river's mouth, as between Gravelin and Dover. But when they arriv'd at the ſea-ſide, and anchor'd in the mouth of Capuri, they were in a moſt deſperate condition; for there aroſe a mighty ſtorm, and the river's mouth was at leaſt a league broad, ſo that they run before night cloſe under the land with their boats, and brought the galley as near as they could, which had much ado to live, and was often near ſinking with all her men. Ralegh was in the utmoſt doubt what courſe to take; either to venture in the galley through ſix foot water on the ſands for two leagues together, and that in the channel, when ſhe drew five; or truſt in ſuch a raging wind and ſea to croſs over in his barge. At laſt, ſeeing the tempeſt increaſe the longer he tarried, he took Gifford, Calfield, and Grenvil, in his barge; and about midnight thruſt into the ſea, leaving the galley to come by day-light. "Thus faintly chearing one another in ſhew of courage (ſays "Ralegh) it pleas'd God by nine a-clock the next morning we diſcover'd the iſle of Trinidad." So they kept along the ſhore to Curiapan, where they found their ſhips at anchor; "than "which (ſays he) there was never to us a more joyful ſight;" eſpecially when they found, upon meeting together, they had loſt but one man (before-mention'd) through ſo many extremes of wet, heat, hunger, want of reſt, ſleep, lodging, and ſuch like violent hardſhips in this toilſom and dangerous adventure, as drove them to many unuſual and unhealthy ſhifts, eſpecially in their diet; ſuch as feeding upon many ſtrange and corrupted fruits; upon freſh fiſh without ſeaſoning; crocodiles, ſea-cows,[b] anta's, and armed hogs; upon all ſorts, of the land or water; good and bad; without order or meaſure: and yet no calenture befell them, or other peſtilent diſeaſes which are wont to infect all regions ſo near the line; ſo wholeſom was the country, or ſo happily ſuited to their conſtitutions. The many praiſes which Ralegh further beſtows upon the plenty and other felicities of Guiana, I muſt leave to the noble deſcription he has writ of it, having here only extracted ſuch parts as more chiefly reſpect our preſent endeavour at the perſonal hiſtory of its author.

Draws a general map of the country.

In a dreadful ſtorm.

[a] This large and general map of Guiana and the neighbouring countries, Ralegh often mentions; and where he is ſpeaking of the Orenoque; how far it is navigable; what conſiderable parts of the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies are to be invaded thereby; to what other regions it leads, the deſcent of its branches; and where it falls into the ſea, he tells us, theſe particulars, that he may not be tedious, ſhall better be perceiv'd in the general deſcription of Guiana, Peru, Nuevo Reyno, the kingdom of Popayan and Roidas, with the province of Veneçuela, to the bay of Uraba, behind Cartagena weſtward; and to Amazones ſouthward. Whether the little map, which I think is prefix'd to the Latin edition of Ralegh's diſcovery of Guiana, hereafter mention'd, is a contraction of this large and general map; I do not remember, when I had that tract in my hand, to have obſerv'd by any inſcription there may be thereon.

[b] Of theſe ſea-monſters, otherwiſe call'd manati by the Spaniards, Ralegh ſays he had ſeen as big as a wine-pipe; others deſcribe its fleſh to be like beef, and to yield an excellent oil; the hide, being dreſs'd, makes good buff; and dried, good targets or armour; wherefore, we are told, Sir Walter Ralegh brought ſeveral of theſe hides into England. See captain Harcourt's voyage in Purchas (before-mention'd) fol. 1275.

Fires ſome Spaniſh towns.

In his return homewards he touch'd at Cumana, to ſtore and refreſh himſelf with ſuch proviſions as he wanted; but the Spaniards refuſed to ſupply him, at which he threatned the town; and upon their refuſing alſo to ſave it by ſuch reaſonable ranſom as they had juſt before offer'd captain Preſton, he ſet it on fire: the like he did at St. Mary, and at Rio de la Hach, as we are informed by Camden and others; ſome of whom affirm, he got not only great glory hereby, but riches; the latter of which will be thought doubtful to thoſe who have read the Spaniards had removed their effects to the mountains, before they entered into a capitulation with Preſton. On the 13th of July, when the ſaid captain Preſton, with the reſt of his company, were under Cape St. Anthony, the weſtermoſt part of the iſle of Cuba, "we met (ſays the "writer of his voyage) with the honourable knight Sir Walter Ralegh, returning from his "painful and happy diſcovery of Guiana, and his ſurpriſe of the iſle of Trinidad: ſo with glad "hearts we kept him and his fleet of three ſhips company (for he mentions no more) till the "twentieth day at night, at which time we loſt them."[a]

Writes a diſcourſe of his Guianian diſcoveries.

When Ralegh was arrived in England, he ſoon applied himſelf to digeſt the obſervations he had made in his diſcoveries, and they were, not many months after, committed to the preſs.[b] Several authors have beſtowed characters in praiſe of this diſcourſe, which manifeſts ſuch a wonderful genius in compaſſing the knowledge of ſo many places, productions, and people, with ſo ſmall a power, and in ſo ſhort a time. The honourable Mr. Duddely, natural ſon of the earl of Leiceſter, and afterwards a knight alſo of great renown for his writings and adventures, ſpeaking of a diſcovery into Guiana, which had been communicated to him, ſays it was in the ſelf-ſame manner almoſt ſuch as Sir Walter Ralegh hath very diſcreetly written.[c] Camden refers thoſe who would know more of this enterprize, to an ingenious book of Ralegh's writing, wherein he gives a moſt accurate deſciption of the countries, as if he had been born and bred there.[d] And a later author mentions this treatiſe as one of thoſe written by Ralegh, which is full of proper, clear and courtly graces of ſpeech.[e] The action it ſelf has alſo had many juſt encomiums beſtowed upon it by Mr. Hakluyt, captain Harcourt, and others; the latter of whom, ſpeaking of the Great Orenoque (at a time wherein he will not be ſuſpected guilty of flattery to the firſt of our nation who explored that river) adds, wherein Sir Walter Ralegh performed his worthy and memorable diſcovery.[f] Nor could the muſes forbare to celebrate ſuch a glorious exploit, as well by the pens of thoſe who were eye-witneſſes of his toils and travel, as thoſe who were no ways concerned in them: for captain Keymis, who bore him company, as we have obſerved, wrote this year a Latin copy of verſes in praiſe of the Guianian expedition, deſcribing the ſituation of the country, with its riches, and Ralegh's unparallel'd dexterity, for performing that diſcovery in a month, which ſo many brave Spaniards had in vain attempted many years.[g] And another learned poet, whom I take to have been Mr. George Chapman, wrote at the ſame time a heroic poem in Engliſh upon the ſame ſubject. Thoſe who have read this whole poem attentively, which contains near two hundred lines, and obſerved what lofty ſtrokes of praiſe the author beſtows upon this enterprize, as well as the cordial inſtigations wherewith he animates his country to perſevere in it, may conceive, I have had ſome conſtraint upon my ſelf, through a regard to that proportion which is here neceſſary, in tranſcribing no more from it, than thoſe parts wherein Ralegh is directly mentioned, when the whole redounds ſo much to his glory. And firſt, the poet, after having invoked his muſe to ſing the atchievement of that hero's ſword, which is conſecrated to his queen; and told us, the ſubject of his ſong is riches with honour, and conqueſt without blood; enough to ſeat univerſal monarchy, like the bird of Jove, upon Eliza's hand; and deſcribed the wealthy Guiana bowing her mighty breaſt, and making every ſign of ſubmiſſion to become both the ſiſter and the daughter of that ſacred maid; he goes on thus:

Then

Then moſt admir'd ſoveraign, let your breath
Go forth upon the waters, and create
A golden world in this our iron age;
And be the proſp'rous fore-wind to a fleet,
That ſeconding your laſt, may go before it.
In all ſucceſs of profit and renown:
Doubt not but your election was divine;
As well by fate, as your high judgment order'd,
To raiſe him with choice bounties who cou'd add Height to his height; and like a liberal vine,
Not only bear his virtuous fruit aloft,
Free from the preſs of ſquint-ey'd envy's feet,
But deck his gracious prop with golden bunches;
And ſhroud it with broad leaves of rule o'er-grown,
From all black tempeſts of invaſion.

THEN having exhorted the queen not to let the courſe of her reign be like thoſe great winds, which in the morning of their power tear up forreſts by the roots, raiſe the ſeas to the ſkies, and make the earth tremble, yet, bury their waſtful bravery in the evening; but rather like a river that flows from the mountains, and grows greater the further it runs, till, mixing with the main, it takes his titles and command: having alſo expoſed thoſe politicians, who would be wiſe in ſpight of wiſdom; who think nothing can be right but certainty, and place their faith in incredulity; that coward's caſtle, ſluggard's cradle, and only wit of fools, which ſlovenly defaces all things fair: and laſtly, having bewail'd the corruptions of nature in our greateſt nobility, whoſe bodies have choak'd their minds, which are bereaft of ſenſe through exceſſive ſenſualities, till the effects of their luſts have like lightning wounded her ſoul through her fleſh unwounded; ſo that ſhe muſt need incitements to her recovery even from the part ſhe hurts; the poet finely continues in theſe words:

——————————O how moſt like
Art thou, heroic author of this act;
To this wrong'd ſoul of nature! that ſuſtain'ſt
Pain, charge, and peril, for thy country's good;
And ſhe much like a body numb'd with ſurfeits,
Feels not thy gentle applications
For the health, uſe, and honour of her powers!
Yet ſhall my verſe through all her eaſe-lock'd ears
Trumpet the nobleſs of thy high intent;
And if it cannot into act proceed,
The fault, and bitter penance of the fault,
Make red ſome others eyes with penitence,
For thine are clear — and what more nimble ſpirits,
Apter to bite at ſuch unhooked baits,
Gain by our loſs, that, muſt we needs confeſs,
Thy princely valour would have purchas'd us;
Which ſhall be fame eternal to thy name,
Though thy contentment, in thy grave deſires
Of our advancement, fail deſerved effect.
O how I fear thy glory which I love,
Leſt it ſhould dearly grow by our decreaſe!
Natures, that ſtick in golden-gravel'd ſprings,
In muck-pits, cannot ſcape their ſwallowings.

YET the poet confiding in the Patrician ſpirits of the nation to encourage this ſublime endeavour at ſuch imperial enlargements of the Britiſh dominion, and eſpecially in the temptations of the country it ſelf, Gold, like fate, giving life and law to all our actions; preſages they ſhould all go to Guiana; that Britiſh colonies ſhould be planted, churches and palaces built there; and that the whole world, by this heroic conqueſt, ſhould pay homage to the queen of England: but it cannot be ſo juſtly deſcribed as in the lines themſelves.

Then in the Theſpiads bright prophetic ſont,
Methinks I ſee our liege riſe from her throne,
Her ears and thoughts in ſteep amaze erect,
At the moſt rare endeavour of her power.
And now ſhe bleſſes with her wonted graces,
Th' induſtrious knight, the ſoul of this exploit;
Diſmiſſing him to convoy of his ſtars.
And now for love and honour of his worth,
Our twice-born nobles bring him bridegroom-like,
That is eſpous'd for virtue to his love,
With feaſts and muſick raviſhing the air,
To his Argolian fleet; where round about
His bating colours, Engliſh valour ſwarms
In haſte, as if Guianian Orenoque,
With his full waters fell upon our ſhore.
And now a wind as forward as their ſpirits,
Sets their glad feet on ſmooth Guiana's breaſt;
Where, as if each man were an Orpheus,
A world of ſavages fall tame before them,
Storing their thriſt-free treaſuries with gold.
And there doth plenty crown their wealthy fields;
There, learning eats no more his thriftleſs books;
Nor valour, oſtridge-like, his iron arms:
There, beauty is no ſtrumpet to her wants,
Nor Gallique humours putrify her blood;
But all our youth take Hymen's lights in hand,
And fill each roof with honour'd progeny:
There, makes ſociety Adamantine chains,
And joins their hearts with wealth, whom wealth diſjoin'd:
There healthful recreations ſtrew the meads,
And make their manſions dance with neighbourhood,
Which here were drown'd in churliſh avarice:
And there do palaces and temples riſe
Out of the earth, and kiſs th' enamour'd ſkies;
Where New Britannia humbly kneels to heaven,
The world to her, and both, at her bleſt feet,
In whom the circles of all empire meet. [a]

But the poet was no prophet in this reſpect; for Raleigh, with all his zeal and aſſiduity for the honour and advantage of his country, of which he could not give more ſincere proofs than he did, by his continual forwardneſs to venture his fortune, and his life therein, could never induce the ſtate to proceed in the plantation of Guiana; not ſo much through any real incredulity of the emoluments that would accrue from it, the ſuperficial cauſe of its neglect; as through that malignant jealouſy which ſo eternally biaſs'd the domeſtic competitors for royal favour, to curb the foreign ſervices of enterpriſing men, leſt the atchievements of the one ſhould outſhine the adminiſtrations of the other: and this reaſon we may have further occaſion hereafter more expreſly to confirm out of Raleigh's own words; whence we may here obſerve, that he, whoſe engaging qualities had gain'd him ſuch influence, ſuch an aſcendency over the moſt ſavage and unciviliz'd nations, found no diſpoſitions ſo barbarous and intractable among thoſe ſtrangers, as he did in his own country; like Hercules himſelf, who having, by his glorious labours, ſhewed his power of ſubduing and taming all other monſters, found envy and detraction invincible at laſt. That Raleigh's labours were attended with the ſame fate, himſelf has ſufficiently diſcover'd in that dedication, which, with ſo much eloquence, modeſty, and generoſity, he made of his diſcourſe upon Guiana aforeſaid, to the lord-admiral Howard and Sir Robert Cecyl. For notwithſtanding the difficulties and dangers of the voyage, "It appears (ſays Raleigh therein) that I "made no other bravado of going to ſea than was meant, and that I was never hidden in Corn-

" wal or elſewhere, as was ſuppos'd. They have groſly belied me, that fore-judged I would Traduc'd.
" rather become a ſervant to the Spaniſh king than return; and the reſt were much miſtaken,
" who would have perſuaded that I was too eaſeful and ſenſual to undertake a journey of ſo
" great travel: but (as he generouſly continues) if what I have done receive the gracious con-
" ſtruction of a painful pilgrimage, and purchaſe the leaſt remiſſion, I ſhall think all too little;
" and that there were wanting to the reſt many miſeries." And as he had juſt before obſerv'd, in a delicate reflection upon the ungrateful cuſtom of making one failing eclipſe the merit of many virtuous actions, where he ſays, " If ought might have been deſerv'd in former times to have
" counterpois'd any part of offences, the fruit thereof, as it ſeems, was long before fallen from the " tree, and the dead ſtock only remain'd." So here he goes on; " But if both the times paſt;
" the preſent, and what may be in the future, do all by one grain of gall continue in eternal
" diſtaſte; I do not then know whether I ſhould bewail my ſelf either for my too much travel " and expence, or condemn my ſelf for doing leſs than that which can deſerve nothing.
" From my ſelf I have deſerv'd no thanks, for I am return'd a beggar and wither'd; but " that I might have better'd my poor eſtate, it ſhall appear by the following diſcourſe, if I had not " reſpected only her majeſty's future honour and riches. It became not the former fortune in " which I once liv'd, to go journeys of picory; and it had ſorted ill with the offices of honour
" which by her majeſty's grace I hold this day in England, to run from cape to cape, and from " place to place, for the pillage of ordinary prizes." The inſignificancy of theſe purſuits alſo in our other Engliſh adventurers to diſtreſs the king of Spain, he lays open a little further, in the following manner: " This undertaking hath another ground and aſſurance of riches and " glory than the voyages of the Weſt-Indies; an eaſier way to invade the beſt parts thereof
" than by the common courſe. The king of Spain is not ſo impoveriſh'd by taking three or " four port-towns in America, as we ſuppoſe; neither are the riches of Peru or Nueva Eſpanna
" ſo left by the ſea-ſide, as to be eaſily waſh'd away with a great flood or ſpring-tide, or left
" dry upon the ſands at a low ebb. The port-towns are few and poor in reſpect of thoſe
" within the land; are of little defence, and only rich when the fleets are to receive the trea-
" ſure for Spain: and we might think the Spaniards very ſimple, having ſo many horſes
" and ſlaves, if they could not upon two days warning carry all the gold they have into the " land, and far enough from the reach of our foot-men, eſpecially the Indies being ſo moun" tainous, ſo full of woods, rivers and marſhes." Here he goes on to give a large variety of examples, naming, beſides the ports of Cumana and St. Joſepho, which he took himſelf, and found not therein one rial of plate, many other towns and cities which are wealthy, but of difficult acceſs through our want of good footing in the neighbourhood of them. And leaves many more iſlands, ports, cities and mines in Peru and other parts unnam'd with the reſt, both that the grandeur of thoſe territories might not ſeem incredible, and for this further reaſon;
" Of all which (ſays he) becauſe I have written a particular treatiſe of the Weſt-Indies,[a] I His treatiſe
" will omit the repetition at this time; ſeeing that in the ſaid treatiſe I have anatomiz'd of the Weſt-
" the reſt of the ſea-towns, as well as of Nicaragua, Jucatan, Nueva Eſpanna, and the Indies.
" iſlands, as thoſe of the inland; and by what means they may be beſt invaded, as far " as any mean judgment can comprehend." But Ralegh was in hopes it would appear there was now a way found out to anſwer every man's longing; a richer Indies than any the king of Spain enjoy'd, which if the queen would patronize, he was willing to end the remainder of his days in reducing it to a total ſubjection. Whatever he further advanced of this kind, diffidence and detraction were ſo predominant, that becauſe ſome of Ralegh's company brought over marcaſite for gold, as he informs us a little further,[b] there were ſome who would not believe the real gold ore which he brought, and which he had helped to dig out of the rocks with his own dagger, was of greater value. Nay, when many trials had been made of this ore,[c] wherein ſome quantities were proved by one Weſtwood, a refiner in Wood-ſtreet, to hold after the rate of twelve or thirteen thouſand pounds a ton. His trial of
Other parcels, by Mr. Bulmar and Dimock, aſſay-maſter, found alſo to hold after the rate of the Guianian

[b] Sir W. Ralegh's preface to the diſcovery of Guiana.

[c] Some of the ore which Sir W. Ralegh brought from Guiana, and probably of this which he brought at this time, has been ſo careſully preſerv'd in his family, that it is now in the poſſeſſion of captain William Elwes; who, among other communications relating to Sir W. Ralegh, has courteouſly oblig'd me with a ſight thereof.

Guiana,

Guiana, which held a third part of gold: when all this was prov'd, there were thoſe who would not yet believe it gold of Guiana; but that Raleigh purchas'd it upon the African coaſt, and carried it over thither. " Surely, the ſingularity of that device (ſays Raleigh) I do not " well comprehend: for my own part, I am not ſo much in love with theſe long voyages, as " to deviſe thereby to couſen my ſelf; to lie hard, to fare worſe, to be ſubject to perils, to " diſeaſes, to ill ſavors, to be parch'd and wither'd, and withal, to ſuſtain the care and labour " of ſuch an enterpriſe; except the ſame had more comfort than the fetching of marcaſite " in Guiana, or buying of gold ore in Barbary. But I hope the better ſort will judge me by " themſelves, and that the way of deceit is not the way of honour or good opinion. I have " herein conſumed much time and many crowns, and I had no other reſpect or deſire than to " ſerve her majeſty and my country thereby. If the Spaniſh nation had been of the like belief " with theſe detractors, we ſhould little have fear'd or doubted their attempts wherewith we now " are daily threaten'd. But if we now conſider of the actions both of Charles V, who had the " maidenhead of Peru, and the abundant treaſures of Atabalipa, together with the affairs of " the Spaniſh king now living; what he has added to the acts of his predeceſſors; how many " kingdoms he has endanger'd; how many armies, garriſons and navies he maintains; the " great loſſes he has repair'd, as in eighty-eight, above a hundred ſail of great ſhips, with " their artillery; and that no year is leſs unfortunate, but that many veſſels, treaſures and peo- " ple are devour'd; and yet that he begins again, like a ſtorm, to threaten ſhipwreck to us " all; we ſhall find that theſe abilities ariſe not from the trades of ſack and Seville-oranges, nor " from ought elſe that either Spain, Portugal, or any of his other provinces produce; it is his " Indian gold that endangers and diſturbs all the nations of Europe; it creeps into councils, " purchaſes intelligence, and ſets bound loyalty at liberty in the greateſt monarchies thereof: " if the Spaniſh king can keep us from foreign enterpriſes, and from the impeachment of his " trades; either by offer of invaſion, or by beſieging us in Britain, Ireland, or elſewhere, he " has then brought the work of our peril in great forwardneſs: for thoſe princes, who abound " in treaſure, have great advantages over the reſt, if they once conſtrain them to a defen- " ſive war, where they are driven, once a year or oftener, to caſt lots for their own gar- " ments." [a] For theſe and other ſubſtantial reaſons which Raleigh produces, he declares, he has labour'd all his life, both to the utmoſt of his own power and perſuaſion of others, in the promotion of thoſe attempts which promis'd either an enlargement of our own national intereſt, or an abatement of the encroaching greatneſs of the Spaniard, who, in his judgment, is not to be more eaſily reduc'd than by ſuch a war; from ſo many weak nations are his treaſures gather'd, and ſo far ſeparated from mutual ſuccour. But becauſe he thought ſuch reſolution and preparations were not to be hoped for in haſte, he doubted not, if her majeſty would embrace the offer of thoſe provinces, and that empire now by him diſcover'd, before they were engroſs'd by the enemy; but it would yield greater quantities of treaſure than all the king of Spain poſſeſſes from the Indies, both Eaſt and Weſt; and he would be contented to loſe her good opinion for ever, and his life withal, if the country ſhould not be found to exceed whatever had been promis'd in his diſcourſe of it. [b] Tho' he has therein written, he doubts not after the firſt or ſecond year that the ſame ſhould be coloniz'd, but to ſee in London a contractation-houſe of more receipt for Guiana, than that in Seville for the Weſt-Indies. And is poſitive, " That if there " was but a ſmall army a-foot in Guiana, marching towards Manoa, the chief city of Inga, he " would yield to her majeſty, by compoſition, ſo many hundred thouſand pounds yearly, as " ſhould both defend us from all enemies abroad, and defray all expences at home; and that " he would beſides pay a garriſon of three or four thouſand ſoldiers very royally to defend him " againſt other nations: for he cannot but know how his predeceſſors were beaten out by the " Spaniards, and that they have ever ſince, with the greateſt cruelties, ſought the entry of his " country, wherefore he would doubtleſs be brought to tribute; if not, having neither " ſhot nor iron weapon in his empire, he might eaſily be conquer'd." [c] And in another part of the ſaid diſcourſe, he has theſe words, " If it be my lot to proſecute the ſame, I will wil- " lingly ſpend my life therein; and if any elſe ſhall be enabled thereto, and conquer the ſame, I " aſſure him thus much, he ſhall perform more than ever was done in Mexico by Cortez; or in " Peru by Piçarro, whereof one conquer'd the empire of Mutezuma, the other of Guaſcar " and Alabalipa; [d] and whatſoever prince ſhall poſſeſs it, that prince ſhall be lord of more " gold and of more beautiful empire, and of more cities and people, than either the king of " Spain or the Great Turk."[a] Concluding his whole treatiſe of Guiana with " his truſt, in " him who is the King of kings and Lord of lords to put it into her heart who is the Lady " of ladies to poſſeſs it; if not, I will judge thoſe men worthy to be kings thereof, ſays he, " who by her grace and leave will undertake it of themſelves."

ALL this, and much more, would not do to raiſe the ſaternine, or rather malignant genius of the ſtate to purſue this action; and upon this occaſion we might obſerve, as Ralegh did afterwards upon another[b] from a poet of his own time,[c] That ſome great men cloathing their private envy in the fair colours of the publick good, curbed the moſt needful and noble undertakings with diſtruſt, through a ſpecious care for the ſervice of the ſtate. Among theſe ſage and ſceptical politicians, we may diſcern Sir Robert Cecyl to be one, who, in his conferences with ſome of the ſpeculative geographers of his time, would ſhew how careful he was not to be overtaken with any partial affection to the planting of Guiana, as we are told by one of them, whom he would conſult about the matter; and who, perhaps therefore, admires, in a dedication to him, as the manner is in this ſort of writing, with no ſmall joy, the exact knowledge he had acquir'd in matters of Indian navigation.[d] Nevertheleſs, Ralegh's advice was not wholly diſregarded. For that part of it before-mention'd, propoſing to drive the Spaniards to a defenſive war, but upon their own proper coaſts or harbours, was approv'd of; and Ralegh himſelf choſen, with other commanders, as we ſhall ſoon find, to put it in execution. In the mean time, however diſcourag'd in his new diſcovery, he would not relinquiſh it; but within ſix months after his return, that is, in the latter end of January following, he fitted out captain Keymis with a couple of ſhips, the Darling and Diſcoverer; but provided, rather to continue the correſpondence and peaceful traffic with the Indians, than to ſtrengthen them in a warlike manner with forces and accoutrements, which was what they moſt deſir'd and expected. When Keymis arriv'd at Guiana, he found his friends much diſperſed, but yet enquiring what was become of Sir Walter Ralegh, whom they had been prepar'd ſome months to join? were mighty joyful to hear he was not ſlain at Cumana, as the Spaniards, now much increas'd among them, had atteſted; but ſadly diſappointed that he had not ſent a larger fleet to expel them, and conquer their neighbouring enemies up to the imperial city. Keymis further learnt, that Berreo, being left at Cumana, and lodged in the houſe of one Faſhardo; the governors of the Caraccas and Margarita, conſpiring together, had ſent into Spain to inform king Philip, that Berreo, being retired to ſpend the remainder of his declining days in privacy and eaſe, was utterly unable to purſue the enterprize; yet of what importance his majeſty's regard thereto was, ſince ſo eminent an Engliſh cavalier, as Sir Walter Ralegh, had, by a vigorous progreſs and moſt artful addreſs, made ſuch conqueſts and diſcoveries in ſome parts, and render'd himſelf ſo extenſively engaging in all where-ever he came, that unleſs they had power given them to undertake the charge, all their paſt endeavours and future hopes in thoſe parts would come to nothing.[e] But Berreo's camp-maſter having been long before ſent into Spain, with gold enough gotten out of Guiana, to levy and furniſh five hundred men, ſo effectually ſollicited Berreo's cauſe, that preſent order was given for the victualling and manning of ten ſhips to be ſent him; ſo well worth his care did the king of Spain think this undertaking. And further, this gold bore ſuch weight, that the king commanded eighteen ſhips more to ſtop at Trinidad, and not follow their other directions, before they ſaw that place ſecur'd from enemies. But Berreo himſelf ſuſpecting that ſpeedy diſpatch, return'd to Carapana's port with fifteen men, the ſcatter'd remnant that Ralegh had left him. Thoſe governors follow'd him, and anticipating the authority they promis'd themſelves from Spain, enter'd Guiana with their men, and deter-

[e] How much alarmed Spain was at this attempt of Ralegh's, Count Gondomar is introduced thus confeſſing to his ghoſt, in a pamphlet, writ not long after his death. " The tottering ground whereon my king's title to the " Indies ſtood, that it was nothing but violence and force, " tyranny and Uſurpation; and that if a ſtranger or more " gentle army ſhould enter, how eaſy it was to ſet us be- " ſides the cuſhion: this I know thou kneweſt, and what " not beſides which belongeth to ſo great an attempt and " Triumph." And a little further, " I dare not (for the " honour of my nation) unfold the woeful perplexity in " which Spain ſtood during this tedious voyage; how ſhe " quaked to think of the general view which thou hadſt " taken, without impeachment of all the Weſt-Indies; " but moſt of all, when ſhe was advertis'd of thy long " and laborous paſſage upon the river Orenoque, the diſtinguiſhments which thou haſt made betwixt it and the " river of Amazons, and the intelligences which thou hadſt " gotten for thy aſcent to the great city of Manoa and " kingdom of Guiana: Deſigns, which if they had been " purſued, according to thy willingneſs and knowledge, we " had not at this day acknowledged one foot of earth for ours " in all the Weſt-Indies." min'd to murder Berreo, who fled towards Caroli, expecting his ſon Antonio de Ximenes with ſuccours from the new kingdom of Granada. And now Topiowary, who had fled to the mountains, being dead, where the Engliſh boy, Ralegh left, was devour'd by a tyger, Sanjago, a Spaniard, in the faction of the governors aforeſaid, took Francis Sparrow priſoner, who was alſo left by Ralegh, as has been related; but having gather'd great plenty of gold, he ranſom'd his life therewith, yet was kept in captivity by the Spaniards ſome years, as we may hereafter learn. After this, the faction return'd to Trinidad, and begun to rebuild their town, where, unhappily to theſe new lawleſs rulers, the twenty-eight ſail of ſhips arriv'd from Spain in February following, and took Sanjago, one of the buſieſt among them, priſoner, whom Keymis found in chains, expecting to be put to death. The other actors in this interlude vaniſhing in canoes, recover'd Margarita, and Cumana again. When eighteen of thoſe ſhips had left all things in good order, they departed according to their inſtructions, leaving the other ten to fortify at Conquerabia, for the reception of Sir Walter Ralegh's fleet. Nor was it above four months after the arrival of thoſe ſhips from Spain, that the king had prepared ſeveral others, it being in June 1596, to tranſport a new ſupply of whole families, to the number of ſix hundred perſons, for Guiana; ſo little did this prince miſtruſt that the planting thereof would not turn to account. But theſe ſhips not ſailing before Ralegh himſelf viſited the coaſt where they lay; what work he made among them, and the reſt of the Spaniſh navy, will now in a little ſpace demand our attention.

His account of the gold mines in Guiana confirmed.

When Keymis was advanced to Topiowary's port, he found the Spaniards under Berreo had planted a village there, and that a rocky iſland againſt the mouth of Caroli was their fort or refuge; but now leaving both town and iſland, they gather'd at the mouth of that river, and had ſent for cannon to defend the paſſage to "thoſe mines, ſays Keymis to Ralegh, from whence "your ore and white ſtones were taken the laſt year:" adding, "we all, not without grief, "to ſee our ſelves thus defeated, and our hungry hopes made void, were witneſſes of this their "remove." Then Keymis reſolved to ſeek out Putiima, who, with ſome friends, was retir'd to the high lands, not far from the mountain Aio; intending, if the Indians ſhould think themſelves too weak with his help to diſplant the Spaniards, to ſet ſome of them to work, for hatchets and knives, to return him grains of gold and white ſtones from ſuch places as they ſhould be directed to. But when he came to the place of their abode, they were fled, apprehending him and his company perhaps to have been a party of Spaniards. "Here, as Key-"mis goes on, Gilbert my pilot offer'd to bring us either to the mine of white ſtones near "Winicapora, or elſe to a gold mine which Putiima had ſhewed him, being but one day's jour-"ney over-land from the place where we now ſtaid at anchor. I ſaw far off the mountains adjoin-"ing to this gold mine; and, having meaſured their paths near the ſame place this laſt year, could "not judge it to be fifteen miles from us. I do well remember, how coming that way with "Putiima the year before, he pointed to this ſame mountain, making ſigns to have me go with "him thither. I underſtood his ſigns, and marked the place, but miſtook his meaning; ima-"gining that he would have ſhew'd me the over-fall of the river Curwari from the mountains. "My Indian ſhewed me in what ſort, without digging, they gather the gold in the ſand of "a ſmall river named Macawini, which ſprings and falls from the rocks where this mine is. "And further told me, that he was with Putiima when Morequito was to be executed by the "Spaniards, and that then the chief of Morequito's friends were in conſultation to ſhew this "mine unto them, if it might redeem their captain's life; but upon better advice, ſuppoſing "them in this caſe to be implacable, and that this might prove a means to loſe not only their "king, but their country, they have to this day conceal'd it from them, being of all others "the richeſt and moſt plentiful." And a little further, among the reaſons he gives for his not bringing proofs away from this mountain of his having known the contents of it, this is one, "Forethinking withal that there being no means but our ſelves to make known our diſ-"covery, if we return'd not; in our misfortune, the hope of following this voyage would be "buried." And further ſtill, he ſays, "I could promiſe hope of gold mines, and certain "aſſurances of pieces of made gold; of ſpleen-ſtones, kidney-ſtones, and others of better "eſtimate: but becauſe our belief ſeems to be mated in theſe greater matters, and a certainty "of ſmaller profits is the readieſt inducement to quicken our weak hopes, I go not ſo far, "ſays he, as my own eyes might warrant me." Theſe teſtimonies, and others which may be produced,[a] will both ſhew, that Ralegh was not more ſanguine in his golden hopes and promiſes miſes, than the experience of other men, as well as his own, would juſtify; and withal, from the authority of theſe profeſſions, that his choice was rationally grounded in making Keymis his agent for the further diſcovery of theſe mines many years afterwards; when, becauſe he was not ſo ſucceſsful as a prejudic'd and greedy government expected, the whole undertaking was, with the moſt flagrant ingratitude, branded as a fictitious project to impoſe upon his country, ſince indeed there was no impoſition, unleſs where it is moſt unlikely there ſhould be any, none being ſo great a ſufferer thereby as Ralegh himſelf. But more of this in its due place.

[a] Francis Sparrow, above-mention'd in the body of the work, confirms this account of the mines in theſe words: "Within ſix weeks after I departed out of the river "Orenoque, I came to the rich country of Curaa in "Guiana, where are the mines of white ſtone, in which "is much natural and fine gold, which the Indians call Callicurii.

When Keymis was arriv'd at the port of Carapana, this caſique ſent ſome of his people in canoes to aſſure him he would come down next day and have a conference with him; but not coming in five or ſix days, he at laſt ſent one of his aged attendants to excuſe the fatigue of ſuch a journey, ſo unfavourable were the ways, and himſelf ſo diſabled with years and infirmities. This old envoy then enlarged upon the inconveniences they felt in uſing the Spaniards aſſiſtance againſt their enemies, eſpecially when he compared their conduct with that of the queen of England's ſubjects under her great commander: "For, ſaid he, the laſt year, "we doubted not but that he, being able, would have perſecuted us as the ſupporters of "your adverſaries; would have taken our towns, and have made us ranſom our wives and "children: but we found it far otherwiſe; and that none of your well-govern'd company "durſt offer us any wrong; no, not when undiſcover'd they might have done it. We then "believed to be true, what your grand captain reported of his princeſs; took this for a good "proof of her royal authority and wiſdom, that had framed her ſubjects to ſuch obedience; "and of your happineſs, who enjoy'd the benefit thereof: wherefore Carapana, weighing the "friendly courſe of theſe proceedings, doth humbly crave of her majeſty, for himſelf and his "people, that with the reſt of the Indians, who wholly depend on her princely regard, he "alſo may enjoy her favourable protection; not as a man forſaken by the Spaniards, but one "that, knowing their injuſtice, hates their cruelties, and takes it for the beſt courſe utterly to "diſclaim their friendſhip." Here Keymis breaks off, to conſider it as a matter worthy of obſervation, how this precedent of Ralegh's moderation and good order, which, among them, his countrymen, who knew him, was but his cuſtomary comportment, or ordinary practice, therefore of ſmall regard with them, had yet both alienated the Indians hearts altogether from the Spaniard, and ſtirred up in them true love and admiration thereof. After this, he diſcloſes his further knowledge of the Indian wealth aforeſaid in theſe words: "This old man ſhewed "whence moſt of their gold cometh which is formed in ſo many faſhions; whence their "ſpleen-ſtones, and others of all ſorts, are to be had in plenty; where gold is to be gather'd "in the ſands of their rivers; from what part the Spaniards, both by trade and otherwiſe, have "returned much gold;" and doubts not but all this was divulged with the conſent of Carapana, as an invitation to the further aid and protection he expected from the Engliſh.

Accordingly Keymis, finding it was in vain to hope for a conference with that well-wiſhing, but wary caſique, and, having ſent him a preſent of iron, gave aſſurance to all the Indians who repaired to him of his ſpeedy return with ſuccours; promiſing to make them all rich in hatchets, knives,[a] and beads, if they would only reſerve good ſtore of their caſſavi (which they

"Callicurii. The gold in this place runs between the "ſtones like veins, of which gold I had ſome ſtore; but "now the Spaniard is the better for it. In Curaa is "alſo gold in ſmall grains, which lie in the ſands in the "little rivers or brooks: I always took thoſe grains for "the fineſt gold. In theſe rivers where gold lieth are "many Aligartos or Crocodiles." See the deſcription of the iſle of Trinidad, the rich country of Guiana, and the mighty river of Orenoque, written by Francis Sparrey (as my author writes him) left there by Sir W. Ralegh 1595, but taken by the Spaniards, and ſent priſoner to Spain, who, after long captivity, got into England by great ſuit 1602. In Purchas's Pilgr. vol. 4. fol. 1249.

Captain Harcourt alſo gives this evidence to the ſame purpoſe; "As I daily convers'd among the Indians, it "chanced that one of them preſented me with a half "moon of metal which held ſomewhat more than a third "part gold, the reſt copper. Another alſo gave me a "little image of the ſame metal; and of another, I "bought a plate of the ſame, which he call'd a ſpread "eagle for an axe. All which things they aſſur'd me "were made in the high country of Guiana, which they "ſaid did abound with images of gold, by them called "carrecoory. Theſe things I ſhewed to my company, to "ſettle their troubled minds, which gave much content-"ment to the greater part of them, and ſatisfied us all "that there was gold in Guiana. Shortly after that, my "Indian, Anthony Canabre, brought me a piece of a rock "of white ſpar, whereof the high country is full; and if "the white ſpars of this kind, which are the pureſt white "of all others (for every ſort of mine hath a ſpar, and "for the moſt part white) be in a main rock, they are "certainly mines of gold or ſilver, or of both. I made "trial of a piece of ſpar which the ſame Indian diſcover'd "to me, and I found that it held both gold and ſilver; "which, altho' it was in ſmall quantity, gave me ſatisfac-"tion that there be richer mines in the country to be found; "but the beſt lie deeper in the earth, and we had not "time nor power to make ſearch for them." See the ſaid captain Harcourt's voyage to Guiana, Anno 1608, dedicated to prince Charles, in Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1277.

[a] Theſe inſtruments were ſuch preferable commodities among ſome of thoſe Indians, that Francis Sparrow, in his deſcription of Guiana before-mention'd, tells us he bought at Camalaha, to the ſouth of the Orenoque, eight young women, the eldeſt whereof was not eighteen years of age, for one red-halfted knife, which in England coſt him one halfpenny.

uſed for bread) and ſome plates of gold, for exchange. And having further ſpent ſome time in the diſcovery of above fifty ſeveral rivers, tribes or nations of people, towns and caſiques in this voyage, of all which he has given us a very accurate table, he directed his courſe homewards, and arrived at Portland in the latter end of June aforeſaid; having ſpent five months in going, ſtaying, and returning. As ſoon as he got home, he found Ralegh had been gone upon a grand expedition out of the nation near a month. Therefore he had time to draw up his account of this voyage (whence the paſſages which more immediately relate to our ſubject are extracted) ready to preſent him with at his return into England; which he did, and dedicated it To the approv'd, right valorous, and worthy knight Sir Walter Ralegh, lord warden, &c. In this dedication, he expreſſes himſelf in a moſt reſpectful manner, and highly to Sir Walter's honour for the great coſt and travel which he had beſtowed upon this diſcovery; telling him "the fervent zeal and loyalty of your mind, in labour with this birth of ſo ho-"nourable expectation, as it hath deſerved a recompence far different (from what he had been "deſcribing) ſo needeth it not my poor ſuffrage to endear the toil, care and danger you have "willingly undergone for the good and advancement of our weal publick: the praiſe-wor-"thineſs thereof doth approve itſelf; and is better read in your living doings, than in my "dead unregarded papers," &c. Subſcribing himſelf, Your lordſhip's to be commanded in all ſervice. And in his preface To the favourers of the voyage for Guiana, among the ſenſible motives he uſes to remove all fig-leaves from our unbelief, and the examples he urges to exprobrate our remiſneſs, one (which Ralegh had before touch'd upon with that modeſty wherewith he always alludes to himſelf) is given by our author Keymis in theſe words: "If we "ſhould ſuppoſe our ſelves now to live in the days of king Henry VII, of famous memory, "and the ſtrange report of a Weſt-Indies, or new world, abounding with great treaſure, ſhould "entice us to believe it; perhaps it might be imputed for ſome blame to the gravity of wiſe "men, lightly to be carried with the perſuaſion and hope of a new-found Utopia by ſuch a "one as Columbus was, being an alien, and many ways ſubject to ſuſpicion: but ſince the "penance of that incredulity lies even now heavy on our ſhoulders; the example ſore-threat-"ning I know not what repentance: and that we have the perſonal trial of ſo honourable and "ſufficient a reporter, our own countryman; let it be far from us to condemn our ſelves in that, "which ſo worthily we reprove in our predeceſſors,[a] and to let our idle knowledge content it "ſelf with naked contemplation, like a barren womb in a monaſtery." But in his relation of the voyage itſelf, which he concludes with many cogent and ſtrenuous arguments, drawn from the juſtice, profit and neceſſity of proſecuting it, he introduces that concluſion with a paragraph which ſets Ralegh forth ſo ſtrongly, in his principal point of light; having perſiſted more inflexibly, through greater diſcouragements, in more exalted purſuits than any other of his contemporaries, by ſeeking, not a private, ſo much as a national benefit; not a tranſient, but perpetual aggrandiſement of his country, that this author's grateful acknowledgment thereof demands an undeniable admiſſion; which therefore take as follows.

"Thus have I emptied your purſe, ſpending my time and travel in following your lord-"ſhip's directions for the full diſcovery of this coaſt and the rivers thereof. Concerning the

[a] Yet has our nation been reproached for our many neglects of this kind even to this day: a modern author obſerves, "That none of all our late bubble-projectors ſo "much as ever propos'd one ſubſcription for making any "diſcoveries like Sir Walter Ralegh's in Virginia and Guia-"na. Where, ſays he, was the ſet of men who offer'd "to ſubſcribe to a fund for ſearching out the north-weſt "paſſages to navigate to the pole, and ſolve the difficulty "which all the proficients in geography ſpeak of only by "conjecture, viz. whether Europe and America join, or "the Tartarian ocean is to be travers'd or no? Have any "men yet ſubſcrib'd to a company for diſcovering the con-"tinents or iſlands of the ſeas, more truly call'd the South-"Seas, I mean due ſouth of the cape de Bona Speranza, "or due ſouth of the Terra del Fuogo? Do we think there "are any lands worth poſſeſſing in all the vaſt ſouthern "tracts from forty or fifty degrees ſouth to the other pole "of the world? Why are not theſe parts as well worth "ſearching as the bottoms and deeps of Hudſon's and "Davis's Straights, or the icy mountains of the Waggats "and Nova Zembla? The ſhort is, our projects are all "bubbles, and calculated for Exchange-Alley diſcoveries, "not for enlarging our commerce, ſettling colonies, and "ſpreading the dominions of our ſoveraign from pole to "pole. Why has no bold adventurer followed the glo-"rious Sir Walter Ralegh upon the river of Amazon, the "Rio Parano, and the Great Orenoque? where thouſands "of nations remain undiſcover'd; and where the wealth, "the fruitfulneſs of the ſoil, the goodneſs of the climate, "and the infinite numbers of the people, exceed all that "has ever been conquer'd or diſcover'd in the American "world: but all is owing to the mercenary low humour "of the times we live in, who, groveling in the baſer "methods of getting money by fraud and bite, by de-"ceiving and over-reaching one another, ſcorn the glo-"rious ways by which our anceſtors grew rich, when they "purſued, together with their private advantages, the ho-"nour and intereſt of their native country and of their "poſterity. If our ſubſcriptions had been for ſuch things "as theſe, and the management had appear'd to be as "fair, as the deſign was honourable, we had never had "an act of parliament to ſuppreſs them as public nuſances "and a ſcandal to a Chriſtian government; but the Bri-"tiſh nation would have been encourag'd to exert itſelf to "the utmoſt in them: whereas now we are all degene-"rated into bubble and bite, and the Exchange as well as "Exchange-Alley is become a mere gaming-ſtage, where, "inſtead of merchants carrying on uſeful commerce, we "ſee throngs of ſetters and cullies ſharping and cheating "one another." " not making of a voyage for your private profit, I pretend nothing. Sorry I am, that where " I ſought no excuſe, by the Spaniard's being there, I found my defect remedileſs. And for my " own part, I do proteſt, that if the conſideration of the public good which may enſue, had " not over-pois'd all other hopes and deſires, I would rather have adventur'd by ſuch ſmall " and weak means as I had, to do well with danger, than to return only with ſafety. His perſeverance applauded.

WHEN Keymis return'd into England, Ralegh, as we obſerv'd, was abroad, being ſent upon that enterprize which proved the moſt victorious and renowned of any the Engliſh undertook in thoſe days againſt the Spaniards. For the queen having heard they had received encouragement from Tir-Oen, the Iriſh rebel, to threaten her with a new invaſion; that becauſe ſhe had ſtrengthned their enemies, they would take the ſhorteſt courſe, and begin with England. [b] Therefore had made great naval preparations, to which they might not be a little embolden'd both by the death of her two brave old commanders, Drake and Hawkins; and again by their late ſucceſs, no further from her own coaſts than Calais; which taking by ſtorm, under cardinal Albert, archduke of Auſtria and governor of the Netherlands, the thunder of the Spaniſh artillery alarmed her majeſty's ears in her palace at Greenwich. This poſture of affairs made the queen determine, with the advice of her council, to uſe the moſt effectual means for preventing the miſchiefs of an aſſault, by taking the ſtart of them, and ſending a force ſufficient to deſtroy the Spaniſh ſhipping in their own harbours. [c] Accordingly, a powerful fleet was fitted out to the number of a hundred and fifty ſail, according to Camden from Stow, and Speed from both. But in the old manuſcript liſt of this fleet, which Camden followed as to the number of men, it appears there were no more than ninety-ſix ſhips of the Engliſh navy, [d] which were afterwards join'd by twenty-four ſail of Hollanders, as I gather out of Grotius and their other hiſtorians. As to the number of men; the general calculation at the end of that liſt aforeſaid, was taken upon truſt by Gamden, or he would not have given it us without doubt; for it neither does agree with the erroneous ſums under the particular heads of ſhips, mariners, captains, and ſoldiers, nor with the true ones which have ſince it was printed, been ſubjoin'd; and if it did, it would not give ſatisfaction; the liſt it ſelf being manifeſtly defective in omitting the land-companies which went over in the capital ſhips: ſo that not to be too ſcrutinous, the account which will beſt correſpond with all variations is, that this Engliſh fleet contain'd about fourteen thouſand men, whereof one thouſand were voluntiers. For as yet the Engliſh nobles and gentry had not learnt to live lazily and looſely at home, while their countrymen were fighting abroad for the ſafety and glory of the nation.[a] Now if to this number of men, we add alſo that in the Dutch ſhips, which according to their own computation was near twenty-ſix hundred men, there might be enough to leave the whole fleet furniſh'd with ſufficient hands to guard and work it, and allow of ten thouſand three hundred and ſixty men to land upon the Spaniſh coaſt, as it is propos'd in the concluſion of the liſt before-mention'd.

The lord-admiral Howard and the earl of Eſſex were joined in commiſſion generals of this enterprize; but the queen conſidering what there might be wanting to keep an old head and a young one, a cool and a warm one in due temper and harmony, allotted them a council of war in theſe words. "For the better and more orderly execution of this your commiſſion, "and of thoſe former articles compriſed in theſe our inſtructions, we do ordain, that there "ſhall be two perſons ſerving for the ſeas, and two that are appointed to ſerve with the forces Choſen of the council of war, "for land-ſervice, to be as counſellors to you in our name, that is, the Lord Thomas Howard, "and Sir Walter Ralegh; Sir Francis Vere and Sir Coniers Clifford; and to theſe four, we "do add Sir George Carew, lieutenant of our ordnance, to make the number of five; whom "alſo we charge by theſe preſents, that they will, as they will anſwer before God, give their "counſels to you both, without any private reſpect to either of you, for love or fear, in all "actions to be put in queſtion or taken in hand; and the ſame deliberately to debate, as the "weight of the matter ſhall require, before any reſolution be made, and before the putting "of the matter in action."[b] There is further to be underſtood by thoſe two perſons ſerving for
And admiral. the ſeas, that the Lord Thomas Howard and Sir Walter Ralegh were alſo conſtituted admirals in this expedition. Hence was the whole Engliſh fleet divided into four ſquadrons, and ſo it appears in the liſt aforeſaid, wherein we find that which was commanded by Ralegh conſiſted of twenty-two ſhips, thirteen hundred fifty-two mariners, and eighteen hundred ſeventy-five ſoldiers. The Dutch ſqundron was commanded by the admiral of Holland, named John Duvenvord, Lord of Warmondt. How Eſſex reliſh'd the diviſion of authority, may be ſomewhat gueſs'd at by the queen's anſwer to one of his letters it ſeems, which ſhe thought very ſtrange. "You mention, ſays ſhe, firſt a danger to commit authority to any other, becauſe "you are referr'd to your commiſſion and inſtructions formerly ſent you, which hath no power "of deputation; as who ſhould ſay, that if you did follow the directions of our hand, our "great ſeal in this matter ſhould be brought to diſpute the validity of your warrant." A little further it appears, that he had been impatient to be gone for fear he ſhould be detain'd, for the queen had perſuaded him to ſtay behind; but not prevailing, ſhe now gave him liberty to depart, and told him, "Tho' we meant to drive it to the laſt conſiderations and utmoſt debates "as much as could be, yet we compared times ſo ſufficiently, as a prince who knows what "belongs to ſuch a matter, that nothing ſhould be done to retard you (being ready) one hour: "for as we know Ralegh not to be arriv'd, ſo we know after it, ſome time to embark ſuch an "army muſt be required."[c] But Ralegh joined the fleet, and the whole army was embark'd within ten days after the writing of this letter, for on the firſt of June before-mention'd the fleet ſet ſail from Plymouth.[d] When they came to the north cape of Spain, they called a ſelect council, by hanging out the flag of arms; and then had the maſter and captain of every ſhip his ſealed inſtructions given him, or letters of rendezvous, which were not to be open'd till they were paſt Cape St. Vincent, unleſs ſeparated by bad weather; but to be thrown overboard

[d] Sir Francis Vere, who was now marſhal of the land-forces, and who would incline us to think nobody's ſervices even at ſea in this expedition, were ſo conſiderable as his own, tho' "he was not allotted to any ſignal ſervice, ha-"ving (as he owns) till now been a ſtranger to actions at "ſea, ſays further, "During this ſtay of the army about "Plymouth (which, by reaſon of the contrariety of winds, "was near a month) it pleaſed my lord of Eſſex to give me "much countenance, and to have me always near him, which drew upon me no ſmall envy; inſomuch as ſome open "jars fell out between Sir Walter Ralegh, then rear-admiral "of the navy, Sir Coniers Clifford, ſergeant-major-general "of the army, and my ſelf; which the general qualified for "the time, and ordered, that in all meetings at land, I ſhould "have the precedence of Sir Walter Ralegh, and he of me "at ſea." Vere's commentaries, fol. Cambridge, 1657. p. 30, and 26. could give the enemy intelligence of their approach. On the twentieth of June the fleet came to anchor in the bay of St. Sebaſtians, ſhort of Cadiz half a league. The lord-admiral, being careful of her majeſty's ſhips, had reſolved, with the earl of Eſſex, that the town ſhould be firſt attempted, to the end that both the Spaniſh galleons and galleys, together with the forts of Cadiz, might not all at once beat upon the Engliſh navy. Ralegh was not preſent at this reſolution, as himſelf has declar'd in that account of this action, which he diſpatched ſoon after it was over to a miniſter of ſtate in England;[a] which being the cleareſt I have met with, and eaſieſt to be confirmed, not only by the more indifferent pens of foreigners, but the moſt partial ones of our own country, thoſe of his competitors themſelves for honour in this engagement, will here be our beſt guide. Hence therefore we learn the reaſon of Ralegh's abſence at that reſolution of firſt landing the army to have been, becauſe he was engaged the day before outward on the ſeas in ſtopping ſuch Spaniſh ſhips as might paſs out from St. Lucar or Cadiz along the coaſt.[b] When he return'd, two hours after the reſt, he found the earl of Eſſex diſembarking his ſoldiers, having put many companies into boats, with intention to make his deſcent on the weſt ſide of Cadiz; but the billows were ſo raging, that the boats were ready to ſink at the ſtern of the earl, and divers were loſt with ſome armed ſoldiers in them;[c] but becauſe this courſe had been reſolved on, and that doubting, now in the danger, might look like dreading of it, the earl continued his purpoſe of landing; when Ralegh came aboard his ſhip, and, in the preſence of all the colonels, proteſted againſt the reſolution; giving him many reaſons and apparent demonſtrations, that, to the utter overthrow of their armies, themſelves, and her majeſty's future ſafety, he was running the way of a general ruin. The earl excuſed himſelf, and laid it upon the lord-admiral, who would not conſent (he ſaid) to enter with the fleet till the town was firſt poſſeſſed. All the commanders and gentlemen preſent beſought Ralegh to diſſuade the attempt,[d] for they all perceived the danger, and were convinced that the greateſt part muſt periſh ere they could ſet foot on ground; and if any reached the ſhore, yet would they ſurely have their boats caſt on their heads; and twenty men, in ſuch a deſperate deſcent, might defeat them all. The earl hereupon prayed Ralegh to go and perſuade the lord admiral, who being alſo by him made ſenſible, that certain deſtruction would be the conſequence of purſuing the former reſolution, conſented to enter the port. When Ralegh brought Eſſex the news of this agreement,[e] and call'd out of his boat entramos, entramos, as he return'd towards him, the earl threw his hat into the ſea for joy, and prepared to weigh anchor. The day was now far ſpent, and it required much time to return the boats of ſoldiers to their own ſhips. So as that night they could not attempt the fleet, "Altho' many, ſeeming deſperately "valiant, thought it a fault of mine, ſays Ralegh, to delay it till morning,[f] tho' we had nei-"ther agreed in what manner to fight, nor appointed who ſhould lead, and who ſecond; "whether by boarding or otherwiſe; neither could our fleet poſſibly recover all their men in "before ſun-ſet. But both the generals being pleaſed to hear me, and many times to be ad-"viſed by ſo mean an underſtanding, came again to anchor, and in the very mouth of the Diſſuades the generals from their raſh courſe.

[b] In a foreign hiſtory we have this circumſtance thus further confirm'd and enlarg'd. "Ralegh was diſpatch-"ed before with certain ſhips to ſet upon ſome great "veſſels, which, as they heard, were ready to ſail out of "St. Lucar's bay; but they lay ſo near the ſhore, that "he could not approach them, and was further hinder'd "by a miſt in which they eſcap'd; but they were by Ra-"legh ſo nearly chaſed to the land, that his own ſhips "were in danger to have run on ground." See The Triumphs of Naſſau, fol. 1613. p. 187. tranſlated by W. Shute, gent. from the French book call'd, Les Lauriers de Naſſau: ou deſcription & repreſentation (en taille douce) de toutes les victoires gagnées par les eſtats ſouz la conduite & gouvernement du prince Maurice de Naſſau, fol. a Leyden; par Jean Jeantzoon Orlers, & Henry de Haeſtens, 1612.

[c] An author who was in the engagement, obſerves, that in this haſty attempt of the earl's, a barge was ſunk, having fourſcore ſoldiers in her, and that eight of them were drowned. See the Cadiz voyage in Hakluyt, and the abridgment in Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1929.

[d] Sir W. Monſon, who was captain in the earl's ſhip, ſays, he alſo diſſuaded him from landing. See his Naval Tracts in Churchil's collection of voyages.

[e] Sir Francis Vere, who was a commander of the land-forces, was one of them who was for landing with the earl at the Caletta, as plainly appears from his own words; and having no command in the fleet, it is no leſs viſible he envied thoſe who had, the honour of a naval victory. For how maliciouſly has he diſguis'd and diſparag'd this ſignal ſervice of Ralegh's! where he ſays, "This day the "generals met not together, but the lord-admiral had "moſt of the ſea-officers aboard with him, and the lord "of Eſſex had thoſe for land-ſervice, and Sir Walter Ra-"legh was ſent to and fro betwixt them with meſſages; ſo "that in the end, it was reſolved and agreed upon to put "the next tide into the bay." See Vere's commentaries, fol. 27, 28; but not one word, who it was that diſſuaded them from their firſt raſh attempt; and who brought them to this agreement; when even foreigners have given us more of the arguments wherewith the earl was perſuaded by Ralegh alone, than Ralegh himſelf has done. See the Triumphs of Naſſau, fol. 187.

[f] Ralegh himſelf was the firſt who complain'd of delay, by that indiſcreet attempt of landing, both againſt the ſtorm and the enemies ſhips, between them and the ſhore; but now the delay was neceſſitated, not only by the diſtance of the Spaniſh fleet up the bay, but the danger of being benighted, and then fighting in a ſtreight and among the rocks. See the Triumphs of Naſſau, as before; but Ralegh himſelf has given the beſt reaſon for their delay this night, which is, their having as yet agreed on no ſcheme or method of engagement; which muſt have brought all to confuſion.

Lays down the order of fight.

" harbour. So that night, about ten a-clock, I wrote a letter to the lord-admiral, declaring " therein my opinion, how the fight ſhould be order'd; perſuading him to appoint to each of " the great galleons of Spain, two great fly-boats to board them, after the queen's ſhips had " batter'd them; for I knew that both St. Philip and the reſt would burn, and not yield; and " then to loſe ſo many of the queen's ſhips for company, I thought too dear a purchaſe, and " what would be term'd but a lamentable victory." This method being agreed on, and both the generals perſuaded to lead the body of the fleet, the charge of the van, for putting it in execution, was, upon Ralegh's requeſt, granted and aſſigned to him. The ſhip himſelf was in, called the Warſpite, was one of the queen's, and carried about two hundred and ninety mariners. The reſt, appointed out of her navy to ſecond him, were, the Mary-Roſe, commanded by Sir George Carew, the Lion by Sir Robert Southwell, the Rainbow by Sir Francis Vere, the Swiftſure by captain Croſs, the Dreadnought by Sir Coniers and Alex. Clifford, the Nonpareil by Mr. Robert Dudley; beſides twelve Londoners and certain fly-boats.[a] Thus the lord Thomas Howard, becauſe the Mer Honeur, which he commanded, was one of the greateſt ſhips, was alſo left behind with the generals; but being impatient thereof, he preſſed them to have the ſervice committed to him, and to that end exchang'd his ſhip with Mr. Dudley. Hereupon Ralegh obſerves, " For my own part, as I was willing to give honour to my lord Thomas, having both " precedency in the army, and being a nobleman whom I much honour'd; ſo I was yet reſolved " to give, and not to take example for this ſervice, holding my own reputation deareſt." Therefore with the firſt peep of day he weigh'd anchor, taking the ſtart of all others a good diſtance,[b] and bear with the enemy, who was in the following diſpoſition to receive him.

UNDER the walls of Cadiz were ranged ſeventeen galleys, which lay with their prows to flank his entrance. There was alſo a fort call'd Philip, which beat into and commanded the harbour, beſides the ordnance, which lay all along the curtain upon the wall towards the ſea, and divers other pieces of culverin which ſcour'd the channel. Notwithſtanding, as ſoon as the enemy perceived an Engliſh admiral under ſail approaching, ſeveral of their galleons and other ſhips of war, with forty great veſſels beſides bound for Mexico and other parts, alſo ſet ſail. Of all which, the St. Philip, Matthew, Andrew and Thomas, being four of the capital galleons of Spain, came again to anchor under the fort of Puntal, in a ſtreight of the harbour which leads over to Puerto Real. On the ſtarboard ſide of them, they placed three frigats of war; at their back, two great galleons of Lisbon, beſides two well furniſh'd argoſies; and the ſeventeen gallies by three and three, were to interlace them as occaſion ſhould be offer'd. The admiral, vice admiral, and rear admiral of New Spain, with the body of the fleet,[c] were ranged behind them towards Puerto Real, hoping with this great ſtrength to defend the entrance, the place being no broader from point to point, than that their line did in effect ſtretch over the ſtreight as a bridge, and had beſides the fort of Puntal for their guard.

Leads the van.

RALEGH, as aforeſaid, advancing in the van, was firſt ſaluted by fort Philip,[d] next by the cannon on the curtain, and laſtly in good order by the ſeventeen galleys which lay near the town with all their prows bent againſt him as he enter'd. Ralegh anſwer'd the firing of their

[a] The Triumphs of Naſſau having told us, that every commander ſtrived to have the vanguard, further add, " The " council, reſolving not to hazard the queen's great ſhips " but upon urgent neceſſity, thought fit that Sir Walter " Ralegh, with eight of the queen's leſſer ſhips (inſtead " of ſeven) ſix Hollanders, and twelve Engliſh merchant-men " ſhould have the vanguard." fol. 187. The reaſon why Ralegh mention'd not the Hollanders, and the Engliſh merchants but ſlightly, is, becauſe they were made little uſe of.

[b] The Triumphs of Naſſau obſerve, " the reſolution of " giving Ralegh the van being oppugned by the lord Thomas " Howard, who ſaid that honour belong'd to him (as vice-" admiral) it was concluded that both of them ſhould go " together; but Ralegh, as ſoon as it was day, to loſe no " time in weighing anchor, let ſlip, and thereby had the " advantage of ſailing firſt." fol. 188.

[c] The number of ſhips in the bay of Cadiz is not ſo exactly agreed upon as their ſituation, by thoſe who ſaw them, which Ralegh has deſcrib'd the beſt of any, becauſe ſome take more notice, ſome leſs, of the Spaniſh merchant-men. Sir Francis Vere only ſays, " In the " mouth of the bay, thwart the rocks called Los Puercos, " there lay to our judgment forty or fifty tall ſhips, where-" of were four of the king's greateſt and warlikeſt gal-" leons, eighteen merchant-ſhips of the Weſt-Indian fleet " outward-bound and richly laden, the reſt private mer-" chants." Comment. fol. 27. So that he ſaw but four men of war. Another who was there, ſays, " Between five " and ſix a clock in the morning our ſhips, with all ſpeed, " courage and alacrity, ſet upon the Spaniſh ſhips then " under ſail, and making up the bay of Cadiz towards " Puente de Suazo, being in number fifty-nine tall ſhips, " with nineteen or twenty galleys attending on them, " ſorted in ſuch good order and reaſonable diſtance, as " might ſtill annoy us, and relieve themſelves inter-" changeably." Vid. the Cadiz voyage in Hakluyt, and the Abridgment in Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1929: ſo he mentions no merchant-men. But another having mention'd fifty-ſeven great ſhips, beſides twenty galleys and a few other veſſels of war, diſtinguiſhes alſo a fleet of thirty-five ſail richly laden for the Weſt-Indies, with as much wine, oil, lace, cloth of gold, and other precious merchandize, as was worth eleven or twelve millions of ducats. Triumphs of Naſſau, fol. 186. This was the fleet abovemention'd in Ralegh's account, and near the number, bound for Mexico.

[d] Sir Walter Ralegh afterwards, exemplifying how little a reſolute and experienc'd man of war will fear to paſs by the beſt appointed fort of Europe, with the help of a good tide and a leading gale of wind; and how hard a matter it is to ſtop a good ſhip without another as good to encounter it, ſays, " The fort St. Philip terrify'd not us in " the year 1596, when we enter'd the port of Cadiz; " neither did the fort at Puntal, when we were enter'd, " beat us from our anchoring by it; tho' it play'd upon " us with four demi-cannons within point-blank from ſix " in the morning till twelve at noon. Hiſt. of the World, lib. 5. cap. 1. ſect. 10.

ordnance with a flouriſh of his trumpets, and ſtill kept driving forwards, that he might draw up a ſufficiency of the Engliſh fleet into play, and to engage thoſe he paſſed by, while he was in action upon the body of the enemy.[a] Accordingly the ſhips that followed beat upon the galleys ſo thick, that they ſoon betook them to their oars, and got up to join with the galleons in the ſtreight, as aforeſaid;[b] then as they were driven to paſs near him, he beſtow'd his benediction from ſeveral broadſides among them; but ply'd St. Philip, the great and famous admiral of Spain, moſt conſtantly, as being moſt worthy of his fire, accounting the galleys but as waſps in regard of that ſea-monſter; and being now reſolved to repay the enemy's former treatment of the Revenge, or to ſecond her loſs with his own life, he came to anchor by the great galleons, whereof the Philip and the Andrew were the two which boarded that brave Engliſh ſhip. Here he fell to battering of them very briskly, expecting, after a while the flyboats to come up, that he might board and take them. And now began the engagement to be very deſperate. The lord Thomas came to anchor on one ſide of him, tho' pretty much behind,[c] with Sir Robert Southwell; Sir George Carew and the Cliffords on the other, and Sir Francis Vere was towards the ſide of Puntal. At laſt the thunder of the ordnance grew ſo great about ten a-clock in the morning, that Eſſex, impatient to abide far off, thruſt up through the fleet, heading all thoſe on the left hand, and on that ſide, anchor'd next to Ralegh; aftewards came in captain Croſs as near as he could; but Ralegh, to his great honour, held always ſingle in the head of all.[d] Now after they had beat, as at two buts, one upon another almoſt three hours; ſo that the volleys of cannon and culverin came as thick as if it had been a ſkirmiſh of muſketeers, till Ralegh's ſhip was in danger of ſinking in the place, he made away to Eſſex in his ſkiff, to deſire that he would inforce the promiſed flyboats to come up, that he might board; for, as he rid, he could not long endure ſo great a battery. Eſſex was then coming up himſelf; to whom Ralegh declared, That if the flyboats came not, he would board in the queen's ſhip; for it was the ſame loſs to burn or ſink, and one he muſt endure. Then the earl promis'd him, That whatever he attempted, he would ſecond him in perſon upon honour. In the mean while, the lord-admiral Howard, being alſo at firſt diſpoſed to advance, but the river was ſo choaked, that he could not paſs in the Ark, came with the lord Thomas in the Nonpareil; and while Ralegh was ſpeaking to Eſſex, "the marſhal (Vere) who thought it ſome "touch, ſays Ralegh, to his great eſteemed valour, to ride behind me ſo many hours, got up "a-head of my ſhip; which lord Thomas perceiving, headed him again, myſelf being but a quar-"ter of an hour abſent. At my return, finding my ſelf from being the firſt to be but the third, "I preſently let ſlip anchor, and thruſting in between the lord Thomas and the marſhal, went "further a-head than all of them before, and thruſt myſelf athwart the channel, ſo as I was "ſure none ſhould outſtart me again for that day." Eſſex thinking his ſhip ſtronger than

A ſharp engagement.

[a] The Triumphs of Naſſau ſays, "the Spaniſh gallies "diſcharged all their ordnance upon Ralegh; but he made "not one ſhot, leaving it to thoſe that follow'd him, and "ſo went directly towards the galleons which lay in the "deepeſt part of the river, and with two other very great "ſhips took up the whole breadth of it," fol. 188.

[b] Sir William Monſon, deſcribing the ſituation of the enemy, or manner of riding in their harbour at his firſt ſight of them, agrees very well with this part of Ralegh's account, where he ſays the four galleons ſingled themſelves from out of the fleet as guards of their merchants. The gallies were placed to flank us with their prows at our entry; but, when they ſaw our approach the next morning, the merchants run up the river, the men of war to Port-Royal, and brought themſelves into a good order of fight, mooring their ſhips a-head and ſtern to have their broadſides upon us. The gallies then betook themſelves to the guard of the town, which we put them from, before we attempted the ſhips. See his Naval Tracts. But Vere takes this ſervice entirely to himſelf in theſe words: "As the Spaniſh ſhips looſed from their anchors and made "from us, their gallies, ſeventeen in number, under the "favour of the town made towards us, ranged in good "order. My ſhip was floaty, and ſtored with good ord-"nance, which made me haſten towards them without "ſtaying for any company, &c. So as I entered fight "with them alone, and ſo galled them with my ordnance, "that they gave back, keeping ſtill in order and fight "with me, &c." At laſt, ſays he, "I put them from "under the town, and took certain ſhips which rode there "at anchor forſaken of her men, and followed continuing "in fight till they came under the fort of the Puntal, "where thwart the bottom of the bay lay their four great "ſhips with a diſtance betweem them; and, ſpreading the "breadth of the channel, were now in hot fight of ord-"nance with our fleet." Vere's Comment. fol. 30, 31.

[c] Tho' this paſſage of lord Thomas's being now far behind is not mention'd by Ralegh, in the letter he then wrote of the Cadiz action, which we here chiefly follow; yet I, have it from his own hand-writing, in the printed book called Les Lauriers de Naſſau, before-mention'd, a copy of which hiſtory falling into his hands ſoon after it was publiſh'd, Sir Walter Ralegh has, in the language it is writ in, made ſhort notes with a black-lead pencil throughout this whole action, where himſelf is mention'd, which are not only ſtill legible, but demonſtrable to be his own writing, both from the ſenſe and form of the characters. In the margin of this copy againſt the words that ſignify, "The lord Thomas to have come up "to Sir Walter Ralegh with ſix of the queen's ſhips as near "the galleons as poſſible, diſcharging all their ordnance; "and fighting from ſix a-clock in the morning till noon;" Ralegh has written with his pencil, Mais bien Arriere. This curioſity is in the poſſeſſion of Thomas Brian Eſq; of the Inner-Temple, who has favoured me with the uſe of thoſe notes; the better to illuſtrate this part of their author's ſtory.

[d] Hence might it be, that Ralegh's ſhip loſt moſt men, and yet very few, in compariſon of the length and heat of the engagement; and alſo might be one of thoſe which was ſhot through two and twenty times, ſince none ſeems to have been ſo much diſabled, as may appear a little further. Vide Abridgment of Hakluyt in Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1930.

the reſt, thruſt Clifford's aſide, and ſtill got next to Ralegh, on the left hand, a-head of all that rank, but lord Thomas; while Vere ſecretly faſtned a rope on Ralegh's ſhip-ſide towards him, and drew himſelf up equal with him; but ſome of his company advertiſing him thereof, he cauſed it to be cut aſunder, ſo Vere fell back into his place, whom Ralegh guarded all but his prow from the ſight of the enemy.[a]

But now Ralegh having no hopes of his flyboats, and Eſſex with the lord Thomas having promiſed to ſecond him,[b] he laid out a warp by the ſide of the Philip to cloſe, the wind hindering him otherwiſe to board her; and when the admiral thereof, with the commanders of the other three wooden apoſtles, found that Eſſex and the lord Thomas began to do the like, they all ſlip'd anchor, and ran aground; heaps of ſoldiers and mariners tumbling into the ſea like coals out of a ſack, ſays Ralegh, into many ports at once; ſome drowning, ſome ſticking in the mud. He alſo tells us, the Philip thereupon burnt herſelf; and another author more particularly in theſe words: "As Ralegh thought to have boarded the great galleon "St. Philip, a negro gave fire to the powder, and eſcaped by ſwimming; it gave ſo great a "crack, that the maſt was blown up into the air, as if it had been an arrow. A pinnace that "lay near it was burnt, but the men eſcaped in boats. The other galleon, called St. Thomas, "was likewiſe blown up, but did no harm to the Engliſh." He alſo mentions "two eaſter-"lings which ran aſhore, and were burnt; but, ſays he, the St. Matthew and St. Andrew, "of ten or twelve hundred ton apiece, were ſaved from running aground, and carried "away."[c] However, he does not inform us particularly by whom; and others ſeem to have done Ralegh more wrong, in nominating other perſons, and omitting him in the performance; ſince it appears under his own hand-writing, that he took them both himſelf."[d] And this agrees with the manner his letter of this action in print has expreſſed it, where he ſays, "thoſe galleons were recover'd with our boats ere they could get out to fire them." Here he obſerves upon the enemies running to the ſhores, and thus firing their ſhips, that the ſpectacle was very lamentable on their ſide; for many drowned themſelves; many half burnt, leaped into the water; very many, hanging at the ropes-ends by the ſhip's-ſide under the water, even to the lips; many ſwimming with grievous wounds, till ſtruck under water, and put out of their pain; and withal ſuch huge fires, and ſuch tearing of the ordnance, in the Great Philip and the reſt, when the flames came to them, that Ralegh thought there was here to be ſeen the moſt lively figure of hell it ſelf.

The Spaniſh galleons deſtroy'd.

And taken by him.

Thus the victory was obtained by ſea, and the bay reſign'd by two, ſome ſay, by four a-clock in the afternoon;[e] tho' no more of the Engliſh were conſtantly and cloſely engaged, than the ſhips and commanders before-mention'd, againſt the ſix great galleons, ſeventeen gallies, with the fleet of New Spain, argoſies, and frigats, to the number of fifty-five, or fifty-ſeven, as Ralegh himſelf reckons them, beſides the fort of Puntal playing upon them all the while. After the victory, "Ourſelves ſpared the lives of all, ſays Ralegh; but the Flemings, who did "little or nothing in the fight, uſed mercileſs ſlaughter; till they were by myſelf, and after-"wards by my lord-admiral, beaten off."[f]

Then did they haſten to land the army, and attempt the town[g]; in which there were of all ſorts about five thouſand foot, one hundred and fifty ſoldiers in pay, and about eight hundred

[a] This contention of Sir Francis Vere's for precedency again, he owns in theſe words: "Sir Walter Ralegh, very "little a-head of me, caſt his anchor, as did alſo the ge-"nerals, and as many of the fleet as the channel would "bear; ſo as the ſhooting of ordnance was great, and "they held us good talk, by reaſon their ſhips lay thwart "with their broadſides towards us, and moſt of us right "a-head, that we could uſe but our chaſing-pieces. I "ſent my boat aboard Sir Walter Ralegh to faſten an "hauſer to wind up my ſhip, which was looſed ſoon after "my boat was put off." Vere's Comment. fol. 32.

[b] The Triumphs of Naſſau ſeem to explain the reaſon of the flyboats not coming up, where we find thoſe of Lubeck and Dantzick fell into conteſt with the Engliſh ones about that ſervice. After which, the commanders being aboard the general, they reſolved to aſſail the galleons, commanding, ſays this hiſtory, the lord Howard and Sir Walter Ralegh to begin. See fol. 188. Againſt which laſt aſſertion Ralegh, in that which was his own French copy of this book, has written, A Moy ſeul; as much as to ſay, that deſperate charge was committed to him alone. Mr. Brian's copy of Les Lauriers de Naſſau, p. 138. And as much is implied above, in the text, from Ralegh's own epiſtolary account, which ſays, the lord Thomas promiſed to ſecond him.

[c] Triumphs of Naſſau, fol. 189.

[d] J'ay pris tous deux, are Ralegh's own words in the margin of his Lauriers de Naſſau, even with that period which expreſſes the taking of theſe two galleons, but not the perſon who took them.

[e] I meet with no author but Sir William Monſon, who prolongs the victory by ſea to four a-clock.

[f] An author, who was preſent at this victory, ſpeaking of the proclamation that was publiſhed by the generals and council, to prevent all further bloodſhed after the ſurrender by the Spaniards, ſays, this honourable and merciful edict was, I am ſure, ſtrictly and religiouſly obſerv'd by the Engliſh; but how well it was kept by the Dutch, I will neither affirm nor yet deny; for I perceive between them and the Spaniards there is an implacable heart-burning. And therefore, as ſoon as the Dutch ſquadron was eſpied in the fight, immediately both they of Seville, St. Lucar, and other places, did not only arreſt all ſuch Dutch ſhips as dealt with them friendly by the way of traffick and merchandize, and confiſcate their goods, but impriſon'd the merchants and owners of the ſame; and, by report, treated many of them with extream cruelty. Vide Hakluyt, and Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1931.

[g] Cadiz was a large and beautiful city, and being the chief ſee of the biſhop, had a good cathedral church, abbey, nunnery, hundred horſe[a] of the gentry and cavaliers of Xeres gather'd together upon the diſcovery of the Engliſh fleet two days before, as they lay becalm'd off Cape St. Mary. The horſemen ſallied but to reſiſt their landing, but were ſo vigorouſly aſſail'd and overpower'd by the Engliſh, that the greateſt part made away to the bridge which leads to the main, called Puente de Suaço; the reſt retreated to the town, and were ſo eagerly purſued, that they were driven to forſake their horſes at the gate, which the inhabitants durſt not open to admit them; ſo that they were forced to leap down an old wall into the ſuburbs, which the Engliſh vanguard, cloſe at their heels, perceiving, with Eſſex at their head, followed them; and ſo the town was carried with a ſudden fury,[b] in a ſhort ſpace of time,[c] and with very little loſs.[d] Ralegh, tho' he had received a grievous wound in his leg, being much torn and deformed with a ſplinter-ſhot in the fight; yet, willing to encourage the army with his preſence, and deſirous of ſeeing the actions and diſpoſitions of the enemy, he was carried aſhore on the ſhoulders of his men, where the lord-admiral, out of his care and regard, ſent him one of his horſes; but his own being recover'd in due time, was made ready for him. The torment he endur'd, and the fear he was continually in of being ſhoulder'd by the tumultuous ſoldiers, abandon'd to ſpoil and rapine, without any reſpect of perſons, made him unable to abide above an hour in the town.[e] The ſame night therefore he return'd, chiefly becauſe there was no admiral on board to order the fleet, or indeed few mariners left in the navy; all, to uſe his own words, running headlong to the ſack; and alſo becauſe he was fit for nothing but reſt and retirement at that time: otherwiſe he might, like the reſt of the commanders, have rewarded himſelf for his ſervices. But leaving them in ſafe poſſeſſion at his departure, they promiſed to preſerve for him his ſhare of the booty, and to give him a good quarter of the town; of which, as we have it under his own hand, they defrauded him.[f] He had deſired the conſent of the generals, that he might go and ſecure or deſtroy the Indian fleet, which was ſaid to be worth twelve millions, and lay in Puerto-Real road; but they deſired to conſider on it till next morning. At break of day, Ralegh ſent his brothers, Sir John Gilbert, and Sir Arthur Throgmorton, as alſo Sir Henry Leonard, to know their reſolution; but the generals ſent back to deſire he would come aſhore into the town.[g] Ralegh very favourably imputes theſe evaſions to the great confuſion, in which it was almoſt impoſſible for them to order many things at once. In the afternoon of the ſame day, the merchants of Cadiz and Seville offer'd the generals, by the Committee of the contractation-houſe, with the purveyor, corrigidor, and other officers, two millions of ducats to ſpare that nery, and fine college of Jeſuits; was ſtrongly ſituated both by nature and art; the buildings of hard ſtone, all flat-roof'd, after the Turkiſh manner; ſo that having lodged heaps of great ſtones on the tops of their houſes, every woman could endanger the paſſengers in the ſtreets, which were very narrow, perhaps to avoid the great heat. All the houſes had fair window-frames, and large folding ſhutters; but were barr'd with iron, and none glazed, except the churches. They had few chimneys, but in ſome lower out-rooms for neceſſary uſes; ſeeming to be more careful of keeping themſelves from roaſting, than to have much of any thing roaſted. Abridgment of the Cadiz voyage in Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1932.

[a] Purchas alſo adds, the town had above four thouſand fighting men, and ſix hundred horſe, well furniſh'd, no doubt, ſo many ſhips being always at hand, and ſo well ſtored with ammunition. Another author writes, the number of men and women might be eight or nine thouſand. Triumphs of Naſſau, fol. 192.

[b] Vere's Commentaries, fol. 39.

[c] Before eight a-clock that night, the Engliſh were maſters of the market-place, forts, town, and all but the caſtle, which held out till break of day.—Thus was this notable victory, as well by ſea as land both begun, and in effect perform'd within the compaſs of fourteen hours. Purchas, as before, fol. 1931, 1932.

[d] In all the terrible fight by ſea, not much above one hundred Engliſh men were ſlain and hurt; one pinnace of Sir R. Southwell's fired with the Philip aforeſaid, and one Flemiſh flyboat, with a hundred men, blown up by her own powder, as Purchas obſerves. By land, Sir Walter Ralegh mentions Sir John Wingfield, who was ſlain in the market-place, Sir Edward Wingfield, captain Bagnol, and captain Metherke, as the Dutch hiſtorians call him. Theſe two laſt were knighted with Sir Arthur Savage the 21ſt or 22d of June, by the earl of Eſſex, who the ſunday following very royally beſtow'd the like honour upon at leaſt threeſcore more, moſt of them his friends and followers, and many, mere creatures and flatterers. The earl thought he ſhould ſtrengthen his party and intereſt thereby, and has warmly juſtify'd himſelf in his apology for ſhewing them that diſtinction; but it weaken'd him in the queen's opinion to ſee him ape her prerogative, or play king Robert ſo extravagantly. And what may we think ſhe ſaid of this number? when for his having before made twenty-four knights at the ſuccour of Rhoan, none of whom were in meaner circumſtances than many of theſe, the queen ſaid, My lord might have done well to have built his almſhouſe before he made his knights. Lord Bacon's Apophthegmes, p. 17.

[e] Ralegh entered the town with the lord-admiral, lord Thomas Howard, Sir W. Paget, Sir Robert Southwell, Leviſon, Woodhouſe, Manſell, and the mariners; Sir Edward Hobby, carrying the colours before them, about the time of the great ſkirmiſh in the market-place, ſoon after which the Spaniards retir'd and capitulated; agreeing to pay five hundred and twenty according to Camden; or, according to Stow, ſix hundred and twenty thouſand duckets (which is five times more than foreign authors mention) for the ranſom of their lives, and to give forty hoſtages for the payment. After the ſurrender, order was given to tranſport the religious men and women, merchants wives, &c. to Port St. Mary, that no violence might be offer'd them. They had alſo liberty to take as many of their cloaths or goods as they could carry with them; which produced a remarkable example in a beautiful young Spaniſh lady, who, leaving all that was precious and valuable, bore away her old and decrepit huſband upon her back, whom before ſhe had hidden from the danger of the enemy; herein imitating the piety of the Bavarian women, after the conqueſt of their country by the emperor Conrade III. fleet; fleet; neither could this bring them to any reſolution, ſo that advantage was loſt.[a] Ralegh might poſſibly inſiſt upon a larger compoſition, by ſaying, They ought firſt to be maſters of the fleet, and ranſom it afterwards; for if they offer'd two millions already, they would give four when it was taken; becauſe he has not denied this ſpeech where he had read it aſcrib'd to him.[b] But it appears plain enough to me, from the ſame author, that Eſſex was not for having the fleet ſeiz'd upon, unleſs by Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Edward Conway, Sir Thomas Gerrard, and other land-officers, which Ralegh would not conſent to for the honour of the ſailors; as it does appear from Camden, that the lord-admiral would not conſent to any compoſition. For we came, ſaid he, to conſume them, and not compound with them. But they ſaved him the trouble; for the next morning, being the 23d of June, the duke of Medina cauſed all that fleet of merchant-men to be ſet on fire, becauſe he was convinced, from their being beſet ſo vigilantly by Ralegh, who had the charge of them, that they muſt needs fall into his hands. Thus both galleons, frigats, argoſies, with the fleet of Nueva Eſpana, and all except the gallies, which it ſeems eſcaped, were conſumed to aſhes. Good ſtore of the enemy's ordnance was recover'd out of their ſhips, and great quantities of merchandize, plate, jewels and money, out of the town: their whole loſs being computed at twenty millions of ducats.[c] Many rich priſoners were given to the land-commanders, "ſo as that ſort were very rich, ſays Ralegh; ſome "had for their priſoners ſixteen or twenty thouſand, ſome ten thouſand ducats,[d] beſides great "houſes of merchandize. What the generals have gotten I know leaſt (concludes he;) they "proteſt it is little: for my own part, I have gotten a lame leg, and a deformed; for the "reſt, either I ſpoke too late, or it was otherwiſe reſolved. I have not been wanting in "good words, or exceeding kind and regardful uſage; but have poſſeſſion of nought but "poverty and pain."

Forces the Spaniards to fire their Indian fleet.

THUS have we related this action chiefly from Ralegh's letter before-mention'd, the credit whereof is the leſs obnoxious to any doubt, in that it either here is, by our endeavours, or might be by thoſe of an able pen, ſufficiently corroborated out of other writers upon the ſame ſubject. But there is one letter more, written by another ocular witneſs of all his behaviour in this victory, at their leaving of Cadiz, early enough for the perfect memory thereof; to the lord Burghley, a man dangerous to deceive with miſrepreſentations; and further, written by an old land-commander, under the earl of Eſſex, who even never ſaw Sir Walter Ralegh before this voyage: therefore a teſtimony, that carries many marks of truth, and none of partiality in his favour. For which reaſon, and becauſe it has never yet ſeen the publick light, I ſhall here tranſcribe all that is ſaid, being conciſe, not only of one, but every commander mention'd therein, that my reader may, unbiaſs'd by me, diſtinguiſh what a principal ſhare of honour is paid to the merit of Sir Walter Ralegh's councils and courage throughout the whole engagement: but theſe are my author's words. "My lord, this I muſt ſay, that never prince of England hath "receiv'd more true glory and reputation than our ſoveraign in this, wherein theſe two nobles "have commanded with ſuch valour, love and good intelligence, as we, that have been under "them, received thereby ſingular comfort; and truly, my lord, they deſerve as much honour "as may be heap'd on them. We ſurpriz'd the enemy, whereby this mighty and rich Indian "fleet of forty-five ſail of good, and ſome of them mighty ſhips, have been conſumed to "aſhes; a ruin to this king, not to be recover'd in all his days; beſides the cutting off this "year's voyage, and conſequently the next. By this voyage, if no other gain, this only hath "much ſatisfied me, that I have thereby ſeen and known the men of worth of our nation. Of the "earl I will ſay nothing, but of the lord Thomas, the lord marſhal Vere, and Sir Walter Ralegh, "I muſt ſay, that in no bickering where I have been, I ever ſaw men more forward and valiant

[c] The earl of Eſſex, in a brief narrative of the advantages accruing to England, and loſſes to the Spaniard, by this expedition, ſays, "the Engliſh took two galleons, "routed fifteen galleys, with an unequal number of ſhips; "freed many of their countrymen condemn'd to the gal-"leys, and releas'd ſeveral Spaniards from impriſonment; "took the beſt fortify'd city in all Spain, and ſtayed thir-"teen days in their country; brought home, beſides the "galleons aforeſaid, a hundred braſs guns, with a rich "booty; and the ſailors, but eſpecially the ſoldiers, "great plunder; the enemy loſt thirteen of his moſt ſer-"viceable ſhips, forty Indian merchant-men, and four "others, beſides vaſt quantities of ammunition, provi-"ſions, &c. rendering it almoſt impoſſible he ſhould in "ſome time appear again at ſea in a formidable manner." Vide Camden, Anno 1596. Tho' ſuch was their loſs, and computed as above; yet the earl wrote a paper of objections hereafter-mention'd, againſt his colleagues, for not doing more.

The Triumphs of Naſſau ſums up the Spaniſh loſs thus: "Three and thirty great ſhips laden for the Indies were "burnt, beſides five ſhips which came from St. Lucar, "three of which ran aground. It was the greateſt and "wealthieſt fleet that ever went to the Indies." And a little further, "The wealthy town was wholly ſack'd, "and the booty great, which was carried to the ſhips. "'Twas thought the king loſt at the ſame time 5200 "pieces of ordnance, beſides armour ſufficient for five "or ſix hundred men, which was taken out of the arſe-"nal," fol. 191, 192.

[d] Sir Francis Vere ſays, "I got three priſoners worth "ten thouſand ducats; one of which was a church-man, "and preſident of the contractation-houſe of the Indies; "the other two were ancient knights," whom he names. Comment. fol. 42.

" in the matter of combat between our ſhips, and their ſhips and galleys, wherein ſtood all the " ſucceſs of the victory, which my lord of Eſſex did give beginning to by anchoring in the ene- " my's face, Sir Walter cloſe by his ſide; and ſo the reſt before-named; alſo the general of " the artillery (Sir George Carew) with his Mary-Roſe, a proper gentleman, full of good things, " and, above all, of diſcretion. When all theſe aforeſaid had placed themſelves, and the reſt, " as the channel would give us leave, the thunder of the artillery on both ſides began at ten in " the morning, and laſted till two and a half in the afternoon; at which time her majeſty's ſhips " made the enemy give ground, and the three great ſhips of war, the Philip, Matthew, and " Andrew, ran themſelves aſhore; and the Philip they fir'd, the other two we bring you " home. Sir Walter Ralegh did, in my judgment, no man better; and his artillery moſt effect: " I never knew the gentleman until this time, and I am ſorry for it, for there are in him excel- " lent things beſides his valour; and the obſervation he hath in this voyage uſed with my lord " of Eſſex, hath made me love him." A little further he ſays, " In the Due Repulſe (Eſſex's " ſhip) we loſt only ſeven men; in the Warſpite (which was Ralegh's) fourteen, and " Sir Walter cut in the leg with a ſplinter." [a] Laſtly, he mentions his true and faithful " friend, Sir John Wingfield, who loſt his life in the town-houſe, and thereby was rid of a " mighty miſcontent which all the way had much afflicted him," having one day told my au- thor, " that he had rather leave his life here, than carry it again into England." [b]

It was long diſputed, whether the town ſhould be held or no, ſays Sir Francis Vere; who adds, that my lord of Eſſex ſeemed to affect to remain there in perſon; as, we may add, Vere did too; becauſe, he ſays, he offer'd to defend it with four thouſand men, till her majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be known;" [c] when, in truth, the queen's pleaſure, in this particular, was known before they left England: for Eſſex himſelf informs us, he ſent letters from Plymouth (before they ſet ſail) by his ſecretary Edward Reignold, to the council at Greenwich; wherein he purpoſed " to dwell in a port of the enemy's, and to make a continual diverſion of the " wars;" but, ſays he, " My letters were neither anſwer'd, nor liked of." [d] And much leſs was the ſame propoſal now reliſh'd in Cadiz, when ſo many wanted to guard and ſecure the treaſures they had got; and it was computed, they would all ſoon grow in want of proviſions; nay, one of his own knights adviſ'd him to maſter and deſtroy ſhips rather than towns, as what would make the enemy more unable to moleſt them, and procure him wealth and ſolid honour, without riot and ruin of the innocent; beſides, the riches in ſhips could not be ſo eaſily conceal'd and convey'd away, as in towns; alſo they might be brought into England, and would be viſible monuments to his glory; but towns, tho' ſoon won, could not be long en- joy'd. [e] For theſe and other reaſons Eſſex was prevail'd upon, tho' with great reluctance, to leave Cadiz; but they firſt of all cauſed the city to be raz'd, and, with the caſtles and fortifica- tions, fired, all but the churches and religious houſes; together with all the naval tackle and proviſion they could meet with, which they either needed not, or could not conveniently carry away. Their courteſy however to the people, eſpecially of diſtinction, and all who had made no oppoſition, was ſuch, that, at their departure, the Spaniards did the Engliſh the juſtice to ſay, Tho' they were hereticks as to religion, yet as to the reſt, they had behaved themſelves with generous bravery.

The city and naval ſtores fired.

On the 5th of July the army embark'd; and in council, it was inſiſted on to lie out at ſea for intercepting the Weſt-Indian fleet; " but the ſcarceneſs of our victuals, ſays Vere, " overthrew that purpoſe." So reſolution was taken to make for England, and viſit the Spaniſh coaſts in the way, to deſtroy their ſhipping. The firſt place they made to was Faro, a good large populous town, but unfenc'd, and a biſhop's ſee of Portugal. Here the Engliſh

[a] Ralegh afterwards made a very good remark upon ſhip-building (which probably the memory of this ſmart might induce him to) in theſe words: " Men may not " expect the eaſe of many cabbins, and ſafety at once in " ſea-ſervice. Two decks and a half are ſufficient to " yield ſhelter and lodging for men and mariners, and " no more charging at all higher; but only one low cab- " bin for the maſter. But our mariners will ſay, that a " ſhip will bear more charging aloft for cabbins; and " that is true, if none but ordinary mariners were to " ſerve in them, who are able to endure, and are uſed to " the tumbling and rolling of ſhips from ſide to ſide, " when the ſea is never ſo little grown: but men of bet- " ter ſort would be glad to find more ſteadineſs and leſs " tottering cage-work. And altho' the mariners do covet " ſtore of cabbins, yet indeed they are but ſluttiſh dens, " that breed ſickneſs, or ſerve to cover ſtealths in peace, " and in fight are dangerous to tear men with their " ſplinters." landing, and marching up to the town, the inhabitants deſerted it, and left them in full poſſeſſion; who, after having reſted and refreſhed themſelves five or ſix days, brought good ſtore of proviſions to the ſhips; alſo ſome pieces of artillery, and the valuable library of the late famous biſhop Oſorius.[a] There is an author who mentions the taking of this town, and conſequently that library, among Ralegh's victories; deſcribing the buildings to have been left ſo demoliſh'd, as to yield no covering for their idols.[b] But ſince that library is obſerv'd by Camden to have been thought by right Eſſex's prize, as if this earl had ſomehow contended to engroſs it to himſelf; it may ſomewhat direct us, to whoſe greater value for the labours of the learned, and more publick ſpirit in this particular, 'tis owing, that it was more commendably beſtow'd; being brought into England, ſays Monſon, and made (it ſeems) an exemplary foundation of the publick library which was begun by Sir Thomas Bodley the enſuing year at Oxford. What ſhare Ralegh had in this diſpoſal, towards the ſaid renowned undertaking of that learned knight, his countryman and acquaintance, authorities are wanting, further than by ſurmiſe from theſe premiſes, to certify. But this we have expreſly enough tranſmitted to us of him by Bodley himſelf, even in the next reign, about nine years after this time, when Ralegh was under great misfortunes; and therefore, when an act of munificence muſt ſhine with the greateſt ſplendor, that he generouſly contributed towards the improvement of that library the ſum of fifty pounds; "for which, ſays Sir Thomas Bodley, I will intreat the vice-chancellor "to move the univerſity for their letters to him (and the other benefactors mention'd with "him) of publick thanks;"[c] which, doubtleſs, they gratefully paid: but to return.

When the forces were got again on board, they ſailed to the Groyne, and looked into the bay; but the wind being unfavourable, they thought it dangerous to enter; therefore, and becauſe their victuals daily grew more ſcarce, ſo that in ſome ſhips there was already extreme want, ſays Sir Francis Vere, it was reſolved to make homewards:[d] however, Sir William Monſon, in favour of Eſſex's impatience to go on upon freſh exploits, computes they had enough proviſion to ſupply them ſeven weeks. Monſon alſo imputes the general declenſion of the officers from any further invaſion of the Spaniards at this time, to the covetouſneſs of thoſe who wanted to ſecure the treaſures they had amaſſed.[e] And indeed Vere diſcovers not any concurrence now with Eſſex's new ſchemes of adventure, as might have been expected towards a patron who had ſhewn him ſo much favour and countenance; but viſibly haſtens home upon the complaint of ſcarcity aforeſaid. And yet that which might be thought Vere's true motive for returning, was never imputed to the lord-admiral nor Sir Walter Ralegh, tho', both by ſpeech and writing, they argued for it as much as any; for they had engroſs'd no booty that might be endanger'd by entering upon further engagements abroad. Yet had they other objections to theſe inconſiderate projects, than the want of victuals or ſickneſs of men; for after both theſe inconveniences in Ralegh's ſhip were propos'd to be redreſs'd by Eſſex, as Monſon tells us, Ralegh was as reſolute againſt hazarding the honour, as others the riches that was got at Cadiz; and in this entirely agreed with the lord-admiral, who perſuaded them to conſider how ſubject they might be to great loſſes in little enterprizes,[f] which would not add much to [f] One of the lord-admiral's objections to Eſſex's deſire of making a deſcent upon Lagos in Algarva, is given us by Sir William Monſon as aforeſaid; and part thereof, which is to this ſenſe, is in theſe words: "The winning of it, after "ſo eminent a place as Cadiz, could add no honour; and "if it ſhould be carried, yet it would be with the loſs of "his beſt troops and gentlemen; who would rather deſire "to die, than receive the indignity of a repulſe:" and the earl, tho' againſt his will, ſays that author, was forced to yield to theſe reaſons. Yet neither Eſſex, nor Vere, nor Monſon, have been ſo particular in Ralegh's reaſons; tho' under his hand he deliver'd them, as well as by word of mouth: but this omiſſion in them is not to be wonder'd at.

their praiſe if they ſucceeded; but ſurely would to their diſcredit if they fail'd. This being the ſenſe of the greater or the wiſer part, moſt of the fleet return'd with the lord-admiral to Plymouth on the eighth of Auguſt following; and the reſt, with the earl of Eſſex, two days after; who thence took his journey to court, as Ralegh probably did at the ſame time. On the thirteenth of the ſame month, we find by a letter from the council of ſtate to the lord-admiral,[a] then advanced with the fleet to the Downs, that Ralegh as well as Eſſex had been with them, and probably with the queen; from whom we hear of no objections made to Ralegh's conduct in the whole action: therefore probably he was among thoſe principal actors therein, whom ſhe diſtinguiſh'd with liberal praiſes and rewards. Yet that letter does diſcover her majeſty's diſſatisfaction towards the lord-admiral, that he did not lie in wait for the carracks or the Weſt-Indian fleet, as Eſſex had intreated him to do. And whereas Sir Francis Vere ſays, that when Eſſex landed in the weſt, and left orders with him for diſſolving not only the land-forces, but the ſhipping, there aroſe much ſtrife between the ſaid mariners and his Low-Country troops at their parting, the ſailors being determin'd to ſhare in the cheſts and packs wherewith the ſoldiers had moſt unproportionably enrich'd themſelves in the late ſpoil; at which Vere complain'd to the lord-admiral for redreſs, adding, that ſome other principal officers of the fleet took the ſailors part; and, as if they thought them unreaſonably dealt with, who had made way by the ſea-fight, for the ſoldiers to get thoſe riches by land, ask'd him, "whether the mari-"ners ſhould have nothing?" To which he anſwer'd, "their hopes in the Indian fleet "were more to be deſired than that traſh (as he calls it) which the land-men had got in the "town; ſo as they had none to blame but their officers, and their bad fortune:" which an-"ſwer, ſays he, was taken to heart, and is not forgotten to this hour, of which I feel the "ſmart:"[b] If Ralegh was one of thoſe principal officers here pointed at, who thus ſtood the ſailors advocate, as he might be, notwithſtanding his expeditious progreſs to court, the indifferent manner wherewith Vere has treated him is very accountable to me. But Vere has further betray'd his partiality, in not telling us the conſequence of his ſaid application to the lord-admiral, which appears in that letter and others, from the council aforeſaid, to have procur'd the diſpoſal of the Spaniſh plunder towards the payment of the Engliſh navy; and that Vere's Low-country regiments ſhould not return before they were ſearch'd both in ſhips and perſon. As for Eſſex, he wrote a Cenſure of the omiſſions in this voyage,[c] which he imputes to the diſſenſions of his council and colleague. Whence the common hiſtorians have been led indiſcriminately to arraign the ſetting forth ſuch expeditions under commanders of equal authority, and have ſo much neglected giving theſe their diſtinct commendations for what they did, as to cavil at them for what they left undone; while others more gratefully obſerve, That never was ſo much riches and renown acquir'd with the like naval ſucceſs; well juſtifying the honours which were paid to Sir Walter Ralegh both by the authors who dedicated books to him this year;[d] the painters

[c] An ancient and fair copy whereof I have ſeen in the Cottonian library, Julius F. VI. Tract. 103. printed in ſecretary Burchet's Naval Hiſtory, as I remember, and in Mr. Lediard's, fol. 337; being here about half a ſheet of paper; wherein the earl raiſes four objections to their conduct in this voyage: firſt, that they did not poſſeſs the Indian fleet: ſecondly, that they abandon'd Cadiz: thirdly, that they did not wait for the carracks and Indian ſhips: and laſtly, that they did not aſſail the enemy in their other ports. To all which omiſſions he makes anſwer, laying them to the charge of the other commanders; but names Sir Walter Ralegh only in the two laſt articles. Here we may obſerve, Sir H. Wotton did either himſelf miſtake the drift of this paper, or, having a courtly pen, would incline his readers to do ſo. For where he is giving a character of the earl's ſeveral employments, and has allowed this at Cadiz to have been the moſt fortunate, he is further for having it that in which the earl alſo ſhewed the greateſt modeſty; becauſe, ſays he, there he wrote with his own hand a cenſure of his omiſſions: whereas indeed 'tis a cenſure of his aſſociates, for what Eſſex imagin'd, how juſtly let others ſay, to have been their omiſſions. Which plainly reverſes one of the characters by which that author would diſtinguiſh the earl's ſhare in this expedition. See his Parallel of Robert earl of Eſſex with George duke of Buckingham.

[d] Beſides captain Keymis's voyage to Guiana before-mention'd, in which he has ſpoken, to Ralegh's honour, of the victory at Cadiz; there was another piece printed this year, which I find alſo dedicated to him; and at this time, before Ralegh was recover'd of the wound he had receiv'd there, with great propriety, in regard to the ſubject thereof: for it is entitled, A hundred and fourteen Experiments and Cures of the famous phyſician Phil. Aureol. Theophraſtus Paracelſus: To which are added, ſome profitable works, by B. G. a Portu Aquitano: alſo the ſecrets of Iſaac Hollandus; and the Spagiric Antidotary for Gunſhot, by Joſephus Quercetanus: Collected by John Heſter, printed 4to. 1596. This Heſter was the learned chymiſt of Paul's Wharf, whoſe preparations were famous in other countries as well as his own for many years, as I find in others of his works. But, as I obſerve in ſome of them, he is ſaid to have been dead two years before the printer's date of this which he dedicated to Ralegh; and as the title he herein uſes, is only To the worſhipful Walter Ralegh Eſq; I conclude the book was dedicated by Heſter to Ralegh before he was knighted, and now ſeaſonably republiſh'd with a new title-page, or firſt publiſh'd from Heſter's poſthumous Remains, without altering the author's title of his patron. However it is, Heſter, in his ingenious dedication upon the motives to the purſuit and improvement of ſcience, tells Ralegh, "Tho' divinity is bounded "with precepts in the old law, and promiſes in the goſpel, "ſo that obedience to one and faith in the other is fulfil-"ling of either; yet all other faculties tending to the "government or ornament of life do ſo carry a privilege "of more liberty in ſearch, and ſcope in practice, that "to reſt contented with the inventions of others, is as odious "to the learned, as it is for frank hearts to feed at other "mens trenchers; or fine wits to be ſet to tell the clock, "while groſſer heads are better employ'd: and not without painters and ſculptors, who have appropriated this ſea-fight to his portraits;[a] and thoſe other advancers of the like honorary arts, who, in their diſcourſes of medals and intaglias, have thought him worthy, for this, among his many other actions and excellencies, of that metallic commemoration, which is more uſually among us confined to princes and crowned heads.[b]

ABOUT two months after Raleigh's return from the conqueſt of Cadiz, we find him making a new attempt to continue the intereſt and correſpondence he had ſo hopefully begun in Guiana. To this end, he mann'd out and ſtor'd, with all proper conveniences and merchandize for trade and diſcovery in thoſe parts, a handſome pinnace which had been with him in the late engagement, called after his own name, the Watt. therefore probably one of his own ſhips. The command of her he committed to captain Leonard Berrie; but, through contrariety of winds, and other accidents, they made it the latter end of December following before they got out of Weymouth. In the beginning of March they diſcover'd the coaſt, and fell into the Wiapouco, a river almoſt in four degrees north of the line, and about ſixteen leagues in length; but not being able to find the head of its falls, nor meeting with any of the inhabitants to ſupply them with proviſions, they return'd, and made towards the great town called Aramatto, where they ſtored themſelves to their deſire. After this, ſeveral of thoſe natives came in canoes, and traded with the Engliſh in their ſhips. Then captain Berrie hired ſome of them, with a preſent of knives, to go back unto the river Cawo, and invite the ruler of that place, named Ritimo, on board, who accordingly came to them in the river Chiana, where he and his train were feaſted, and traffick'd with the Engliſh much to their ſatisfaction: and thither alſo flock'd, from their ſeveral towns, great numbers of a civiliz'd race of Carribes, who brought great plenty of victuals and tobacco, which they exchang'd for ſuch commodities as the Engliſh were well inſtructed to carry thither. After they had declar'd their unanimous deſire to have the Engliſh come and rout the Spaniards, take command of the Orenoque, and dwell in the bordering nations, they departed; and the Engliſh made away to the Careres, or triangular iſlands, and kept trading on with the people of the neighbouring towns, who familiarly reſorted to them. Then they paſſed along through the river Marawin, to Quiparia and Macirra, for about forty or fifty leagues upward to the falls of that river, and to the ſight of a rich country above, where the people were of an extraordinary ſtature, and carried bows halfted with gold; but were forced to return without compleating that diſcovery, for want of proviſion; tho' my author, one of the adventurers, thought the palmito's, and other trees in the woods, would have ſupported them till they could have rewarded themſelves with what "might have done us good, ſays he, as long as we had lived." On the 15th of April 1597, they returned from that river, and wander'd through ſeveral others; till, about four days after, they fell into the Coritine. In this river they met a bark, called the John of London, commanded by captain Leigh (the ſame, I ſuppoſe, who afterwards made other voyages to Guiana; and took further poſſeſſion of the country, not by force, the Spaniards title, but conſent of the people; tho' for a prince indeed, who deſerved no right there which he had not the ſpirit to maintain.) And falling down ſome five leagues from the mouth thereof, upon in-

"To avoid this inconvenience, examples of antiquity

"want of variety." Then he ſays, out of theſe writers, he has choſen ſome, for their merits held in their own country, very dear, to tranſlate for the benefit of his countrymen: and as heretofore he had ſought the authority of other patrons; ſo now he preſumes, under the comfortable ſhield of Raleigh's favour, to ſhadow this work; beſeeching him, out of that bountiful courteſy for which he is ſo generally commended, to pardon his preſumption, and accept of his performance.

[a] Of the pictures and prints which have been drawn of Sir Walter Raleigh, more will be ſpoken a few leaves following.

[b] Mr. Evelyn, in his book of Medals, gives us the ſculpture of a large one that was ſtruck this year, having the arms of England, France, and Holland, in a three-fold knot on one ſide, repreſenting a triple league againſt Spain with this inſcription, Rumpitur haud facile; and on the reverſe a navy of great ſhips at ſea, under the name of Jehovah, with this Epigraph, Quid me perſequeris, 1596. Hence thought by ſome to have been in memory of the victory at Cadiz; but, as he tells us, it was ſtruck upon the alarm menacing thoſe three nations on the ſurprize of Calais this year. Therefore where he is ſpeaking of thoſe adventurous Argonauts in theſe times who deſerved the honour of Medals for their exploits at ſea, among whom, he reckons chiefly thoſe who found out new worlds, planted colonies, and enlarged the Britiſh empire: he adds, I know not whether there was any medals of the earl of Eſſex's expedition to Cadiz, and of the heroes who accompanied him. So recommends Sir W. Raleigh to that diſtinction, as being "a perſon of extraordinary merit for "his learning and experience: and who is he, continues "my author, that deplores not his being ſo unhappily "cut off (and our ſince want of ſuch as Raleigh was) to "gratify the crafty and malicious?" Further, where he is ſubſiding from arms to arts, he mentions Raleigh again among the foremoſt of thoſe illuſtrious perſons, of whom he ſays, "How ſhould one rejoice to find in more laſting "matter than painted cloth, the true effigies of ſuch as "were famous for both." Numiſmata, fol. 1697. p. 99, 160, 161.

telligence that the Deſſekebe, with which that river meets, would lead them within a day's journey of the lake Perima, whereon Manoa was ſuppoſed to ſtand, they meant to diſcover a paſſage to this rich city. But, having rowed in their boats about fifty leagues from the mouth of the Coritine to the falls of the ſaid river, where, having been credibly inform'd that five days journey further there was a fall impaſſable; and, finding withal ſome of the towns bordering thereon ſo importunate to engage them in wars againſt their enemies the Waccawaes, which would turn greatly to the diſadvantage of the Engliſh, when Sir Walter Ralegh ſhould again return thither, becauſe he would have occaſion to paſs that river, which was reported to have gold in it; they therefore were conſtrained to return. So, clearing themſelves of this coaſt, they took their courſe to the iſlands of the Weſt-Indies. Here my author, who was a gentleman of the company, after having ſpoke in praiſe of the climate, how temperate and wholſome it is, tho' within the Tropic, and ſo near the Equinoctial; as alſo how docible the natives, and humane (eſpecially to Engliſhmen) tho' a ſavage and uncultivated people; he proceeds to ſpeak of their riches in theſe words. "In the upper countries they go apparel'd, being, as it ſeems, of a "more civil diſpoſition; having great ſtore of gold, as we are certainly inform'd by the lower In-"dians, of whom we had ſome gold, which they brought and bought in the high country of Wiana; "being able to buy no more, becauſe they wanted the things which now we have left among "them."[a] Then, having taken a little further notice of their manners, with the plenty and variety of their proviſions, he ſhews what courſe his company took homewards, and how they arriv'd ſafe at Plymouth on the 28th of June following.[b]

THUS have we abſtracted, after ſuch manner as in this place may be moſt pertinent to our purpoſe, all the voyages Sir Walter Ralegh ſet forth for diſcoveries, as well as the warlike expeditions in which he was engag'd, as far as they have been preſerv'd in Hakluyt's collections. Nor was it without juſt reaſon, that his ſaid naval enterprizes were thus carefully gather'd therein; ſince Ralegh's encouragement was ſuch, of this extraordinary undertaking, to raiſe a grove of laurels, in a manner out of the ſeas, that ſhould overſpread the iſland with glory, and might be ſtill made to ſhoot more ſpaciouſly afreſh, were the author and his work reviv'd in a manner ſuitable to their deſerts,[c] that when even the firſt edition of theſe Engliſh voyages was publiſhed,

[a] That there are many rich mines and minerals in Guiana, as well as mountains and rivers impregnate with gold, is not only thus conſtantly intimated by the Engliſh travellers thither of theſe times, but atteſted by the Spaniards themſelves, in their further diſcoveries many years after; as may be ſeen in father D'Acuna's relation of the river of Amazons, and other Spaniſh authors. But as for the rich city of Manoa, juſt before ſpoken of, which they had called El Dorado, it ſeems now to have been invented by theſe Indians, as a gilded bait to draw the Spaniards into league with them againſt their enemies; and propagated by the Spaniards themſelves, to inhance the merit of their travels, and ſharpen the appetite of their ſucceſſors to purſue the enterprize; for no ſuch city having been found, it has been reputed a kind of Philoſopher's Stone in Coſmography: yet, like that in Chymiſtry, tho' undiſcover'd it ſelf, it was, and may further be the means of many profitable diſcoveries. If ſuch a metropolis had been diſtinctly aſcertain'd by Antonio de Herera, and in John de Laet's excellent accounts and maps of theſe parts, and had not appear'd doubtful even to father D'Acuna himſelf; I ſee not how Monſieur Sanſon, who, in 1680, graved a little map to explain the French tranſlation of the ſaid Jeſuit's diſcourſe, could have omitted it; and for the new edition, publiſhed in 1715, another map was graved by Mr. De Liſle; which, tho' more copious and compleat, is not, as I can hear, more particular in this reſpect.

[b] Mr. Thomas Maſham's relation of the third voyage, ſet forth by Sir Walter Ralegh, to Guiana, in Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 692.

[c] For the conſiderable intelligence we have receiv'd from this Collection of Voyages, it may not be improper here, at parting with, to ſhew our gratitude towards the laborious author, in a ſhort obſervation or two, which may ſomewhat amend what has been ſaid by others of him, and recommend his moſt laudable work, long ſince out of print, to a new impreſſion. And, firſt: This Richard Hakluyt might be of a Herefordſhire family; but whether born there, too doubtful for Fuller to ſettle him a native of that county. He was ſent young to Weſtminſter-ſchool, and became one of the queen's ſcholars; when viſiting his couſin Richard Hakluyt of Eiton, in the ſaid county, at his chambers in the Middle Temple (but never ſtudying the municipal law there, as A. Wood miſtakes of him, inſtead of his ſaid couſin) this relation, a great proficient in coſmography, and promoter of navigation, communicating and explaining certain books and maps to him, wrought ſuch impreſſions in young Hakluyt, that he reſolved, if ever he ſhould go to the Univerſity, to proſecute theſe ſtudies. Accordingly, being removed to Chriſt-Church in Oxford about 1570 (ſays Wood) he fell to ſearching after, and reading over, in any of ſeven languages, all the voyages and diſcoveries in print or MS. that he could meet with; and became ſo eminent for theſe ſtudies, that he was choſen to read publick lectures of navigation in the ſchools, wherein he was the firſt that ſhew'd the imperfections of the old, and improvements of the new maps, globes, and other inſtruments in this branch of ſcience, to the great ſatisfaction of his auditory. By his further enquiries of this nature, he alſo became acquainted with the chief ſea-officers, merchants and mariners of the nation. At length he travelled to France with Sir Edward Stafford, her majeſty's legier ambaſſador, and reſided there five years; during which time, he heard other nations miraculouſly extoll'd for their diſcoveries and notable enterprizes at ſea; but the Engliſh, for their ſluggiſh ſecurity and neglect of ſuch attempts, through their long peace, much condemn'd; and not only in common diſcourſe, but read them alſo more durably branded in the writings of their authors; particularly in La Poplinere's book, called L'Admiral de France; all which animated Hakluyt, at his return into England with the lady Sheffield about the year 1588 (after having publiſhed P. Martyr, tranſlated the French diſcovery of Florida, and before them, duly celebrated Sir W. Ralegh) to ſtop the mouths of theſe ſlanderers, by collecting together the naval atchievements of his countrymen; which he perform'd ſo expeditiouſly, that by the latter end of 1589, he publiſh'd a fair volume in Folio of the Engliſh navigations, which he dedicated to that great encourager of them, Sir F. Walſingham. The work was ſo univerſally approved, that the author was prevail'd on to enlarge and reprint it, which he afterwards did in three volumes; the firſt two commonly bound together in one book, fol. 1599, and the laſt fol. 1600. "A work of great honour to England, "as Fuller juſtly obſerves, it being poſſible that many "ports and iſlands in America, which are now baſe and "barren, and known only by a bare name at preſent, "may prove rich places hereafter: and then theſe voyages "will be produc'd, and pleaded as good evidence of their "belonging to England, as firſt diſcover'd and denomi-"nated by Engliſhmen." The author was made a prebendary of Weſtminſter about the year 1605, and rector of Wetheringſet in Suffolk, as Wood tells us; who alſo mentions his other writings, as his edition of Peter Martyr's publiſhed, and before they could receive any luſtre from the Guianian diſcoveries, the ſaid author, in his preface, acknowledges Sir Walter Ralegh to have been one of thoſe benefactors, from whom he had received his chief light into the weſtern navigations. Nor did he only oblige Hakluyt with communicating divers maritime adventures in which he himſelf and countrymen were concern'd; but procured for him, at no ſmall expence, ſome very ſcarce voyages and diſcoveries of foreigners which were unprinted; and was moreover at the charge of rewarding ſome perſons of learning and leiſure to tranſlate them into Engliſh, for the further enrichment of the ſaid collections. One inſtance of this kind he ſlightly mentions himſelf. For in his learned enquiries into the name of the Red ſea, he ſpeaks of a voyage made thither by the Portugal viceroy of the Eaſt-Indies, named Stephen Gama, the narrative whereof was written by Caſtro, one of his principal commanders; which diſcourſe, ſays he, I gave Mr. Richard Hakluyt to publiſh.[a] Now, tho' I remember not to have met with this diſcourſe in Hakluyt; yet the author, who, after his death, recover'd ſome of his papers, and continued his undertaking, has given us an abridgment of it, and inform'd us, that the original manuſcript had coſt Sir Walter Ralegh threeſcore pounds, who alſo cauſed it to be tranſlated out of the Portugueſe tongue; and was at the pains of making ſeveral corrections of the phraſe, and marginal notes upon it, with his own hand.[b] Further, we might expatiate upon this care he had for the preſervation of other mens fame; but here a gallant exploit ſollicits our regard, by which he much increaſed his own.

For the earl of Eſſex, grown diſcontented to ſee his party of ſuch little power at court, and the Cecilians carry all before them; that he could not advance ſeveral of his friends and followers to certain poſts in the army, nor even Sir Thomas Bodley to the office of ſecretary, whom he had perhaps prejudic'd with his prodigal praiſes to the queen, ſhe having prefer'd Sir Robert Cecyl to that place, in his abſence at Cadiz, whom he had as intemperately traduc'd,[c] reſolved to ſeek, by further ſervices abroad, to ſtrengthen that intereſt at home which he now found ſo weak and unſerviceable; in which, if his experience and diſcretion had been anſwerable to the activity and bravery of his ſpirit, he might not have been diſappointed, nor outſhin'd in martial expeditions, as he was outwitted in court-intrigues. But he had now a fair opportunity to purſue this ſcheme. For the king of Spain, enrag'd at the late overthrow and deſtruction of Cadiz, had immediately thereupon muſter'd up the naval powers from all his ports, at Liſbon, for a new expedition upon England and Ireland; but his old enemies the winds and the waves ſo ſpeedily diſabled and diſperſed them, that the queen heard of their fate before ſhe had book de Novo Orbe, with notes. Wherein, as we have before obſerved, Hakluyt has ſo highly applauded Sir Walter Ralegh for his advancements of navigation: beſides ſome other things which are chiefly verſions from the Portugueſe. But the notes of certain commodities in requeſt in the Eaſt-Indies, &c. by R. Hakluyt, among Mr. Selden's MSS. at Oxford, I take to be written by the Templar, who has other ſuch diſcourſes, and, I think, this in his kinſman's collections. And whereas the French diſſertation on the river of Amazons, prefix'd to M. de Gomberville's tranſlation of father D'Aacuna's relation above-mention'd, has, among other errors relating to Sir Walter Ralegh, ſaid, That the hiſtory of the ſecond voyage he made in perſon to Guiana, was written and given us by this celebrated compiler Mr. Hakluyt, in his ſaid collections; out of which hiſtory the French author pretends to quote ſome particulars: We muſt here obſerve, this aſſertion of Hakluyt's writing ſuch a hiſtory, is notoriouſly falſe; for he died in 1616, which was before Sir Walter Ralegh went his ſaid laſt voyage to that part of America. All we ſhall mention more in this place of him is, Firſt, the wiſhes, that ſome other ſuch able pen would continue his collections; which may be read in Robert Aſhley's dedication to Sir Maurice Abbot, of his Cochin-China; a ſcarce tract, printed above a hundred years ſince, and which I have ſeen in a volume of ſuch other choice pieces among the curious collections of the right honourable the lord Coleraine. Secondly, ſince to the continuation of ſuch collections, a like ſeries of ſuch brave adventures as are the ſubject of them, would be requir'd, which may not, in any proportion, be readily produced, that other wiſh, which may be gather'd from Mr. Bohun's complaint above forty years ago, in his character of queen Elizabeth, of the ſcarcity of this collection, that it may, after ſo long a neglect, be prefer'd to a ſecond impreſſion; in juſtice to the author, in honour of the heroic examples it commemorates, and for the profit of ſuch imitation as it may inſpire.

[c] Sir Thomas Bodley informs us, that before he return'd from the united provinces in 1597, and after, the earl of Eſſex uſed him ſo kindly, that tho' he meant to ſettle his dependance only on the lord Burghley, as beſt able, and moſt willing to work his advancement with the queen; yet the earl, who ſought, by all devices, to divert her liking both from the father and the ſon eſpecially; did often, to withdraw his affection alſo from both, entertain the queen with prodigal ſpeeches of his ſufficiency for a ſecretary; which were accompanied with ſuch words of diſgrace againſt the latter, "That neither ſhe her ſelf took "any great pleaſure to prefer me the ſooner, ſays Bodley; "for ſhe hated his ambition, and would give little counte- "nance to any of his followers; and both the lord Burgh- "ley and his ſon waxed jealous of my courſes." And a little further, "when I had throughly bethought me, firſt "in the earl; of the ſlender hold-faſt he had in the queen; "of an endleſs oppoſition of the chiefeſt of our ſtateſmen, "likely ſtill to wait upon him; of his perillous, feeble, "and uncertain advice, as well in his own, as in all the "cauſes of his friends; and when I had fully conſider'd "how untowardly theſe two counſellors were affected to "me; how ill it became my natural diſpoſition to be- "come a ſtickler in publick faction; and how well I was "able to live of my ſelf, &c. I was reſolved to take "my farewell of ſtate employments, and ſo retire from "court." any any advertiſement of their deſign: and as ſhe then took care to fortify ſuch caſtles as lay moſt obvious to any ſuch invaſion; ſo now that ſhe heard the ſtorm was gathering again, by the repair of the ſaid ſhatter'd fleet, and recruits added to it, threatning a new deſcent upon Ireland, ſhe reſolved alſo to recollect her forces by ſea. At firſt indeed, before ſhe was well inform'd of the enemy's ſtrength, ſhe had only arm'd and victuall'd ten of her beſt ſhips, and cauſed the Low-Countries to provide the like number under admiral Duvenvord. But when the lord Thomas Howard and Sir Walter Ralegh, who were pitch'd upon for the command of this fleet, declared their hopes of doing any great ſervice with it to be weak and uncertain, and the news of the Adelantado's ſtronger preparations at Feroll and the Groyne were daily confirm'd, a new council was call'd; in which it was reſolved, that this naval force, which the queen had appointed, was too great for a diſcovery, and too little for an attempt; as in the earl of Eſſex's apology is rightly obſerv'd.[a] Therefore, paſſing over the addition, ſo unaccountably deficient in the ſaid apology,[b] that I cannot think him the author both of one and the other, there were added to the firſt prepared fleet about ten ſhips more of the royal navy; which, with the other men of war, victuallers, tranſports, and many ſtout veſſels belonging to the nobles, knights, and gentlemen, who were adventurers in this voyage, amounted to about one hundred and twenty ſail, as we are informed by Sir Arthur Gorges, an officer in this enterprize, whoſe moſt excellent hiſtory thereof we ſhall here principally follow. Theſe ſhips then being all ſufficiently mann'd with ſailors, received an army alſo on board of five thouſand ſoldiers, with ten pieces of artillery for the field, and five hundred volunteers moſt gorgeouſly equipp'd. The proportion of victuals was for four months at large allowance, and double apparel both for the ſoldiers and mariners.[c] The lord-admiral Howard, being indiſpos'd, declin'd the command; which therefore was granted in chief to the earl of Eſſex; but the lord Thomas Howard was made vice-admiral, and Sir Walter Ralegh rear-admiral in the expedition; and theſe three, with four others, made up the council of war. Rear-admiral The purpoſe of this grand preparation was, to defeat and deſtroy the Spaniſh fleet aforeſaid at Feroll, as well as in other ports of the enemy; alſo to ſeize upon ſuch Indian fleets of treaſure as they ſhould meet with belonging to the king of Spain; but eſpecially to conquer, retain, and engarriſon moſt of the iſles of the Azores;[d] and above all the Tercera: wherefore this enterprize was called the ISLAND VOYAGE. In the Iſland Voyage.

Sir Francis Vere, who was marſhal again of the army, diſcovers himſelf much nettled at the queen's having made the lord Mountjoy lieutenant-general; and cannot forbear expoſing his patron Eſſex's diſingenuity towards that lord, in retrenching him to the mere title of a ſuperior command, rather than not let himſelf be known to have got the authority of it. And, notwithſtanding this, further betrays ſo much his ſtomach and jealouſy of Eſſex's conſent to that precedency, as to deſire the earl would not uſe him at all hereafter in any action wherein he was to go in chief; yet unreſervedly confeſſes, the earl took theſe ſpeeches of his as proceeding rather from a paſſionate diſcontentment, than a reſolution fram'd in cool blood; and with ſo little ſharpneſs, that when they came to Weymouth, the earl thinking there might remain ſome grudge of the laſt year's falling out, cauſed Sir Walter Ralegh and Sir Francis Vere to ſhake hands: "which we did both, ſays he, the more willingly, becauſe there had nothing paſſed between "us that might blemiſh reputation."[e]

ABOUT the 9th of July following, the whole fleet ſet ſail from Plymouth, and, for two days, had a fair leading wind; in which time all the ſhips received their directions from the council of war, with the meeting-places from time to time in caſe of ſeparation by tempeſt, fight, chaſe, or any other accident. But being now advanced about ſixty leagues, there aroſe ſuch an

They were ſo named by the Portugueſe, from a kind of hawks, call'd by them Aſores, by the Romans Accipitres, and by us Goſhawks; theſe iſlands breeding abundance of thoſe birds: tho' Ortelius derives the name from a French word, ſignifying to dry or wither, without giving reaſon for his etymology. They are nine in number, and named St. Mary's, which is near the coaſt of Spain; St. Michael's, which is the largeſt of them, being about twenty miles long; the Tercera, ſo called, becauſe lying the third from Spain, is the ſtrongeſt; Gratioſa, from the fertility of the ſoil, and pleaſant temper of the air; St. George's, like the two firſt, from the ſaint's name on whoſe day it was diſcover'd; the Pike, from the wonderful ſharp mountain thereon, which riſes ſteeple-wiſe three miles high, is ſix or ſeven miles in circuit at the baſe, and reported to have Vulcano's in its bowels, diſgorging flakes and ſtones of fire; Fayall was ſo call'd from Faya, the beech-tree, which grew in plenty there; Flores, from the abundance of flowers which overſpread the iſland; and Cuervo, from the vaſt flocks of crows or ravens which were obſerved to breed therein. exceeding exceeding high ſtorm fell in their teeth, and continued with ſuch violence for four days together, that all the ſhips were driven, with great detriment to ſeveral, back into Plymouth; and many died of the ſickneſs it had brought among them. While they lay here wind-bound for a month, and their proviſions much damaged and conſumed; Eſſex, in company, as he tells us himſelf, with Sir Walter Ralegh, rode poſt to court.[a] The earl was very forward in his propoſals to ſet out again with the fleet as ſoon as it ſhould be repair'd, or at leaſt one half of it, being ſure the Enemy ſhould have felt the weight and charge of the journey. But her Majeſty not accepting his offer, it was more adviſedly reſolved, to proportion their expedition to the opportunities which remain'd; the ſeaſon being ſo far elapſed, and their proviſions ſo much exhauſted: therefore Eſſex had orders from her Majeſty to diſcharge the land-forces, all but the thouſand Low-Country ſoldiers, then thought the beſt and moſt experienc'd of this army; whereby, tho' they were diſabled of diſembarking at Feroll, and attacking the enemy there by land; yet Eſſex offer'd to ſend certain fire-ſhips into the bay, and ſecond them with the two Spaniſh galleons laſt year taken, with ſome great flyboats and merchant-men, to deſtroy their ſhipping; and leave the queen's own Engliſh-built ſhips at the mouth of the harbour, with a principal commander, to ſecure their retreat; and this was allow'd of, but with ſome limitations, as Eſſex confeſſes in one place,[b] which in another,[c] we find to be an abſolute bar to hazard any other of the ſhips, and as abſolute a reſtraint of the earl himſelf from going into the harbour to put this project in practice; but that it ſhould be done by that principal commander he would have left behind; whether through care of his perſon as a nobleman, or to have it attempted by one of the greateſt abilities and experience for ſuch a naval exploit, I cannot ſay; but Sir Walter Ralegh was preferr'd to the execution of this ſervice, and, as Sir Francis Vere obſerves, the charge of firing the fleet was undertaken by him.[d]

During this abſence of Eſſex and Ralegh at court, which was not above ſeven days, there fell out ſuch exceeding tempeſtuous weather as very much diſtreſs'd the fleet both in Plymouth-Road and the Catwater; inſomuch that one of Ralegh's own ſhips, named the Roebuck, of three hundred tons burthen, ran aground, and bulged her ſelf, ſo became unſerviceable for that voyage; tho' much pains and care were taken by all hands, and eſpecially the lord Thomas Howard himſelf in perſon, to have preſerved her.[e] On the 17th of Auguſt following they all weighed anchor, and, with much labour, ſet ſail again, being becalm'd; but the weather growing ſomewhat favourable, they held their courſe for the North-Cape. Six days afterwards they fell acroſs the bay of Aſchaſen, or Biſcay; and at laſt bore full into it, much to the diſlike of Ralegh's pilot, a ſkilful mariner, named Broadbent, who thought it very perillous for ſo great a fleet ſo wilfully to imbay there, and upon an enemy's coaſt; yet as it was the general's courſe, they comply'd. The next being Bartholomew-day, they were here for ſeveral hours beaten and ſcatter'd about by a prodigious ſtorm, wherein one of the late taken prizes, named St. Matthew, falling into a head-ſea, and having her ſprit-ſail out, broke her bolt-ſprit and fore-maſt overboard, cloſe to the partners. The fall of her maſts alſo broke two anchors, and carried the third away; and her main-maſt, with her rolling and tumbling, had ſo looſen'd it ſelf, that it was in danger of breaking in the ſtep, whereby ſhe would ſoon have been ſunk, had not her captain, Sir George Carew, with great reſolution and hazard, carried her into England, and exchang'd her for another. In the ſame ſtorm the other Spaniſh prize, the St. Andrew, ſpent her main-top-maſt, and loſt company for ſome days; but all the reſt of the fleet kept labouring in the bay, till firſt Ralegh, and ſome ſhips of his ſquadron which happen'd to carry the Low-Country ſoldiers, clear'd out, and made the beſt of their way to the next rendezvous, as we ſhall hear: and afterwards ſeveral of the earl's loſing him, ſailed thither alſo in ſearch of him. This gave riſe to a miſrepreſentation by Ralegh's adverſaries, that he had deſignedly withdrawn himſelf and that part of the fleet;[f] while Eſſex himſelf incurr'd a more juſt cenſure throughout the whole fleet, by making the high land of Portugal, and bearing in ſo cloſe to the ſhore, that he alarm'd all the Country to make defence againſt him. Afterwards as the fleet, being join'd again, was paſſing together towards the ſouth, almoſt as far as the iſles of Bayon, Ralegh's ſhip, the Warſpite,[g] being then in the centre of them, on the 27th of [g] Tho' the ſhip Ralegh was now in, is every-where called the Warſpite in Purchas's edition of Sir Arthur Gorges's Relation of this voyage, who ſhould indeed well know its name, being captain thereof under Ralegh; yet as I meet not with any ſhip of the royal navy ſo named elſewhere, as that which Ralegh was in the laſt year, at the conqueſt of Cadiz, was called the Warſpite; and, as Sir William Monſon and others, call that alſo by this name, in which Ralegh, this year, perform'd the Iſland-Voyage; I conclude the other reading to have been an error of the preſs.

Auguſt

Auguſt, broke her main-yard aſunder in the very midſt by the parrel. This diſaſter was no ſooner made known, than Eſſex diſcover'd a greater in his ſhip, a deſperate leak being broke out in her, by which he had much-ado to eſcape drowning. Here it was agreed, that, till Ralegh's ſhip ſhould be repair'd, he might keep cruiſing about the height of the Rock, where they were to unite, and paſs to the South Cape; yet the next morning, before that reparation could be made, Ralegh had a meſſage to attend Eſſex with all ſpeed, that they might put in with the land, which it was impoſſible for Ralegh to do, being unable to work upon a wind, as having but a fore-ſail and mizen, and the wind almoſt of the land; beſides, if he could have made the land with that ſail, it was thought a madneſs to put upon the enemies coaſt in that condition; when, if the wind ſhould change to the weſt, he muſt, in want of his main-ſail, have yielded or periſhed: ſo found himſelf neceſſitated to ply up and down for two days, till the ſaid fraction was mended. In this diſtreſs, there was no direction given for any other of the fleet to attend upon Ralegh; yet Sir William Brook in the Dreadnought, out of his friendly diſpoſition, tarried with him; alſo the vice-admiral himſelf, lord Thomas Howard, very affectionately offer'd all the aſſiſtance he could give; and ſeveral other of the ſea-captains voluntarily did the like: but Ralegh would admit of no more than three or four ſmall men of war to accompany him; and order'd the reſt, even of his own ſquadron, to repair to the admiral: ſo far was he from projecting a diviſion of the fleet, by entreating any to forſake Eſſex and abide with him, as it was aftewards very falſely repreſented, to incenſe Eſſex againſt Ralegh, for contriving thereby the fruſtration of their firſt reſolv'd attempt; and as Ralegh himſelf, when they met at the Azores, ſo ſatisfactorily made evident, that the ſaid imputation turned only to the ſhame of its contrivers.[a] Diſtreſs'd.

When Ralegh had repaired the damages of the ſtorm, he bore in with the coaſt, making all the enquiry he could after Eſſex and the fleet, but could hear no tidings of them; he ſent into the iſles of Bayon, and towards the South-Cape, well knowing the earl could not then put into Feroll or the Groyne, as was afterwards colourably pretended he would have done had they united, the wind being flat againſt him; and the whole fleet having over-ſhot that coaſt near twenty leagues before the main-yard of Ralegh's ſhip was broken; and beſides, that they could not recover it again, both thoſe Spaniſh prizes were wanting which only were to have been ventured in the Service. Hereupon Ralegh ſhaped his courſe to the Rock, which was appointed for the general rendezvous; expecting, not only with good reaſon, to meet Eſſex there, but with great deſire; his own force being ſo ſmall, and the enemy, as he heard, out at ſea with a powerful fleet. Yet thoſe who could ſuſpect Ralegh would prefer a ſeparation, dangerous and diſadvantageous as it was now, would needs have had it thought there was much more reaſon for that ſuſpicion, when there came to Ralegh at the Rock near thirty ſail more, moſt of them his own victuallers and tranſports; but the truth is, that having loſt Eſſex during the ſtorm in the bay, and miſſed him alſo at the North-Cape, they came hither according to their inſtructions; where, caſually meeting with Ralegh, he held them together, and conducted them to Eſſex at the Iſlands: otherwiſe they had all return'd home, after they had failed at the South-Cape, which was the third and laſt meeting-place, of ſome admiral to command them, and of whom they would have fail'd, ſince none of the fleet went ſo far ſouthward. Divided from the fleet.

Soon after he had determin'd, in ſearch of the fleet, to paſs on towards the South-Cape, he was travers'd by an Engliſh bark, which aſſur'd him they had learn'd from an Engliſh man of war which had lately taken an India-man, that the Adelantado was gone for the Iſlands to convoy the Indian fleet ſafe home. This ſeeming very probable, and no one ſuſpecting that any of their countrymen would traiterouſly delude her majeſty's fleet with any falſe informations in a purſuit of this conſequence, Ralegh earneſtly beſought the captain of the ſaid bark to hunt after Eſſex, and appriſe him of this intelligence: but he anſwer'd, in the hearing of the whole company, that the captain, who had taken that India man, had already ſent a letter to Eſſex thereof. Ralegh, doubting it might have miſcarried, or that none was ſent, commanded one of the ſmall men of war attending upon himſelf with all diligence to ſeek out the fleet, and make report of what they had heard. This ſhip, by good chance, met with the fleet next day, and deliver'd Receives falſe Intelligence.

[a] Eſſex himſelf, in his Apology, imputes the Defeat of their deſign upon the Spaniſh navy at Feroll, to the loſing of Ralegh's company by the Miſchances which happened to their ſhips, and to the further ſeparation of the fleet; without any ways inſinuating that it was occaſion'd by any artifice to overthrow the ſcheme they had concerted. But from the moſt accurate hiſtorian of this voyage, Sir Arthur Gorges, whom I now chiefly follow, it will appear, a few lines further, there were other accidents beſides, which hindered them from landing at Feroll; and theſe alſo are acknowledg'd by Eſſex, in that relation of this voyage which is ſubſcribed by himſelf and his council of war before-named: See Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1936. Sufficient, in the whole, to clear Ralegh, both from the cenſure of any wilful deſertion, and, conſequently, for not putting in execution the firſt intended aſſault.

the news. Two days after, Ralegh received two letters from Eſſex, which, ſomewhat taxing his abſence, and not writing, requir'd that he would preſently follow him to the Iſlands. "Where-"unto (the earl ſaid) he was haſtening to find the Adelantado; not doubting but to give his "miſtreſs a better account of that ſervice, than he ſhould yield his maſter."

In paſſing to the Iſlands, Ralegh encounter'd many new difficulties, by which he was ſo much in danger of loſing his main-maſt, that he was forced to ſend the ſhips in his company before, becauſe he thought Eſſex might be in want of them, if he ſhould meet the enemy; and, if they had joined the fleet without Ralegh, who was principally depended on, in caſe of any engagement, it would have much ſtrengthned the miſconſtructions that had been nouriſhed againſt him; but Ralegh ſo ſpeedily and effectually repaired his crazy maſt, and ſo briſkly ply'd his ſails, that he overtook his conſorts next day, and on the eighth of September they all made the iſland of Tercera; yet here could they meet with no news of the fleet, tho' they enquired of an Engliſh merchant who had traded about theſe Iſlands above ſix weeks, and tho' it had paſſed that way but two days before. By this merchant Ralegh wrote into England, to acquaint the ſtate in what ſituation they were; then paſſed on to St. George's iſland, where they found the weather exceedingly hot, and were vexatiouſly becalm'd for a day or two, before they could get foward to Gratioſa. Here, as they coaſted along, on the tenth of September about midnight, they ſaw a large and perfect rainbow by moon-light, in the ſhape and bigneſs of thoſe formed more commonly by the ſun, tho' in colours not ſo various, but chiefly inclining to a pale or whitiſh flame: this made the generality of the ſeamen expect ſome extraordinary tempeſtuous weather; but it fell out, on the contrary, to be very calm and hot.[a] The ſame night they alſo eſpied, by the light of the moon, then upon the border of the horizon, ſome ſail of ſhips gliding towards the eaſt of Gratioſa; at which Ralegh hung out two lights for his company to follow him in chaſe of them; but they not taking his courſe, and the moon being ſoon after quite ſhadow'd and intercepted by the earth, he was left in darkneſs and ſolitude, having loſt all ſight both of the new-diſcover'd ſhips, and thoſe of his own company, till, in the ſpace of four days more, a leiſurely breeze of wind brought him, after all theſe impediments, to the reſt of the fleet, then gather'd at the iſle of Flores.

Joins the fleet.

As ſoon as Ralegh had deſcry'd the fleet, he took his barge, and, with our author Sir Arthur Gorges, as alſo ſome other of the officers and gentlemen in his company, went aboard the earl of Eſſex's ſhip, with whom they all din'd; and "who ſeemed, ſays Gorges, to be the joyfulleſt "man living for our arrival;" proteſting, that "he never believed we would leave him, al-"tho' divers perſuaded him to the contrary;" and acknowledg'd, "that he was ſorry for a "letter which he had written, by Mr. Robert Knolles, into England againſt us;[b] promiſing "preſently to make a diſpatch on purpoſe, contrary to the former." Further, when Eſſex had fully ſatisfied himſelf, that all the tranſports and victuallers which returned with Ralegh, had not been inveigled away by him; and how commendably he had thus drawn them to the Iſlands, againſt their inclinations, being, moſt of them, in great diſtreſs; he open'd himſelf to him in a very amicable and communicative manner. He told him, "how he had ſpent the "time of their ſeparation wholly in ranging the ſeas to meet with the Adelantado;" he acquainted him with "the many conjectures and ſurmiſes that had been vented of his abſence, and, "withal, named to him ſome of thoſe men who had taxed him ſecretly with ſtrange reports, "yet pretended to love him; which he proteſted he never believ'd, but thereby the better ob-

[a] This rainbow by the light of the moon, is the rather to be obſerved, becauſe Pliny, in his Natural Hiſtory, ſpeaking of meteors, denies any rainbow to be ſeen, but oppoſite to the ſun, and never in the night-ſeaſon; yet tells us, Ariſtotle reports, for a rarity, that in his time there was a nocturnal rainbow ſeen; but, withal, that it could only be at the full of the moon. Nevertheleſs, in theſe parts, they are very ordinary, as well when the moon is not at full, as otherwiſe: for no longer than a week after this time, Ralegh and his company obſerved another lunary rainbow, as they rode at anchor before Flores; and there could not be two full moons in ſeven days, which makes it probable theſe iſlands were not known to the Greeks and Romans, or thoſe meteors not ſufficiently obſerved by them.

[b] Tho' Sir Arthur Gorges does a little further both repeat the ſending of this meſſage into England, as if it was, in very ſtrong terms, againſt Sir Walter Ralegh; and alſo Eſſex's promiſe to him, that he would now ſend another of Recantation; which promiſe giving ſome ſatisfaction to Ralegh, and the meſſage into England being perceptibly ſent to colour over the diſappointment of his promiſe to the queen; "wherefore we ſtrove the leſs to publiſh our "Apologies, ſays Gorges, or to conteſt with a man of Eſſex's "place and credit; but left him to his beſt excuſe and our "apparent innocence." Yet in the copy of that meſſage, or inſtructions to Mr. Knolles, which my ſaid author exhibits verbatim, this abſence of Ralegh's (and conſequently that omiſſion againſt the enemy) is no ways laid to his charge, or mention'd as any fault or contrivance of his; all the words that expreſs the ſame, being theſe: "If her "majeſty ask you, why there was no attempt upon the "fleet at Feroll? You may ſay, I neither had the St. Ma-"thew, the principal ſhip for that execution, nor the "St. Andrew, till my own ſhip was almoſt ſunk; and I, "not able to make ſail, till Sir Walter Ralegh with his "own ſhip, the Dreadnought, and very near twenty ſail, "were gone." So that the meſſenger was further inſtructed, it ſeems, to expound this part of his meſſage to Ralegh's diſadvantage, by word of mouth; for this ſuppoſition will render Eſſex's promiſe to Ralegh requiſite, of ſending another advertiſement how they were all met again, and had been formerly ſever'd by Misfortunes only, and not by any wilful default in the rear-admiral, as was doubted.

"ſerv'd

"ſerv'd their ſcandalous and canker'd diſpoſitions." In this manner did the earl of Eſſex receive and welcome Sir Walter Ralegh with the greateſt kindneſs and familiarity, as well as all the gentlemen of his company; to the great diſlike and heart-burning of ſome, who much envied that liking, which, of his own diſpoſition, Eſſex bore to Ralegh: For tho' the earl had many doubts and jealouſies buzz'd into his ears againſt him; yet I have often obſerv'd (ſays Gorges) that both in his greateſt actions of ſervice, and in the times of his chiefeſt recreations, he would ever accept of his counſel and company, before many others who thought themſelves more in his favour. How much eſteem'd by Eſſex.

'Tis true, the earl, of his own unperverted nature, was a man, prone to gracious and generous principles; but no leſs eaſily blown up to prejudice and indignation againſt his real friends, by his pretended ones; whence we may conceive, as Sir Arthur Gorges has well obſerv'd, upon giving an inſtance of his moderation and bounty to ſome of theſe iſlanders, Tho' he was endowed with many good gifts, how it came to paſs, that he at laſt fail'd in the uſe of them.

HERE, as they lay before the iſle of Flores, they held a council of war, to conquer and poſſeſs, or lay waſte ſome of theſe iſlands; they being the chief places of retreat and refreſhment for the king of Spain's Indian fleets, by the treaſures whereof his boundleſs ambition ſo much diſturbed and tyranniz'd over Europe. In this council, the admirals and commanders had their charge allotted, after the following manner. Eſſex and Ralegh were to undertake the iſland of Fayall; the lord Thomas Howard and Sir Francis Vere were to ſecure Gratioſa; the lord Mountjoy and Sir Chriſtopher Blunt were to attempt St. Michael's; and the Netherland ſquadron was quarter'd to Pike,[a] where grew the greateſt ſtore of wines, therefore preſumed no unwelcome portion to them. And theſe places were the firſt reſolved upon, that they might afterwards attack the Tercera it ſelf; for Ralegh's arrival, contrary to all mens expectations, and many mens hopes, gave their reſolution upon this ſtronger iſland a ſecond life; but it was firſt thought expedient to ſtrengthen and ſupply themſelves with whatſoever thoſe weaker ones would afford: and to this end the fleet was divided into four ſquadrons. The enterprize allotted him and Eſſex.

BUT Ralegh's mariners having obtained leave to go aſhore at Flores, to water and furniſh themſelves with ſuch other neceſſaries as they wanted; while he himſelf, attended by ſeveral other of the commanders and gentlemen, walk'd a mile or two into the iſland to ſtretch their legs and refreſh themſelves, where they all dined in a little village, the bare-legg'd governor having cauſed ſuch fare to be brought them as the country afforded, which they very honourably paid for, without offering them the leaſt injury; becauſe the earl had before given them an indemnity, under his own hand, from all manner of violence: when Eſſex, impatient to be in action, all of a ſudden, and before the ſailors could get their casks of freſh water aboard, ſent, on the 16th of September, captain Arthur Champernon to tell them, "That the general was borne up for Fayall, meaning preſently to take it in; therefore required them to follow him inſtantly; and tho' they ſhould not overtake him, yet to find him there as ſoon as they could, and there they might ſupply their wants." Hereupon they haſten'd away, with all the ſail they could make, after him; but no general could they overtake. The next morning they got ſight of Fayall, and miſs'd of Eſſex alſo there, to their great diſſatisfaction, he being ſix leagues nearer that iſland when he ſent for them, and ſet ſail thither ſix or eight hours before them. Loſes the earl's company.

BEING enter'd the road, they beheld before them a very fine town, pleaſantly ſeated along the ſhore; from whence the people, upon ſight of their ſhips, began to pack away both bag and baggage: their friars, nuns, other women and children, they alſo ſent away in carts and carriages: ſo continued tranſporting all up into the country for two days together. There was beſides a ſtrong fort at one end of the town, and another on the top of a very high mountain near adjoining, by nature very inacceſſible, and artificially fenced with flankers, rampiers, and a ditch; alſo ſix pieces of artillery, and two hundred Spaniards in garriſon; not reckoning others quarter'd about the iſland. They fir'd upon Ralegh's ſhips as he anchor'd in the road, tho' without much damage, and ſet a great red ſtandard up in defiance before his eyes. They ſent moreover ſix companies with their colours to entrench upon the ſhore, in order to oppoſe his landing. However Ralegh, in his barge, accompanied with Sir Arthur Gorges and captain William Morgan, rowed cloſe along the ſhore-ſide, and by the high fort towards the town, to Arrives at Fayall.

[a] Sir Francis Vere, and Camden, miſled by the MS. of his Commentaries, inform us, "The general only, with "his ſquadron, was to go to Fayal; and Sir Walter "Ralegh, with his, either to the Pike or St. George's iſland." But it ſeems not likely, that Ralegh ſhould have a command in chief, which he might execute, with approbation of the council, in one place; yet incur all their diſpleaſure, by uſurping that of the general in another. But the diſadvantageous repreſentation which Vere has given of Ralegh, in the ſequel of this action, may pretty well direct us how we ſhould credit his introduction to it.

acquaint himſelf with the moſt proper place for making a deſcent when Eſſex ſhould arrive; from whence they were ſaluted with divers musket-ſhot, which they very fortunately eſcap'd, having with them neither targets nor armour for their ſafeguard.

Calls a council of war.

Upon theſe provocations, and the want they grew in of thoſe neceſſaries, wherewith they were both lately hurried from accommodating themſelves, and promis'd they ſhould be ſupplied here; Raleigh called a council of the captains and officers to conſult about taking of the town, if Eſſex arrived not; thinking it a ſhame to forbear ſo fair a prize, ſo near at hand, till they had carried all off; eſpecially ſince the enemy had begun the war upon them, and ſo proudly dared them to their own defence. Further, theſe bravadoes, with the hopes of wealth in this goodly town, and the ranſom of houſes and priſoners, made all the mariners and ſoldiers not only ready to mutiny that they were ſo long reſtrain'd; but reflect on their commanders, as if this forbearance was the effect only of their fear. And what made them the more eager was, that they ſaw no likelihood of other benefit by this voyage, than what was thus to be gotten aſhore. Notwithſtanding theſe murmurs, and that they heard no news of Eſſex in two days, the council was divided; and ſome of the captains who were his moſt flattering and ſervile dependants, as Sir Guilly Merrick,[a] Sir Nicholas Parker, and others, were by no means for landing without his knowledge; but Raleigh, with Sir W. Brook, Sir A. Gorges, Sir W. Harvey, and many other commanders and gentlemen of his own ſquadron, were of a contrary opinion; judging the general would repute them idlers and cowards to lie ſo long before ſo good a town with ſo many ſhips and men, and do nothing, but let them convey away their effects. This was the general voice both of the land and ſea-forces; yet the violent perſuaſions of Merrick did ſo prevail, that they agreed to delay the enterprize one day longer; when, if the earl did not come, they all agreed to land together.

Now, the wind tacking about, ſomewhat unfit for the road they lay in, Raleigh, and divers of his ſquadron, with many other of the ſhips after him, weighed, and coaſted about the point to the north-weſt ſide of the iſland, ſome four miles further from the town than they were before, and there let fall their anchors, being a better road than the firſt, as the wind ſat. But Merrick, with ſome five or ſix ſhips of his conforts, would not advance with them. They were now in the fourth day of their arrival before Fayal, and no general appear'd; but the proſpect of a moſt inviting country, full of little villages and fruitful fields, which ſharpen'd the general deſire of landing, to ſupply their want of victuals, and eſpecially of water, wherewith they had not been recruited ſince their firſt ſetting out from Plymouth; therefore, by agreement, they mann'd out a barge, a long-boat and pinnace, with threeſcore muskets and forty pikes, rather to guard themſelves in watering, than in expectation of any encounter from the town or forts on the other ſide of the iſland. But they were no ſooner ready to put off from the ſhips, than they diſcover'd ſix enſigns of foot, and ſome dozen horſe-men, marching down ſpeedily from the town and forts to meet them; and made ſuch haſte, that they ſoon poſſeſs'd the trenches towards the ſhore where the Engliſh lay, and where, with brandiſhing ſwords, and waving colours, they ſtood daring them to a rencounter. Hereupon, Raleigh found it neceſſary to augment his force, which Brook, Harvey, and other ſea-officers, readily ſupply'd, to the number of one hundred and ſixty men more. Then ſaid Raleigh to them, "ſeeing theſe Spaniards and "Portugueſe are ſo gallant to ſeek or follow, and keep us from watering, we will try our fortunes with them, and either win our landing, or gain a beating." As Raleigh then rowed along by his ſhips, he was greeted by Bret, Sidney, White, Berry, and other captains of the Low-Country ſoldiers, who call'd out and adviſ'd him, "to take them and ſome of their companies with him; for, if he ventur'd to make the ſhore only with mariners and his own attendants, without their land-ſoldiers, he might receive a diſcreditable repulſe." But Raleigh excus'd himſelf, ſaying, "he did not know for what ſervice the earl might deſign them; therefore was reſolv'd, with his own company, to make the deſcent, and then ſhould ſend for their recruits; by which he would undertake to lodge them that night in the town, and the next in the forts: beſides, he was willing to make the attempt with thoſe of his own ſquadron, that neither the general nor his train ſhould have cauſe to be aſham'd of them for undertaking that in the face of their enemies, which they durſt not of themſelves follow and perform.

[a] This Guilly Merrick of Hanſcard in Pembrokeſhire, the ſon of Rowland Merrick, Biſhop of Bangor, who died 1566; was knighted by Eſſex at the ſack of Cadiz, and one of his creatures and evil counſellors, as Camden has obſerved. Inſomuch, as having been a buſy promoter and partaker of the ſaid earl's treaſons, he receiv'd the reward which is richly due to all ſuch-like fomenters of great mens pride, paſſions and prejudices, between three and four years after this time, at Tyburn.

Then

THEN Ralegh, having thus a party of two hundred and threeſcore men, not half the number of the enemy, made forward; and while ſome ordnance, he had judiciouſly placed before him in pinnaces, as cloſe along the ſhore as they could lie, were beating upon their trenches, he ruſhed through or under them as faſt as his oars could ply to the landing-place; which was guarded firſt with a mighty ledge of rocks, ſome forty paces long into the ſea, and afterwards trench'd and flank'd with earth and ſtone, having only a narrow lane between two walls left for their entrance. But now, as they approached ſtill nearer to the ſhore, the enemies ſhot flew down ſo thick among them, that not only ſeveral of the common men, but of thoſe who would before have paſſed for very forward and valiant leaders, were much diſmay'd; inſomuch that Ralegh, who moſt glorioufly approv'd himſelf no leſs their chief in courage, than he was in command, did not ſpare openly to rebuke them aloud with many reproachful words. At laſt, when he ſaw them ſtill linger, through conſternation, as much to their danger as their diſgrace, he commanded, with a loud voice, his watermen to row his own barge full upon the rocks, and bad as many as were not afraid, to follow him. Hereat ſome boats ran in with us (ſays my author) and out of them were landed Mr. Garrett, then a penſioner, afterwards earl of Kildare, Sir W. Brook, Sir W. Harvey, Sir John Scott, Captain Henry Thynne, Captain White, Captain Arthur Radford, Captain W. Morgan, Mr. Duke Brook, Mr. Thomas Rudgeway, Mr. Walter Chute, Mr. Henry Allen, Mr. Charles Mackart, and divers other gentlemen. So, clambering over the rocks, and wading through the water, he made his way pell-mell, through all their fire, with ſhot, pike and ſword, up to the narrow entrance; where he ſo reſolutely purſued his aſſault, that the enemy, after a ſhort reſiſtance, gave ground; and, when they ſaw his forces preſs faſter and thicker upon them, ſuddenly retiring, they caſt away their weapons, and betook themſelves to the hills and woods. The like alſo did thoſe who were intrench'd higher: and thus did he win this difficult and dangerous landing, together with the trenches of the enemy. A few of his men indeed were drowned and ſlain, more hurt, and a couple of long-boats ſunk; yet was not his loſs ſo conſiderable as to detract from the juſtice of thoſe congratulations which were paid him by the officers of the Low-Country forces, when, with ſome of their companies, they arrived upon the iſland, and found the footing he had won ſo ſtrongly fortify'd and guarded.

His dangerous deſcent.

And ſuperior courage.

Climbs the rocks.

Wins a landing and the trenches.

RALEGH, thus recruited, being now near five hundred ſtrong, thought beſt to go through with the matter, and prepare the town in readineſs for Eſſex. Therefore, he appointed Bret to the office of ſerjeant-major, directed the other captains to advance their colours, marſhal the companies, and ſo, in order, marched to the town, about four miles diſtant from the landing-place. In their paſſage divers of the enemy, who had before braved them with the greateſt inſolence, came with white napkins at the end of ſtaves, and voluntarily abaſed themſelves to offices of the greateſt ſervility. There was indeed a way, two miles about, by which they might have paſſed to the town, and avoided the high fort where the Spaniards lay in garriſon. But Ralegh, conſidering the trouble of their march, the ſultry heat of the weather, the hazards of delay, and, above all, the neceſſity they were under of immediate ſupplies, took the ſhorteſt courſe; reſolving to bring fort and town all into one day's work. Thus, at the head of about forty gentlemen of the beſt rank, Ralegh led on the companies in a gentle regular manner, full in the face of the fort, having only his leading-ſtaff in his hand, and no other armour on but his collar, for which he was ſomewhat cenſur'd by his friends; for, when they came within reach of the fort, they were ſhrewdly encounter'd with ſeveral fierce ſtorms of great and ſmall ſhot, which came thundering down upon them from all parts of it, wounding ſeveral,[a] killing ſome, and putting moſt of his men into diſorder: inſomuch that Ralegh himſelf, with his little vanguard, was no ſooner paſs'd, and enter'd under the covert of their trenches and barricadoes at the declivity of a little hill, but the reſt, compoſing the main body of his forces, which, till now that they found themſelves under the mercy of the enemies fire, advanced in good order, begun to break their ranks, and, from marching, fell to running on in a ſtraggling and confus'd manner till they were under the walls and trenches almoſt as ſoon as their leader,

Marches to the high fort.

[a] Among the reſt, there was one captain William Morgan, a brave old ſoldier, in this march; who, being reproved by our author, Sir A. Gorges, for coming to the field only in his doublet and boſe, without either armour or target, anſwer'd, That his fleſh was of muſket-proof. Immediately after a muſket-ball ſtruck him point-blank upon his belly, and, with the force of its own blow, fell flat at his feet, leaving only a black ſpot or bruiſe upon his ſkin;—thanks to the buckle that join'd his girdle; deſerving to be repoſited among thoſe trophies in the temple of Mars, which witneſs he wants not one brother-ſoldier's impenetrable ſuit of mail, nor the ſeven-fold ſhield of another, who can encounter his enemy behind the curtains only of a pair of proverbs, atteſting How little armour will ſuffice, that is well-plac'd; and, How much fortune favours the bold.

who came ſome twelve-ſcore yards before them in a ſteady and deliberate march. Raleigh was ſomewhat moved to ſee this tumultuous and timorous courſe; and more, to think that the enemy ſaw themſelves were the occaſion of it; therefore he cry'd out to Bret, Berry, and other captains, demanding, "If theſe were the men that ſhould have done him ſuch ſervice in land-"ing, and ſaved him from diſhonour? or this the manner of their Low-Country troops, to "ſhew ſuch baſe cowardice at the firſt ſight of an enemy, and at the muſket-ſhot ſo far off "from a fort?" The captains, who were themſelves brave enough, knowing the truth would be the beſt apology, anſwer'd, "That theſe companies who had behaved themſelves with ſuch "irreſolution, were indeed men taken out of Fluſhing and Brill, the cautionary towns; ſo were "raw ſoldiers, who had ever lived in a ſafe garriſon, and ſeldom or never ſeen an enemy, or en-"counter'd with ſhot in the field."

BEING thus got under covert of the trenches and walls which the Spaniards had abandon'd, and retired to their fortifications on the top of the hill, Raleigh commanded captain Bret to appoint a ſerjeant or two, with a few ſhot, to go view and diſcover the way to the town, which, in many places, lay open, as well to the high-fort here in the way towards it, as to the other fort at the end thereof: and where the ways were fenced, they were ſtill more dangerous; it being with low-piled walls of looſe ragged ſtones, which Raleigh juſtly ſuſpected would increaſe, rather than obſtruct the miſchiefs of their enemies artillery. Bret brought word of a general unwillingneſs in the lieutenants and ſerjeants to undertake this diſcovery, ſo much under the command of the fort and hill; and that the troops were rather deſirous of ſlipping by, in the moſt haſty, diſperſed and unobſerved manner they could; which Raleigh would by no means ſuffer, through conſideration of their ſafety, without urging the regard he had to their credit in this enterprize; for being by this time well inform'd, the iſland could raiſe a thouſand armed men, and, reaſonably believing they would gather their greateſt ſtrength for the defence of their beſt town, towards which he was now marching, he concluded they would have it more in their power to defeat him, advancing in little diſorderly and ſcatter'd parties, than in a regular united body. Bret did make ſome offer himſelf to go and ſurvey theſe paſſages, if he ſhould be expreſly commanded; but indeed it was found he could not be wanted, or ſpared among his own raw and unexperienc'd troops.

WHEN Raleigh, therefore, ſaw all men ſo ſcrupulous of this undertaking, and eſpecially thoſe garriſon-ſoldiers, he told them, "That he would not offer that to any man which he "would himſelf refuſe: that tho' it were not the duty and office of a chief commander to un-"dergo ſo ordinary a ſervice, but what duly appertained to the inferior officers and ſoldiers; "and, notwithſtanding (ſaid he) that I could therefore enforce others to do it, they ſhall well per-"ceive that I my ſelf will do that which they dare not attempt; wherein I am aſham'd on their "behalf, that our general and we are all thus abuſed in our opinion of theſe Low-Country ſol-"diers." Then he called for his cuiraſs and his caſk, and ſaid, "he would both go view "the way for them, which they made ſo nice of, as alſo the paſſages and aſcents to the hill-top; "and, as well as he could, obſerve the ſtrength and fortifications thereof, for their better direc-"tion the next morning." Hereupon, captain Berry was very ready to go, "and earneſtly "deſired me (ſays our author) to divert our rear-admiral from undertaking it; and I there-"upon (continues he) did openly diſſuade him, who commanded in chief, from putting his "own perſon to theſe inferior offices of hazard, fitter for a lieutenant or ſerjeant, than himſelf, to "perform; knowing that all the direction, as well of thoſe troops, as alſo of a whole ſquadron "of the navy, did, at that time, only reſt upon him, in the abſence of the admiral and vice-"admiral. Notwithſtanding he was obſtinate therein; as well in ſcorn of thoſe who had refuſed, "as alſo, indeed, out of a deſire to be better inform'd of the ſtrength and fortifications of the "high fort. When I ſaw him reſolved, I told him that I would, out of the love of a kinſ-"man in particular, and alſo out of an honeſt regard, take ſuch part as he did, from whom I "had received many kind favours, and accompany him; but not out of any great deſire I had "to go about a piece of work, which conſiſted of much danger, and little honour in the per-"formance. He thanked me for my offer, but yet wiſhed me not to go, if it were againſt "my will: notwithſtanding I accompanied him, and ſo did ſome eight or ten more of our "ſervants and followers. But I ſay truly, and ſo afterwards it was much ſpoken of, that there "was not any one more of quality that did accompany him in that buſineſs."

His deſperate diſcovery.

In this manner, and with this number, did Raleigh in perſon go; the only one, it ſeems, who deſpaired not of ſucceſs, to diſcover the aſcents to the hill; the cannon-ſhot of the enemy, and thereby the ſtones of the batter'd walls, flying on every ſide thick about him all the while. He ſtill proceeded, with an undaunted pace, to compaſs this knowledge of the ſafeſt way by which he

he was to lead the reſt, tho' he perceived wounds and death dealt on either hand, and his own danger at every ſtep, more unavoidable. Some of his company, in the march, were hurt, and two had their heads taken from their ſhoulders; Sir Arthur Gorges had his left leg ſhot through with a musket-ball, who, without remembering any pain it gave him, obſerves the bullet burnt both his ſilk ſtocking and buskin, as if they had been ſindged with a hot iron. "I was then "hard by the rear-admiral (continues he) who alſo was ſhot through the breeches and doublet- "ſleeves in two or three places. And ſtill they ply'd us ſo faſt with ſmall-ſhot, that, as I well "remember, he wiſhed me to put off a large red ſcarf which I then wore; being, as he ſaid, a "very fair mark for them. But I, not willing to do the Spaniards ſo much honour at that "time, tho' I could have wiſhed it had not been on, anſwer'd the rear-admiral again, That "his white ſcarf was as eminent as my red; and therefore I would now follow his example." And narrow eſcape.

HAVING, by this time, made a ſufficient diſcovery, both of the way for his troops to paſs, as alſo of the avenues to the high fort on the mountain, which he intended to attempt, after he had ſecur'd the town; captain Berry, with Allen, and ſome others, advanced to him. Hereupon he ſent ſome guides to captain Bret, with orders for him alſo to march up with the companies, that they might unite before they came to the town, becauſe he there expected an engagement; or, at leaſt, ſome ſalley out of the fort at the end thereof, which they muſt needs paſs before they could get at the town; and which ſeemed to threaten reſiſtance, being a very fine fortification, all of ſtone-work, with curtain, flankers, and ditch, very artificially caſt. But immediately, upon Ralegh's approach with the body of his men, the Spaniards, it ſeems, abandon'd it; for when he enter'd it, he found they were newly departed. In like manner, as he marched on, he found the inhabitants had alſo forſaken the town, and left him in poſſeſſion of it, with ſuch wares and ſtores as could not ſuddenly be remov'd. Thus, tho' with much danger indeed, and ſome loſs of about half a ſcore men, with the hurt of little above double that number, Ralegh made himſelf maſter, in effect, of the whole iſland; which ſupply'd him, from his own experience, with an example to confirm the aſſertion, he afterwards took occaſion to maintain, and which we have, in part, touch'd upon before; alledging, That a Country cannot prevent an enemy's fleet from landing its army, without as good a fleet to oppoſe it.[a] And this example, in his own ſummary account, we have here ſubjoin'd, as what may give the reader a double ſatisfaction, both in confirming the veracity of that which has been here extracted thereof from Sir Arthur Gorges, and adding to the many other inſtances of Ralegh's modeſty and reſtriction, who could, in the recital of this action, be ſo much leſs particular in the brave ſteps he took to this victory, with the dangers and difficulties he ſurmounted by ſea and land, than that honourable hiſtorian has been, who was a witneſs of them. Enters the town.

"[a] The difficult landing of our Engliſh, ſays Ralegh, "at Fayal, in the year 1597, is alledg'd againſt this: "which example moves me no way to think, That a "large Coaſt may be defended againſt a ſtrong fleet. I "landed thoſe Engliſh in Fayal myſelf; and therefore "ought to take notice of this inſtance — There were, in- "deed, ſome in that voyage, who adviſed me not to un- "dertake it, and I hearken'd to them ſomewhat longer "than was requiſite; eſpecially whilſt they deſired me to "reſerve the title of ſuch an exploit, though it were "not great, for a greater perſon. But when they began "to tell me of difficulty, I gave them to underſtand the "ſame which I now maintain, That it were more difficult to "defend a Coaſt than to invade it. The truth is, that I "could have landed my men with more eaſe than I did; "yea, without finding any reſiſtance, if I would have "rowed to another place; yea, even there where I landed, "if I would have taken more company to help me. But, "without fearing any imputation of raſhneſs, I may ſay, "I had more regard of reputation in that buſineſs than "ſafety: for, I thought it belonging to the honour of "our prince and nation, that a few iſlanders ſhould not "think any advantage great enough againſt a fleet ſet "forth by Q. ELIZABETH. And further, I was un- "willing that ſome Low-Country captains, and others, not "of my own ſquadron, whoſe aſſiſtance I had refuſed, "ſhould pleaſe themſelves with a ſweet conceit (tho' it "would have been ſhort, when I had landed in ſome "other place) That, for want of their help, I was driven "to turn tail. Therefore, I took with me none but "men aſſured, commanders of my own ſquadron, with "ſome of their followers, and a few other gentlemen vo- "luntiers, whom I could not refuſe; as, Sir W. Brook, "Sir W. Harvey, Sir A. Gorges, Sir John Scott, Sir Tho- "mas Ridgeway, Sir Henry Thynne, Sir Charles Morgan, "Sir Wat. Chute, Marcellus Throgmorton, captain Lau- "rence Keymis, captain William Morgan, and others; "ſuch as well underſtood themſelves and the enemy, by "whoſe help, with God's favour, I made good the en- "terprize I undertook. As for the working of the ſea, the "ſteepneſs of the cliffs, and other troubles, that were not "new to us, we overcame them well enough. And theſe "(notwithſtanding) made five or ſix companies of the "enemy, who fought to impeach our landing, abandon "the wall where their musketiers lay on the reſt for us, "and won the place of them without any great loſs. "This I could have done with leſs danger, ſo that it "ſhould not have ſerved for example of a rule that failed "even in this example. But the reaſons before alledged, "together with other reaſons well known to the gentle- "men above-named, tho' more private than to be here "laid down, made me rather follow the way of bravery, "and take the ſhorteſt courſe; having it ſtill in my own "power to fall off when I ſhould think it meet. 'Tis ea- "ſily ſaid, the enemy was more than a coward, which was "more than we knew; neither will I magnify ſuch a "ſmall piece of ſervice, by ſeeking to prove him better; "whom, had I thought equal to my own followers, I "would otherwiſe have dealt with. But, for ſo much as "concerns the propoſition in hand, he that beheld this, "may well remember, that the ſame enemy troubled us "more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking "the ſhore; that many of our men were ſlain or hurt by "him, among whom, Sir Arthur Gorges was ſhot in that "march; and that ſuch as, thinking all danger was paſt "when we had won good footing, would needs follow us "to the town, were driven by him to forſake the pace of "a man of war, and betake themſelves to a haſty trot." So he ends the curious digreſſion which introduced this example, with advice to employ, againſt thoſe that ſhould aſſail us, our good ſhips on the ſea, and not truſt to any intrench- ment upon the ſhore. Hiſtory of the World, lib. 5. cap. 1. ſect. 9.

THIS

THIS town, of which Ralegh was thus poſſeſs'd, was called Villa Dorta, as I find in Linſchoten; who alſo informs us, the people were moſtly of the Dutch offspring, yet uſing the Portugueſe language. Others, who likewiſe deſcribe it, reckon that it contain'd, even ſome years before this time, at leaſt five hundred houſes, built all of ſtone, with tiled roofs, and diſpoſed into fine ſtreets; beſides a handſome church, nunnery, and friery; interſpers'd with many pleaſant gardens of delicate fruits, and wells of freſh water: inſomuch that, for bigneſs, it has been compar'd to Plymouth or Yarmouth; but, in ſituation, to Dover; and might probably now have been of as good advantage to Sir Walter Ralegh, as it was, eight years before, to the earl of Cumberland,[a] had he not, in compliment to the earl of Eſſex, oblig'd himſelf to ſo diſadvantageous a delay in the conqueſt of it. However, becauſe the town was unwall'd, and he was to expect, if he lay there open and careleſly refreſhing himſelf, while his ſoldiers were ſcatter'd about in queſt of proviſions, he might eaſily be ſurpriz'd, without ſome good orders and directions given before they fell to reſt and repaſt, he iſſued forth, at his entrance, a proclamation, that none ſhould ſtraggle twenty-ſcore yards from the town, without leave of an officer, and then go upon their guard, with fit weapon and company. He then made ſome ſtrong barricadoes; planted a good watch in proper ſtations, and a ſtrong corps de garde in the market-place, that others might, in ſafety, bring together ſuch booty as the inhabitants had left behind.

THUS, having refreſhed and repoſed themſelves all night, the next morning, being the twenty-ſecond of September, even before break of day, they diſcover'd, bearing in with full ſail towards the road of Fayal, the earl of Eſſex and his fleet; he having been, all this while, making a kind of wild-gooſe chaſe after Indian fleets, and the Adelantado, who, it ſeems, never ſtirr'd out to ſea this year; with other-like uncertain adventures. Now, Sir Guilly Merrick, Sir Chriſtopher Blount, Sir Anthony Shirley, and ſome other fatal friends and cheriſhers of the earl's infirmities, ſoon interrupted, by their aggravating and diſtorted repreſentations, all Ralegh's further intentions to ſecure the iſland. They preſently poſſeſs'd his lordſhip's head, that Ralegh had taken this opportunity to play over his parts, and ſhew the world how well he could act the conqueror, only to ſteal honour and reputation from the general; and they knew the earl's temper was as ready, as tinder, to catch fire at the leaſt ſpark of any ſuch ſuggeſtion: for, as no man alive was a more paſſionate courtier of fame, or more deſirous to be reputed matchleſs for magnanimity and enterprize; ſo none was more jealous of rivals than Eſſex, or could leſs endure that any man ſhould obſcure his glory, how highly ſoever he might otherwiſe be in his favour.[b] But in divers other diſagreeable colours, this gallant action was further diſfigur'd to the earl, as the contempt and violation of authority; from whence they infus'd, that the preſumption of landing ſuch forces without his lordſhip's leave, was not to be paſs'd over without ſevere puniſhment; and that it was fit a court-marſhal ſhould be call'd, to cenſure the offence and breach of order and diſcipline. In ſhort, the unpardonable crime was, that Ralegh dar'd to render himſelf more conſpicuous than any body elſe. And he had been leſs culpable, had he been leſs ſucceſsful; they ſeeming rather willing to have endur'd blame for any ill ſucceſs which might have occurr'd to him by their abſence and reſtraint of aid, than allow of any praiſe for his being victorious without them. Nay, there were not wanting ſome, among Eſſex's commanders, who would needs ſhew the violence of their zeal for his lordſhip in ſuch extreams, as to throw out, that Ralegh was well worthy of loſing his head for his labour. All which might well inſpire thoſe ſolid and durable expoſures which he has, in ſeveral places, made of ſuch envious and inſolent uſage.[c]

ESSEX,

[a] In a brief relation of the ſeveral voyages undertaken in perſon by, or at the charge of George Clifford, earl of Cumberland; gather'd by Purchas into his fourth volume: we have it affirm'd, page 1143, that in 1589 the earl took this town; that he ſhipped, from the platform, 58 pieces of iron ordnance; and that he had a ranſom paid him of 2000 ducats, moſtly in church-plate: but the fortification, which he raz'd, was now new-built, and more ſtrongly fortify'd, being the high fort on the hill, by which Ralegh made his dangerous paſſage, as is above related.

[b] "And that this is true (continues Sir A. Gorges) "thoſe who underſtood his humour beſt, cannot juſtly "deny; which, I proteſt, I do not ſpeak either out of "any neglect of one that is dead, or to pick thanks of "any that lives; but ſimply out of a reſolution to write "an impartial truth, or elſe be ſilent. For thoſe ſpi"rits that baſe flattery or ſervile fear doth tranſport, in "faſhioning their hiſtories, are, of all others, to be re"puted the unworthieſt and moſt pernicious in a well pol"icy'd commonwealth; for we ſee that thoſe heathens "who have written the Stories of Cyrus, Pyrrhus, Alexan"der, Hannibal, Scipio, Ceſar, and all other great kings "and renowned heroes, do as well tax them for their "vices, as glorify them for their virtues: for who lives "without fault? And ſo ſincerely and boldly do they fol"low the truth in their writings, that they are thereby "freed from malice or revenge, becauſe they are free "from all partiality; or, if any ſpleen ariſe, yet it is ſe"cret; for the proſecution of ſuch ſincerity, is reputed mere "impiety in all ſorts, and flat tyranny in princes. And, "to conclude; this impotent humour of enduring ri"vality, and other mens praiſes, is very incident to men in "high places; eſpecially, if they are of great courage, "or tickled with ambition."

[c] "There are multitudes of men (ſays Ralegh) eſpe"cially of thoſe that follow the war, who both envy "and malign others, if they perform any praiſe-worthy "actions for the honour and ſafety of their own country, "tho' themſelves may be aſſured to bear a part of the "ſmart of contrary ſucceſs; and ſuch malicious hearts "can rather be contented that their prince and country "ſhould ſuffer hazard and want, than that ſuch men as they "miſlike ſhould be the authors or actors of any glory or good "to either." Hiſt. of the World, lib. 2. cap. 13. ſect. 5. And in another place he has this reflexion — "In "actions which promiſe either publick glory or private "honour,

Essex, thus exaſperated, ſpent all the forenoon in reprehending, diſplacing and confining all the land-captains and officers who accompanied Ralegh; whilſt he, expecting rather thanks, than ſuch a perverſe interpretation of his ſervices, made ready his barge to go on board the general and guide him to the land. But, being entered his ſhip, he found all mens countenances eſtranged as he paſſed through them; and when he came to his cabbin, the earl, after a faint welcome, began to accuſe him with "the breach of order and articles." Ralegh anſwer'd, "he knew not wherein he had been guilty of ſuch breach." Eſſex replied, "there was an article "that none ſhould land any of the troops without the general's preſence, or his order." Ralegh deſired leave to defend himſelf by thoſe laws which himſelf as well as others had made, and his lordſhip, with the council of war, had authoriz'd; then he ſhould find that no miſdemeanor had been committed. "For, ſaid he, there is an article indeed, that no captain of any ſhip, "or of any company, if he be ſeparated from the fleet, ſhall land any-where without direc-"tion from the general, or ſome other principal commander, upon pain of death. But I take "my ſelf, ſaid Ralegh, to be a principal commander under your lordſhip, and therefore not ſub-"ject to that article, nor under the power of the marſhal-law; becauſe a ſucceſſive commander "of the whole fleet, in her majeſty's letters patents, your lordſhip and my lord Thomas Howard "failing. Beſides, you agreed I ſhould land at this iſland with your lordſhip, whom I have "attended theſe four days; and, finding that you came not, tho' you were half a dozen leagues "before me in your way thither, I weighed anchor, and could not but conclude, both that you "thought me ſtrong enough to take this iſland, and were gone your ſelf to take in ſome others. "Yet I refrained ſo long from landing, at Sir Guilly Merrick's entreaty, that I heard my "own company, even at my back, murmur; and ſay that I durſt not attempt it. And, to "tell you the plain truth, my intent, at firſt, was only to water, till I ſaw them follow me in "that braving manner; which, with our reputations, we could not then ſhun and giver over, "being already in our boats for that purpoſe: for, if I had intended the taking of the town, "I would never have removed ſo far from our firſt road, which lay right before it." As for thoſe officers and gentlemen who had been committed, Ralegh deſired "they might receive no "hard meaſure in his cauſe; whatſoever his lordſhip conceived to be miſdone, he muſt take it "wholly on himſelf to anſwer, being, at that time, commander in chief."

Accuſed.

His juſtification.

With theſe and other arguments Eſſex was ſo well pacified, that he went aſhore into the town, and reſted himſelf in Ralegh's lodging. There Ralegh invited him to ſupper, and offer'd, if he meant to call the matter further in queſtion, to claim no privilege or favour; but would anſwer for himſelf more amply in the morning. Sir Chriſtopher Blount, taking the earl's anſwer from him, ſaid, "he thought my lord would not ſup at all." To which Ralegh reply'd, "That, "for his own appetite, he might, when he was invited, diſable it at his own pleaſure; but if the "earl would ſtay, he ſhould be glad of his company." In the mean time, the lord Thomas Howard, very nobly taking care that no diſreſpectful treatment ſhould be offer'd to Ralegh, by the practice of his enemies, dealt with Eſſex to find how he ſtood reſolved; and, the next morning, aſſured Ralegh, that his lordſhip ſought only ſome acknowledgment; becauſe the reſt would think him a weak and tame commander, if he had not ſatisfaction. Ralegh, conſidering he had done nothing unjuſtifiable, and very certain that he was ſucceſſively in the commiſſion for the whole command of the fleet, therefore not ſubject to any corporal danger, as alſo of the lord Thomas Howard's ſincere and honourable dealing, came again in the morning to viſit Eſſex: otherwiſe, remembering the little truſt that men ought to repoſe in ſuch reconciliations, and the ſtrong malice borne him by others in greateſt favour with his lordſhip, had deſign'd to betake him to his own ſquadron; and ſo to have defended himſelf, or forſaken the earl. But the lord Thomas, after having given his honour with great kindneſs and reſolution, that he would make himſelf a party if any wrong or violence were offered, [a] contrary to his lordſhip's pro-

"honour, men may be reaſonably perſuaded to adventure "life and living, becauſe great hope there is to die with "reputation, or live to recover that peace which war hath "conſum'd: but, where men are no leſs oppreſs'd by "inſolency of commanders, than by inſolency of foes, "there is the calamity double; and, of two evils, the "danger of war ſeems leaſt; for that has end, the other "is infinite." Sir W. Ralegh's Arts of Empire, and Myſteries of State diſcabinated, 8vo. 1692. p. 182.

[a] Sir Francis Vere ſays, that every one being to deliver his opinion of Ralegh's crime, it was grievouſly aggravated by the moſt: And adds; "for my part, no man "ſhew'd leſs ſpleen againſt him than my ſelf." Which laſt expreſſion may imply a truth in relation to himſelf, by granting, that he ſhewed Ralegh ſome ſpleen; yet a falſhood, in regard to others; becauſe, as here we ſee, the lord Thomas Howard was ſo far from bearing Ralegh any ſpleen, that he reſolved to take his part againſt any injury that ſhould be offer'd upon this occaſion.

miſe, perſuading him to go and ſatisfy the earl, Ralegh took his counſel; and all things, after a little debate, came to a calm and quiet concluſion.[a]

THE promoters of this diſturbance, however thus diſappointed of their end, ſcrupled not to ſhare in the benefits of this reproved victory, by lodging and refreſhing themſelves not only that night, but three or four days after, in the goodly town aforeſaid; yet were they juſtly puniſh'd for their envy and ingratitude. For, had that time which they ſpent in carping and cavilling at Ralegh's conduct, throughout this brave action, been employ'd, according to his meaſures, in purſuing it; the birds, which thereby they ſuffer'd to fly out of their cage, had well rewarded their unanimity in taking them; and they would not have loſt, as now they had, the ranſom of ſo many Spaniſh priſoners out of the high fort; nor the ſpoil which they had convey'd out of the town for ſafety to that place: ſo that inſtead of aſſiſtance to advance the profit of this conqueſt, Eſſex's arrival brought only means, as far as in them lay, to deſtroy the honour of it.

AFTER the army had plentifully regaled themſelves with the beſt proviſions the iſland would afford, and the diſgrac'd captains were receiv'd again into favour and command, they hoiſted ſail; having firſt, in honour of their loſt men, made the town it ſelf their funeral pile, and carried all the artillery, and other ſtores they found therein, or in the forts, to their ſhips. On the 26th of September, they caſt anchor at Gracioſa, where the chiefs of the iſland coming on board the general, ſubmitted themſelves with very acceptable humiliation, and willingly brought ſuch proviſions as were requir'd for their compoſition. This homage of thoſe people baniſh'd all thoughts in the earl of further repairing, in that place, the great charges he principally had created by this voyage: for, whether it was through a generous valour, or the captivation of ſome inferior quality, I pretend not to decide; but he ſeemed ſo charm'd with ſubmiſſion, as to have diſregarded the advantages it might have yielded; and fonder of having a power over his enemies, than of making any effectual uſe of it. When they came to St. Michael's, they heard tidings of the Indian fleet; at which, moſt joyful acclamations rung through all their ſhips: within few hours after, they encounter'd and took three Spaniſh prizes, bound from the Havanna. The greateſt of them, being about four hundred tons burden, was a very rich ſhip, as well for the lading, as the paſſengers in her; and this, if not the other two, was taken by Ralegh; who, being neareſt, gave chace, cauſed her to ſtrike and to yield. Theſe three ſhips, eſpecially the laſt, were laden with cocheneal, and other profitable merchandize, beſides the ſilver, gold, pearl, civit, musk, ambergreaſe, found among the paſſengers, and acknowledg'd, by the merchants in them, to be richly worth above four hundred thouſand ducats. When Ralegh had enquir'd, from the gallery of his own ſhip, of thoſe who had computed the value of theſe commodities, and been ſatisfy'd it would at leaſt amount to that ſum, he privately ſaid to our author; "Altho' we ſhall be little the better for theſe rich "prizes, yet I am heartily glad, for our general's ſake; becauſe they will, in great mea- "ſure, give content to her majeſty; ſo that there may be no repining againſt this poor lord "for the expence of the voyage." Theſe ſhips made a diſcovery of forty ſail of Spaniſh Indiamen, whereof ſome were freighted with the king of Spain's treaſure; and it was reported, that while three or four of the Engliſh fleet, which were fallen among them, were rifling one that founder'd, the reſt eſcaped, and recover'd the Tercera. Eſſex, upon this miſchance, call'd a council of war; and ſome of the colonels, with other land-officers, made liberal profeſſions of the daring feats they would attempt, if boats, pinnaces and men were allow'd, how vain and impracticable ſoever they ſeem'd to the ſea-commanders. For they offer'd, with fifteen hundred men, to take both that iſland and the forts; but theſe, knowing the difficulty of landing them, with their artillery, on ſo dangerous a place, in ſo bad a ſeaſon; beſides the ſtrength of the fortifications, ſo well furniſh'd by this new arrival, could not, cordially and ſeriouſly, give their conſent, but urged many reaſons to the contrary;[b] yet, when the lord Thomas Howard perceived this incompliance would be uſed as a handle at home for their loſing the Spaniſh fleet

The town fir'd.

Three Spaniſh prizes taken.

[a] Sir Henry Wotton, having given us one example of Eſſex's ſeverity in this voyage, where he threw a ſoldier, with his own hand, out of a ſhip; produces another of his facility, as he calls it, in conniving at this bold treſpaſs of Ralegh's: At which time he let fall (continues he) a noble word, being preſs'd by one (whoſe name he needs not remember) that he would put Ralegh, at leaſt, upon a marſhal-court. That I would do, anſwer'd Eſſex, if he were not my friend; for ſo we have it in the firſt editions of Sir Henry's Parallel, both in 4*to* and 12*mo*; but in the ſucceeding editions 8*vo*, we read, as I remember, Eſſex's anſwer to be, That I would do, if he were my friend; which laſt, if the right reading, being ſtill perhaps capable of more conſtructions than my author has made of it, according to the diſpoſition of the readers towards the perſons concern'd, I therefore leave to their paraphraſe.

[b] Tho' our author Gorges, for brevity, omits theſe reaſons; yet they may be partly gather'd from the obſervations Ralegh himſelf afterwards made on the ſtrength of the Tercera, badneſs of the harbour, number of the forts, and eſpecially the ſituation of that at Angra; in his Hiſt. of the World, lib. 5. cap. 1. ſect. 9 and 10.

and treaſure, he told Eſſex, that if he was ſo forward to have it attempted, both himſelf and Sir Walter Ralegh were ready to venture as far as any of them; and that they would undertake to ſpare three thouſand able men out of the fleet for the ſervice: but this ſecond offer, thus abſolutely and ſolemnly made, tho' of double the number, cool'd their courage, upon a little deliberation, who had made even the firſt; and ſo the vapour was diſpell'd.

HENCE they return'd again to St. Michael's iſland, which they had left upon the intelligence aforeſaid; and in this road Eſſex, with a great number of his officers, coming on board Ralegh's ſhip, hung out the flag of council; wherein they conſider'd about landing, and taking of the fair town which lay ſo temptingly before their eyes, being unwall'd, and having but a ſlight fort for its defence by the ſea-ſide. Eſſex was for landing all the companies immediately; but Ralegh deſired that himſelf might firſt go and ſurvey the place; becauſe the billows were here, in ſome parts, no leſs dangerous than where he had made the experiment at Fayal: the earl, at firſt, conſented; but, as Ralegh was putting off, Eſſex ſtanding in his gallery with Sir Chriſtopher Blount, called him back in great haſte, and ſaid he would go himſelf. As he was deſcending into his barge, Ralegh, ſeeing him altogether unarm'd, except with his collar and ſword, called aloud to him, and "deſired him to take his cask and target of proof with him, if he de-"ſigned to approach the ſhore; ſeeing ſo many muskets (above four hundred) lying there on "the reſt to oppoſe him." But Eſſex anſwer'd, "That he would have none, becauſe he diſ-"dain'd to take any advantage of the watermen who rowed him;" for which our author cenſures him,[a] as he had before done Sir Walter Ralegh. However, in viewing of thoſe landing-places, Eſſex and his officers kept cautiouſly enough beyond the reach even of culverin-ſhot; therefore, no ſuch temerity in leaving the armour behind. Thus, after many offers and ſurveys, made aloof (ſays Gorges) the conveniencies of that place for landing were excepted againſt. "Al-"beit, adds he, in truth it was a fair and ſandy beach (as all the fleet might well perceive) was "ſome four or five miles from the town or fort, and much more eaſy than that of Fayal, where "we before won our landing: and that this was true, many now living that were preſent, and "ſaw both, can juſtly affirm." Yet our author proceeds to diſtinguiſh, that the earl was reſolute enough of himſelf, and ready to undertake any good occaſion of ſervice; but "was then "ſo led and accompanied with ſuch politick land-captains, that, of all the ſervices which fell "under deliberation, thoſe commonly, which were moſt unfeaſible, were offer'd to be under-"taken, and thoſe moſt practicable rejected; whereby our affairs (ſays he) ſped accordingly.

THIS deſcent being thus diſliked, it was preſently, in another conſultation, reſolv'd, that Ralegh ſhould, with all the great ſhips, lie as near before the town of St. Michael as he could to keep them in continual alarm; while Eſſex, in a pinnace of Ralegh's, call'd the Guiana, with about two thouſand men in boats, ſhould, by night, convey themſelves about ſix miles further than their firſt determin'd landing, to the town called Villa Franca. Accordingly, they all landed the next morning at this town, without any manner of reſiſtance, while the fleet kept the other in ſuch conſtant dread and confuſion, that they could not regard their neighbours; to the end that the Engliſh army, having ſecured thoſe, might the better fall on the back of theſe. But in vain did the fleet look over the hills and plains, in expectation of them; for that other pleaſant town of Villa Franca, had ſo enchanted the army, being full of fruits, wines, and freſh victuals, that the commanders, as well as their ſoldiers, were content there to take up their quarters, without further thoughts of St. Michael's town; and, for ſix days together, lay feaſting, and carrying on board the wheat, ſalt, woad, and other merchandize, into certain private mens ſhips that followed the fleet for ſuch purpoſes. While Ralegh lay thus at anchor, there came into the road a ſhip of Braſil laden with the woods of that name, and of Fernambuc, with ſugars as well as other merchandize; and anchor'd full in the midſt of the Engliſh fleet. This ſhip, as Sir Francis Vere alſo informs us, was taken by Sir Walter Ralegh;[b] and her cargo, when brought into England, was very faithfully diſpos'd of by our author, Gorges, to defray the expences of all the men in Ralegh's own ſhip, to the number of four hundred, reckoning ſoldiers as well as mariners. Soon after, a huge carrack, of eighteen hundred ton burden, and infinite wealth, ſays Gorges, being laden with the riches of the eaſt and

[a] "In my opinion (ſays Gorges) tho' that anſwer "much ſhewed his valour; yet became it not the place "that my lord held: for, in truth, a general ought "not to be ſo adventurous and careleſs of himſelf upon "every ſlight occaſion, nor to go unarm'd to places of "imminent peril. Homer deſcribes the valiant heroes and "brave leaders of the Greeks, to be beſt arm'd; as "Achilles, Ajax, &c. — Inſomuch that their very arms "are famous to theſe days, the uſe whereof we make "now ſcornful. But they are no beaten ſoldiers in the "wars who hold theſe opinions; for it is truly ſaid, That "a great and wiſe general ſhould die old; and I have "read, that Epaminondas was fin'd by his countrymen "the Thebans, for being too forward and ſerving in a "battle unarm'd, tho' he won the victory."

weſt, came bearing in with all her ſails, alſo among them; whom ſhe miſtook for the Spaniſh Armada; "For the king of Spain's men of war, when he made fleets, were "compounded of ſhipping of divers nations (as this author continues) and therefore more "difficultly diſtinguiſh'd from ours,[a] which at that time conſiſted of Engliſh and Holland "bottoms, beſides a great galleon (before-nam'd) and other Spaniſh veſſels they had taken." At ſight of this carrack, Ralegh gave orders throughout his fleet to take in all their flags; alſo that none ſhould weigh anchor, fire a gun, or put off a boat without leave. But, as ſhe was bearing in, one of the Holland ſquadron, contrary to direction and to all diſcretion, ſuddenly weighed anchor, hoiſted top-ſail, and, as ſhe approach'd, made two or three ſhot at her; whereupon, perceiving her miſtake, ſhe nimbly changed her courſe; at which inſtant, the wind changing alſo, ſo that ſhe could not eſcape outwards; "ſhe, with the help thereof, and the "fear of falling into our hands, ſays Gorges, run herſelf a-ground cloſe under the town and "fort." Here, finding Ralegh follow her, and her danger inevitable, ſhe diſcharg'd her men in the boats that flock'd about her, with ſome of her wares, and was then inſtantly ſet on fire in many places at once. Ralegh and his men ſtill purſued to board her, and prevent her loſs; tho' not without great danger in his row-barge as he was, the ſurge being very outrageous; but by then he could get up to her, ſhe was all over thunder and lightning; her ordnance diſcharging from every port, and her whole hulk, maſts, cordage, and furniture, over-run with ſuch a thorough, yet diſtinct and unconfus'd blaze, as repreſented the figure of a ſhip more perfectly in fire, than could be done by any painter with all his art and colours: and, when ſhe was conſumed even to the ſurface of the water, ſhe exhal'd, as her laſt breath, ſuch clouds from her ſpicy entrails, as, for a great way, and for many hours, perfum'd the air and coaſt around. Had the army then been at St. Michael's town, as was expected, it might have ſecured this ſhip before ſhe could have diſembark'd her men, or, if it had terrify'd her back to ſea, ſhe muſt have been taken by the fleet; and then the treaſures ſhe contain'd, with thoſe in this town, might probably have reimburſed the charges of their voyage; ſince our author, laying this loſs upon the ſaid land-forces, thought it ſo much to be lamented, that they were not to be excuſed.[b]

A rich carrack fir'd.

NEITHER Eſſex nor his army being heard of in all this time, Ralegh was in a conſultation about drawing up the fleet towards him, when he perceiv'd the earl's ſhip, by her flag, turning out from the point of Villa Franca. Then Ralegh, taking captain Morgan in his barge, rowed to him, and, the ſame night, ſent the captain back with directions, in the general's name, to command all the fleet to weigh and come to that town. It much grieved the mariners, to ſee the unprofitable meaſures which were thus taken, and that they muſt relinquiſh the advantages they might have made of the town before which they lay. When the fleet was got up to the army at Villa Franca, a general command was given that all the companies ſhould repair to their reſpective ſhips, for the time of year was approached that the winds and waves began to riſe too high for them to ride on thoſe coaſts any longer: ſo they left this town alſo entire, upon what conſiderations our author knew not, but thought the woad-mongers and corn-merchants might be moſt likely to reſolve the queſtion.

His dangers and diſtreſs in returning home.

ON the ninth of October they ſet ſail for England, and, after three or four days, were violently toſs'd about and diſpers'd in a moſt tempeſtuous ſea. Ralegh's ſhip was near being ſtemm'd by the ſhock ſhe received from another that was driven againſt her, whereby ſhe became ſo leaky, that he had much ado to keep her above water. He was further in ſuch great

[a] Sir Walter Ralegh, in his diſcourſe touching a war with Spain, and our protection of the Netherlands, has diſcover'd many other diſadvantages in the Spaniſh fleets of theſe times, through this medley of ſhipping whereof they were compos'd; as the diverſity of conduct and ſwiftneſs in them, whereby they could not either aſſail or defend in groſs as the Engliſh or Dutch could. Alſo the confuſion among their mariners, of ſo many different countries, and conſequently languages; ſo as not to underſtand directions, and take them in general, or even miſtake them, to the loſs of their ſhip: beſides, being of ſuch ſtrange nations, unconcern'd in the quarrels they were forced into, they fought with their hands, but not their hearts; and deſir'd liberty rather than victory. See Ralegh's Three diſcourſes, 8vo. 1702. p. 13, 14.

[b] "For (as Sir A. Gorges continues) no good reaſon could "be yielded, as was thought, nor durſt be demanded, "why ſo gallant a company, ſo eaſily landed, for ſo good "a purpoſe, ſhould ſo long linger in a little town, ſur-"feiting themſelves and the whole army upon fruits and "wine, to the neglect of the ſervice determin'd? But it "was manifeſt, that, beſides their pleaſure and good cheer, "the great ſtore of woad, corn and ſalt, did entice ſome "land-men of good credit, who had ſhips there of their "own, rather to take the peaceable and private benefit "thereof, than to undergo ſome pain and peril for the "winning of St. Michael's town for the publick good. "This was a piece of ſervice very unfortunately neglect-"ed, but upon what good reaſon I could never learn; "and I am perſuaded, that if his lordſhip had built leſs "upon ſome mens violent counſels and vain conceits, he "might have done many things better, and long have "lived in great proſperity: but all his care was to content "and win unto him certain politicians and martial-men, "whom, notwithſtanding, he found many times ungrate-"fully to deal with him, to ſerve their own turns; draw-"ing him, withal, into ambitious humours and affecta-"tions of popularity; which, with our great men, rarely "ſucceed well.

diſtreſs for want of drink, that Sir Arthur Gorges proffer'd one of the victuallers ſix cheſts of ſugar for ſix hogſheads of freſh water, but could not obtain it: inſomuch that they were forced to ſet their great ſtills on work to furniſh themſelves in the beſt manner they could. During this ſtorm, 'tis alſo obſerved, many ſorts of birds flew into his ſhip; and the dove, that came among them, was look'd upon to preſage the calm that enſued two days after. When they began to meet again, they deſcry'd, at a great diſtance, the earl of Eſſex, accompanied with only two little barks; who, about a week before, was attended with fourſcore ſail of good ſhips. "A true type, ſays Gorges, of this world's inconſtant pomp, which the wind and ſeas did "faithfully teach us not to build too much upon! And I wiſh our noble general, adds he, "for his own ſake and better fortune, had made that good obſervation thereof."

AFTER hailing and ſaluting one another, they conſulted with their maſters and pilots about the beſt courſe homewards, wherein they of Ralegh's ſhip varied much from thoſe who guided the earl's: and tho' Eſſex had the directions of John Davis, a navigator of much experience and repute, who could have carried them, without error, to many diſtant parts of the world; yet, in conducting the ſhips home to their own coaſt, did he ſtrangely fail in his pilotage and conjecture for the ſleeve. However, all follow'd the admiral, and when he thought he was not far from the entrance of the Channel, all hands fell to ſounding for ground; and, at laſt, found it; tho' indeed "I ſaw few the wiſer thereby, ſays our author, or the more aſſured of the "coaſt," except the ſkilful maſter of Ralegh's ſhip, old Broadbent, who knew it to be the "banks of Scilly." But there was no convincing of Eſſex; ſo all followed his erroneous light; yet Ralegh kept at ſome diſtance behind all night-long. At break of day, tho' it was cloſe and foggy, he perceived how providentially he had eſcaped deſtruction in the dark and dangerous paſſage he had made cloſe by thoſe fatal rocks call'd the Biſhop and his Clerks. Soon after he alſo diſcerned Eſſex, and many with him, about three leagues before, bearing in with all their ſail north-eaſt, inſtead of eaſt and by north, full upon the ſands of the Welſh coaſt; on which, in that gloomy weather, he had certainly ſtruck and periſh'd, had he held on a little longer; and had not Sir A. Gorges, who was then upon the latter watch (Ralegh being retired to reſt) forced the maſter-gunner of his ſhip to diſcharge a warning-piece three or four times, much againſt his will, and that of the maſter himſelf, who, contrary to all duty and humanity, "ſaid they deſerv'd to taſte the peril of their own wilfulneſs, having brought themſelves and "all the fleet clearly our of their way into ſuch danger.

UPON this admonition Eſſex, with all his train, ſoon tack'd about, and, afterwards, confeſs'd their error. With much ado, they beat up to double the cape of Scilly, and enter'd the Sleeve. Ralegh, by this time, was ſhot along the north-ſide of Cornwall; for his ſhip was ſo crazy, and his proviſions ſo ſcanty, he durſt not put again to ſea, but ſtood along the coaſt; and that night anchor'd before St. Ives, where he found the Corniſh people all in alarm, ſeveral Spaniſh caravals and fly-boats, which lay there, having made ſome deſcents by ſtealth, and put them into great fright and confuſion. For Eſſex, becauſe he met not with the Adelantado, had both believed and reported into England, that he never ſtirr'd out to ſea this year; whereas, indeed, while the ſtrength of the Engliſh navy lay before the Iſlands, he had ſet out with a puiſſant fleet for the invaſion of England; and theſe leſſer veſſels, which were ſent before, did here attend his coming. But that ſtorm aforeſaid, which ſo roughly ſcatter'd the Engliſh, was more favourable to their country, than, when they felt it, they imagin'd; by diſperſing, and driving back at the ſame time, this Spaniſh Armada utterly diſabled for the intended enterprize. Ralegh arriving at this juncture, gave great joy to this part of the kingdom; and, being landed, he immediately took ſuch order for the ſafeguard of the county, whereof he was her majeſty's lieutenant, as ſoon diſpell'd the fears of its inhabitants. Then, having ſupply'd his ſhip with proper neceſſaries, he ſent her round to the fleet, and ſhe was paid off at Briſtol, with the profits that aroſe from one of the prizes he had taken before-named. Had as good an account been given of the other prizes, this expedition, for all the caſualties and overſights which happen'd in it, would have return'd her majeſty double the charge ſhe had been at in ſetting it forth. "But it was ſtrange to ſee what careleſs courſes were held in thoſe actions ſet "out by the ſtate, ſays our author; and what poor returns they made into the Exchequer. "Thus, for the merchandize in the prizes now brought home, a compoſition was made with "the queen, which was not a third part of the real worth; becauſe the full freight and "value thereof never came to publick light, not being faithfully certify'd under the hands of "ſufficient officers when firſt taken; nor any part ſold, but to the buyer's advantage." He concludes, "That they, who had ſo play'd the wiſe ſtewards, in thus providing for themſelves "and their followers, reaped all the grace, as well as gain, from thoſe who had more carefully "and juſtly intended the publick ſervice: and that this general neglect of truth and merit "throughout the world, is the cauſe why ſo few apply themſelves to thoſe ſincere and unprofitable "courſes; eſpecially, ſeeing how many do daily, by fraud and flattery, find ſhorter and ſmoother "ways to honour, wealth and preferment, even beyond all meaſure and expectation."[a]

[a] This ſounding of ours, ſo much in practice, continues Sir Arthur Gorges, and yet, many times, bringing no great certainty, makes me call to mind an odd conceit and ſpeech of a Spaniſh priſoner, which the general gave me in this journey. He was a gentleman, a ſoldier, and, of late years, traded to the Weſt-Indies: with whom I one day talking and diſcourſing of their voyages (wherein he was very well experienc'd) he told me that, in their navigation from the Indies, they ſought out Spain in a more certain and gallant manner than we did England. For, ſaid he, We ſeek out our coaſt aloft with our eyes by the heavens, by the ſun or ſtars, and with the uſe of art and inſtruments, which ſeldom or never fails: But you, ſaid he, that ſeek for England, when you are forced to run into narrow ſeas, are forced, for your ſureſt directions, like men blindfold, to ſearch under the water, and ſcrape with lead and tallow to the bottom for banks, ſands, and ſhelves, as if you would rake hell for inſtructions, to find out the channel, which you call the ſleeve; and yet, for all your ſoundings, are oftentimes miſtaken. I anſwer'd him; Indeed it was true, that our humility taught us to go by the ground; whereas their pride led them to gaze above the clouds, and thereby ſo dazzled their eyes, that they often ſtumbled upon thoſe men of war which now uſed as well to ſound the Spaniſh pocket, as the Engliſh ſleeve.

RALEGH took his journey to Plymouth, where a commiſſion came down from the ſtate to lord Thomas Howard, lord Mountjoy, himſelf, and Sir F. Vere, with monies for repairing, victualling, and ſending about the fleet to Chatham; and for maintaining the thouſand Low-Country ſoldiers which were now quarter'd along the coaſt of Cornwall, and afterwards ſent into Ireland. Eſſex, in the mean while, poſted away to London; but, whatever advantage he might have in firſt ſhaping out the ſtory of their adventures to the queen, it little avail'd him; for Sir Francis Vere ſoon after arriving alſo at court, underſtood his lordſhip was retir'd to his houſe at Wanſted in great diſcontentment: for the queen was ſo incens'd againſt the earl, that ſhe laid the whole blame of their evil ſucceſs on his lordſhip, both for not burning and ſpoiling the Spaniſh fleet at Feroll, and miſſing that which came from India. Vere ſays, he juſtify'd his lordſhip, and laid the blame upon thoſe who deſerv'd it, with ſuch earneſtneſs, that the ſtanders-by (her majeſty then walking in the garden at Whitehall) might hear him: inſomuch, that he quieted the queen, as he tells us; who then diſcourſed with him of the earl's humours and ambition, and, at laſt, conſtrued all ſo graciouſly, that ſhe fell into commendation of him; ſo that he ſoon after came to court.[b] But he ſtaid not long there, nor with any eaſe or content; ſo inſupportable was it to find Cecil made maſter of the wards, the lord-admiral Howard

[a] Thus ends Sir Arthur Gorges's accurate relation of the Iſland-Voyage; concerning whom, as ſome ſmall return of commemoration, it may not be ungrateful here to join a few diſperſed particulars, as follows. He was the ſon of Sir William Gorges, who, about the year 1580, was vice-admiral in a fleet ſet out by the queen to guard the Iriſh coaſt from the Spaniſh forces then coming to aid the Deſmonds: In his return, he took that famous Engliſh pirate Derivall; who, tho' he ſaved the admiral, Sir John Perrot's life, his ſhip, with all her crew, when in a ſtorm ſhe was caſt upon a ſand; by directing all her ſails to be hoiſted, contrary to all other judgments; and had the admiral's promiſe, on his faith and honour, to get his pardon, who did intercede for it; yet were his deſerts over-look'd, and his offences puniſhed with death. As to that vice-admiral's ſon Arthur, he was both a valiant and a learned gentleman; was one of the voluntiers againſt the Spaniſh Invaſion, as we have before obſerved, and afterwards in ſeveral other engagements. He married Douglas Howard, daughter and heir of Henry lord Howard, viſcount Byndon; which lady dying young in 1591, the famous Spenſer wrote a fine paſtoral elegy upon her, which is printed among his works, by the name of Daphnaida; and the poet, in his dedication thereof to the lady Helena, marchioneſs of Northampton, tells her, "The occaſion why "I wrote the ſame was, as well the great good fame I "heard of her deceas'd, as the particular good-will I bear "unto her husband, maſter Arthur Gorges, a lover of "learning and virtue; whoſe houſe as your ladyſhip, by "marriage, hath honoured; ſo do I find the name of "them, by many notable records, to be of great antiquity, "and ſuch as have ever borne themſelves with honourable "reputation to the world, and unſpotted loyalty to their "prince and country. Beſides, ſo lineally deſcended from "the Howards, that the lady Anne Howard, eldeſt daugh-"ter of John duke of Norfolk, was wife to Sir Ed-"mund, mother to Sir Edward, and grandmother to "Sir William and Sir Thomas Gorges, knights." Now, as to the relation of this voyage to the iſles of Azores, in which Sir A. Gorges was captain of Sir Walter Ralegh's ſhip, tho' we are not expreſly enough told by Purchas, it was printed before he gave it us in his collections; yet he ſays it was written by Sir Arthur in 1607, and dedicated to that great hope of Great-Britain, prince Henry. He has omitted the epiſtle to him, and the preface; but not defalked any of the author's narrative, which fills near eight ſheets of paper in his fourth volume of voyages. It is adorn'd with many good military and marine reflections; tho', with ſome other paſſages, of too general import to be interwoven in any particular account of Sir Walter Ralegh. Purchas further informs us, that Gorges alſo added to this treatiſe, Notes touching the navy royal, "which are worth the noting, "ſays he; but perhaps not to be permitted to every vul-"gar and noteleſs eye: becauſe, as he goes on, veritas "odium parit; Pains may cauſe pains, and buſy-labour "reap the reward of a buſy-body." From hence it ſhould ſeem that Purchas followed a copy leſs common than any thing which had then paſſed the preſs. But, tho' Sir W. Ralegh might have read it in MS. I cannot think it is this he points at; where, introducing his own account of the conqueſt of Fayal, which we have given in a note before; he ſays, "Whereas I find an action of mine cited with omiſ-"ſion of my name, I may, by a civil interpretation, "think that there was no purpoſe to defraud me of any "honour; but rather an opinion that the enterprize was "ſuch, or ſo ill manag'd, as that no honour could be due "unto it:" Becauſe, as Mr. Lediard has very juſtly obſerved, "Sir A. Gorges, in the circumſtantial account "he has given us of this action, diſplays the conduct and "courage of Sir W. Ralegh in ſeveral particulars, very "much to his honour and advantage." Naval Exped. fol. 356. Then, as to his name, Gorges mentions it more than once, and at the beginning, with his title of command to it: ſo that tho' he may uſe this only all the way after, it is, in effect, as much as if he uſed his name; for it is then obvious enough who is meant by the rear-admiral. Nor need we ſuppoſe Gorges was herein tender or cautious of making Ralegh's name appear too glaring, when his perſon was under a cloud; for Eſſex and the lord Thomas Howard are ſpoken of in the like manner, and ſcarcely mention'd but by their titles of general and vice-admiral. Beſides Ralegh's own word, that the action was only cited, muſt refer to ſome other ſhorter account than this original and copious hiſtory of it. All I ſhall obſerve more of Sir A. Gorges is, that he tranſlated into Engliſh Sir Francis Bacon's learned and ingenious book, De Sapientia Veterum.

created earl of Nottingham, for his ſervices againſt the Spaniſh Invaſion, and at Cadiz; and now Ralegh's actions at the Iſlands, eſteem'd alſo more conſiderable than his own; tho' indeed by the fewer number; for the populace were eaſily led to believe the late diſappointment of Eſſex's great expectations, was owing to Ralegh's regard of his own glory more than that of his country; whereby Ralegh loſt their opinion, even tho' victorious againſt their enemies, while Eſſex was ſure to return with triumph, however he miſcarried in his attempts; and was always received by them with ſuch joy, as if his great fleets and armies came laden with ſufficient ſpoil and conqueſt, if they only brought him ſafe home again. Still both enjoy'd a liberal ſhare in the queen's favour, but it only ratify'd the veneration of the multitude to one, and their diſaffection to the other,[a] yet was their eſteem more fatal to Eſſex, at leaſt more ſpeedily ſo, than their prejudice to Ralegh. However, the queen was little influenc'd with their partiality to either; till Eſſex too zealouſly cultivated that which ſo unreaſonably increas'd in his favour; for ſhe loved her people without jealouſy, nor was offended at his being the darling of their eyes, till ſhe found him inclin'd to be the darling of their hearts.[b] And, as for the blame which Camden ſays they now laid on each other of the late miſadventures, and which, he informs us, grew to a more open rupture, it ſeems to have fallen moſt upon Eſſex, and that Ralegh's conduct was approv'd; becauſe Eſſex was never after truſted with the command of any naval expedition, but Ralegh was. Yet whatever miſconduct in others Ralegh might be now driven to object, in his own defence; his generoſity to Eſſex, and ſome of his followers, whom he might have laid it upon, many years after their death, when there was little fear of being controverted, is ſo much above moſt of theirs to him while they were alive, that, having then occaſion to mention this voyage, he does not drop the leaſt inuendo againſt any of them; but aſcribes their diſappointments in it to the moſt unblamable cauſe.[c]

How received by the populace.

Before Ralegh could well arrive, I think, at London, to give an account of this expedition, the parliament was met at Weſtminſter; for we read, that the queen went thither in an open chariot, all cover'd over-head canopy-wiſe with ſilver tiſſue, and begun the ſeſſion on the twenty-fourth of October this year. Ralegh, making but a ſhort ſtay in town, went to his ſeat at Sherbourn; of which he muſt have had but little enjoyment for two or three years paſt. Towards the latter end of November following, we find Mr. Adrian Gilbert, now a burgeſs for Bridport in Dorſetſhire, obtain'd licence of the ſpeaker that he might retire to his brother Sir Walter Ralegh, in that county, for the benefit of his health. About a month afterwards, that is, on the twentieth of December, we meet with Ralegh in the houſe; for what place return'd, I find not; and that day the parliament was adjourn'd till the eleventh of January. When they met again, Ralegh appears frequently in committees, upon ſeveral bills of the greateſt conſequence that were then read; as that againſt lewd and wandering perſons pretending to be ſoldiers or mariners; another for an act to increaſe people for the ſervice and ſtrength of the realm; one to explain an act for the maintenance of the navy; one for paying the queen's debts; one for erecting houſes of correction and puniſhment of rogues, vagabonds, and ſturdy beggars; beſides many others, whoſe titles are more proper to be ſought in the parliamentary-journals of this reign, than here barely to be recited: for the clerk of this houſe, whoſe inaccuracy we have before obſerv'd, ſeeming to have melted down moſt of the ſpeeches in this ſeſſion, for brevity, into a narrative of its proceedings, little or nothing of Sir Walter Ralegh's arguments is to be particularly extracted. Nor only in the ſpeeches, but other circumſtances, has that clerk been deficient, particularly one, in which Ralegh was concern'd, relating to ſome nice diſtinction of form or ceremony wherewith the lords are wont to receive the commons on certain occaſions; which therefore we muſt take, as from the journals of the upper houſe it has been repreſented; and there it appears, that ſome condeſcenſion in the lord-keeper Egerton had raiſed an objection in the commons on its being now omitted. For, on the fourteenth day of January, Sir Walter Ralegh, with divers other knights and burgeſſes, being ſent to deſire a conference with the lords, upon ſome amendments of the bill for erecting houſes of correction beforemention'd; and ſignification being given, that they might come in to receive their anſwer, it was thought proper that the lord-keeper ſhould now deliver it ſitting in his place (the lords alſo ſitting) and not by going down to the bar, as the form is when the lords receive bills or meſ-

[c] "That the diſſevering of fleets hath been the overthrow of many actions, I could give many examples (ſays Ralegh) were it not in every man's knowledge. In the laſt enterprize of worth, undertaken by our Engliſh nation with three ſquadrons of ſhips, commanded by the earl of Eſſex, the earl of Suffolk (who was lord Thomas Howard) and myſelf, where was alſo preſent the earl of Southampton; if we, being ſtorm-beaten in the bay of Alcaſtar, or Biſcay, had a port under our lee, that we might have kept our tranſporting-ſhips with our men of war, we had, in all likelihood taken the Indian fleet and the Azores." ſages

ſages from them; and as the lord-keeper had ſometimes before done, it ſeems, in delivering anſwers. This reception being repreſented to the houſe of commons, they ſent ſome other members to deſire ſatisfaction, as for an innovation derogatory to their liberty. Here Sir Walter Ralegh's part in this difference ending, we ſhall refer our readers to an abſtract of its conſequence at the foot of the page,[a] that too much interruption may not appear in the thread of his ſtory; and only obſerve, as to the remainder of this ſeſſion, that it was clos'd with a grant to the queen of three ſubſidies, and ſix fifteenths and tenths.[b]

The parliament being diſſolv'd on the ninth of February, Ralegh ſeems not to have reſided long in town; for, ſoon after, ſome regulations being made for the publick good of thoſe people over whom he preſided, by his offices of power, in the Weſt of England, we find him celebrated, for his exerciſe thereof among them, as a very worthy patriot in ſeveral inſtances. The lord Burghley is mention'd in one of them, who died about ſix months after the ſaid parliament broke up, that is to ſay, in Auguſt 1598; therefore we muſt here relate it, as occurring before this time. It concern'd the reſtoration of certain manors to their ancient tenure in Cornwall; for there are ſeventeen appertaining to that dutchy, which took or renew'd their Holdings, as they call it, every ſeven years of certain commiſſioners, for near three centuries paſt; whereby the tenants reckon'd a kind of inheritable eſtate, accruing to them. But, notwithſtanding this long preſcription, a bold and buſy perſon in theſe times, getting an Exchequer-leaſe of one or two ſuch tenements, called the whole right in queſtion; but, failing of ſucceſs, another, ſoon after, reſumed the broken title, and proſecuted it even to a Niſi prius. Hereupon, the tenants deputed certain gentlemen, among whom was the author of this paſſage, Richard Carew of Anthony Eſq; one of the deputy-lieutenants of the county, to repair to London with a petition to the ſaid lord-treaſurer Burghley; who, calling to him the chancellor and barons of the Exchequer, found (beſides this long continuance, and the importance thereof, as touching the ruin of above a thouſand inhabitants) that her majeſty poſſeſſed no lands which yielded her ſo fair a benefit as theſe, in rents, fines, heriots, and other perquiſites. Theſe reaſons found favourable allowance, but did not procure an effectual remedy, till the ſaid gentlemen became ſupplicants to her majeſty in perſon; who then, having been prepared, it ſeems, by Ralegh's applications and intereſt, teſtify'd her diſlike of the attempter; and expreſly order'd the ceſſation of his attempt. For, ſays this author, herein we were beholden to Sir Walter Ralegh's earneſt writing, who was then in the country; alſo to the advice of Sir Henry, and the ſollicitations of Mr. W. Killegrew.[c] Another example of his zealous affection for the eaſe and advantage of theſe people under his juriſdiction, appears in his lightning them of a certain burdenſome tax, which carried many other inconveniences with it. For, as the products and commodities in thoſe weſtern parts had been anciently very much oppreſs'd with tributes to the earls of Cornwall, whereby the condition of a Corniſh inhabitant and a French peaſant differ'd very little; ſo latterly, while Ralegh was lieutenant of that county, there wanted not ſome, who, through favour at court, and plauſible repreſentations to her majeſty, did, in part, revive the ſame; and, under pretext of reſtoring a rent decay'd ever ſince the ninth of king Henry II, to the pretended detriment of the crown, procured letters patent, that none ſhould ſalt, dry, or pack any fiſh in Devonſhire or Cornwall, without their licence or warrant; the ill conſequences

Reſtores the dutchy manors in Cornwall to their ancient tenure.

[a] Upon this meſſage, the lords conſulted touching the uſage of their houſe, as it had been obſerved by thoſe of longeſt continuance therein; and it was reſolved, that their cuſtom was and is, "When any bills or meſſages be brought "from the houſe of commons to the upper houſe, the "lord-keeper and the reſt of the lords are to riſe and go "down to the bar to meet thoſe who come from the com-"mons, and there receive their ſaid meſſages or bills: "but, contrariwiſe, when any anſwer is to be deliver'd "by the lord-keeper, in the name and behalf of the houſe, "to ſuch as come from the commons, theſe members are "to receive the ſame ſtanding towards the lower end of "the ſaid upper houſe, without the bar; and the lord-"keeper is to deliver it ſitting in his place, with his head "cover'd, the other lords alſo keeping their places; and "that whenever it had been otherwiſe done, it was by er-"ror or miſtake, and therefore not to be drawn into pre-"cedent." Then the attorney-general and Serjeant Drew being ſent to the lower houſe, ſignify'd, that if they would ſend for an anſwer to their demands, it ſhould be given. The commons accordingly ſent the ſame perſons who had before demanded ſatisfaction. But, being come to the houſe, and having placed themſelves at the lower end of the outward room, as at other times, except the lord-keeper and other lords came and met them at the bar to deliver their anſwer, the ſaid keeper moved them to approach and receive it: then they, not perceiving the lords advance to the bar, proteſted, by Sir W. Knolles, that they had not commiſſion to receive any anſwer in that form; ſo departed. Hereupon, a motion was ſent from the lords to the commons for a conference in the outward great chamber, to reconcile this matter; where the aforeſaid members, meeting the archbiſhop of Canterbury, lord-treaſurer Burghley, and others of the moſt ancient peers, were aſſured by them, that the true and right form of receiving bills or meſſages, and delivering anſwers by the lord-keeper, was as is above related; and that ſome late inadvertency in the regard thereof, was the occaſion of their preſent miſconſtruction. Hereupon, the houſe of commons was ſatisfied; and the ſame form was afterwards kept accordingly. Sir Simon Dewe's journal of queen Elizabeth's parliaments, fol. 1708. p. 539, 540.

[b] Of theſe taxes, Camden gives us this explanation. A fifteenth and a tenth, is a certain tax on every city, borough and town, not upon every man in particular; but a general ſum, in proportion to the fifteenth part of the wealth of the reſpective places: a ſubſidy, we call that which is impos'd on every ſingle perſon, as they are aſſeſs'd by poll, according to the value of their goods and lands. Eliz. anno 1563.

whereof grew ſo apparent, as being what would have made that patentee an abſolute diſpoſer of all the weſtern ſhipping and traffick, with their ſea and land-dependants; that the Corniſh juſtices, whereof Mr. Carew aforeſaid was one, made ſuit to the privy-council for redreſs; and, through the never-failing forwardneſs and backing of Sir Walter Ralegh, ſays the ſame author, obtain'd a revocation thereof.[a] Here, not to divide from this head, what properly falls under it, we may alſo add Ralegh's good offices, the two following years, for freeing the inhabitants of theſe parts from thoſe heavy impoſitions, with which the trade and manufacture alſo of their tin-works were very much embarraſs'd. Theſe impoſitions were occaſion'd by the merchants and uſurers who advanced money to the tinners, upon whom their encroachments were now grown ſo exorbitant, that Ralegh was importun'd to revive the privilege of pre-emption, founded on that clauſe in the charter of king Edward I. allowing them to vend their tin to their beſt behoof, niſi nos ipſi emere voluerimus. It had been attempted by others before him, who alledg'd many reaſons how it might prove advantageous, not only to her majeſty, but the country, and prejudicial to none but thoſe extortioners, who practis'd a far worſe kind of pre-emption.[b] But tho' this means of redreſs was by thoſe perſons hotly begun, and a reaſonable price offer'd, it ſoon cool'd again, till it receiv'd a new life in Michaelmas term 1599; for then the Corniſh men, being in London, were call'd before the principal lords of her majeſty's council, and the matter was there debated by Sir Walter Ralegh in behalf of the country, againſt thoſe advocates deputed for the merchants who had promoted this ſuit; and he brought it to ſuch a concluſion that articles were ſign'd. Indeed it did not immediately take effect: yet, it ſeems, the privilege was afterwards inveſted in Ralegh, and that he put his power in execution. In November, the following year, he held a court at Loſtwithiel, the uſual place for Stannary cauſes; where having ſignified her majeſty's pleaſure for a new tax of ſix pounds on every thouſand weight of tin that ſhould be tranſported, beſides two pounds and ſixteen ſhillings already payable, he told them alſo, that her majeſty had been prevail'd on ſo far to diſengage them from dealing with the merchants and uſurers, that ſhe would diſburſe four thouſand pounds in loan to the tinners for a year's ſpace, and was contented to be repaid in tin:[c] and laſtly what appears totally to have excluded thoſe merchants from the exerciſe of their impoſitions is, that, by the time of the enſuing parliament, Ralegh appears to have had the power of pre-emption granted him; becauſe, in a ſpeech of his, which we ſhall take notice of, having juſtly maintain'd his title thereto, from the charter before-mention'd, he yet no leſs generouſly offers to reſign it, as indeed he not long after voluntarily did,[d] if thoſe, who had privileges of far leſs ancient eſtabliſhment, would follow his example. But, as theſe and his other eminent ſervices to thoſe people, are beſt to be judg'd of by ſuch as beheld and taſted the benefits that flow'd from them: ſo we ſhall here only add the publick acknowledgment thereof which Mr. Carew made, a few months after that parliament roſe, in the following dedication to Sir Walter Ralegh, of his excellent Survey of CORNWALL. "This my ill-huſbanded ſurvey, long ſince begun, a great while diſcontinu'd, "lately review'd, and now haſtily finiſh'd; appeals to your lordſhip's direction, whether "it ſhould paſs; to your correction, if it do paſs; and to your protection, when it is paſs'd. "Neither unduely: for the ſame intreats of the province and perſons over whoſe bodies and "eſtates you carry a large, both martial and civil, command by your authority; but in "whoſe hearts and loves you poſſeſs a far greater intereſt by your kindneſs. Your ears and "mouth have ever been open to hear and deliver our grievances; and your feet and hands "ready to go and work their redreſs; and that, not only always as a magiſtrate of yourſelf, Procures the revocation of a tax on the curing of fiſh.

Revives the pre-emption of tin.

[b] "When any weſtern gentleman (ſays Mr. Carew) "wants money to defray his expences at London, he re-"ſorts to one of the tin merchants to borrow ſome; but "ſhall as ſoon wreſt the club out of Hercules's fiſt, as one "penny out of their fingers, unleſs they give bond for "every twenty pounds ſo taken in loan, to deliver 1000 "pound weight of tin at the next coinage, which ſhall "be within two or three months, or half a year at far-"theſt. At which time the price of every thouſand will "not fail to be at leaſt 23, perhaps 25 pounds; yea, and "after promiſe made, muſt be driven with ſome indigni-"ty to make three or four errands to his houſe, before "he ſhall get the money deliver'd. Thus ſome one "merchant will have 500 pounds out before-hand, reap-"ing thereby a double commodity, both of exceſſive gain "for his loan, and of aſſurance of being ſerv'd with tin "for his money. This they ſay is no uſury forſooth, be-"cauſe the price of tin is not commonly known before-"hand (for once only, within theſe twelve years, on "purpoſe to eſcape the penalty of the law, they brought "it a little under 20 pounds the thouſand) but, if to take "above fifty in the hundred be extremity, whatſoever "name you liſt to give it, this, in truth, can be no other "than cut-throat and abominable dealing." Survey of Cornwall, p. 14, b. 16.

[d] Then it was recommended to king James; however, he had juſt before made a proclamation againſt all monopolies; for in 1604. there were ſeveral ſchemes and eſtimates drawn up on this project of pre-emption; one whereof ſets forth the profits of it, and diſadvantages of putting it down. In another we find this particular; "There "are two coinages of tin every year, and about eleven or "twelve hundred tun coin'd at each time; and if the "king farms the pre-emption for 10000 l. then there will "remain to the farmers 9500 l." Cotton library Titus B. V. towards the end of the volume.

" but alſo very often, as a ſuitor and ſollicitor to others of the higheſt place. Wherefore I, " as one of the common beholden, preſent this token of my private gratitude. It is duty, " and not preſumption, that hath drawn me to the offering; and it muſt be favour, and " not deſert, that ſhall move your lordſhip to acceptance: and ſo I take humble leave, reſt- " ing no leſs willing to ſerve you, than under you."

THIS author (Mr. Carew) ſubſcribes himſelf, to that dedication, Sir Walter Ralegh's kinſman; but was no leſs innobled and honour'd for his accompliſhments than his family, as Camden has obſerv'd; who further acknowledges the great aſſiſtance he receiv'd in his deſcription of Cornwall from this author's curious Survey of its antiquities and natural hiſtory.[a] For his abilities in theſe ſtudies he was admitted (as upon a very modeſt occaſion he mentions himſelf) an aſſociate of the Antiquary College.[b] A fragment of the ſpeech he made at his introduction to the ſaid ſociety, among other materials relating to him, I communicated, about a dozen years ſince, to the learned and ingenious writer of his life before the new impreſſion of his works.[c] And now that he was in London, ſolliciting one of the aforeſaid cauſes (for the Corniſh tinners) I find his name mention'd in a liſt of near twenty other antiquaries, who were ſummon'd to a meeting at the houſe of a Garter King of Arms (which, I ſuppoſe, was Sir William Dethicke, at the Heralds Office) in order, probably, to receive ſome queſtions, or bring his opinion in writing to others which had been propounded, as the manner then was.[d] Now, perceiving Sir Walter Ralegh to have patroniz'd the antiquities of Cornwall, written by one member of that ſociety, and that Mr. John Hooker, another gentleman learned in the antiquities of this realm, and perhaps a member alſo of the ſame body (for their names are not all yet known) addreſs'd his Hiſtorical Record of Devonſhire to a perſon of honourable place in the commonwealth, who is conceived by one that had ſeen it, to have been alſo Sir Walter Ralegh;[e] to which honourable perſon the ſaid work being deliver'd at its author's death, he committed it to Mr. Dodderidge, another member of the ſaid ſociety (who had leiſure to fit it for, and did recommend it to the preſs, tho' it never was printed:[f]) finding alſo that Sir Walter Ralegh was acquainted with, and honourably ſpoken of by others of this aſſembly, as Sir Henry Spelman, alſo Sir Robert Cotton, from whoſe library we find Ralegh afterwards borrowing ſome manuſcripts, and that Mr. John Selden was oblig'd to Ralegh's library for others; I could not but think him ſomehow related to the ſaid ſociety, and at laſt have found, that he likewiſe was a member thereof. This intelligence I receive from another liſt of theſe aſſociates, in a manuſcript addreſs'd ſoon after Ralegh's death to king James; which alſo further contains this obſervation upon that ſociety. " There was a time, moſt excellent king, when " as well under queen Elizabeth, as under your majeſty, certain choice gentlemen, men of " known proof, were knit together, ſtatis temporibus, by the love of theſe ſtudies, upon " contribution among themſelves: which company conſiſted of an elective Preſident and of " Clariſſimi; of other Antiquaries and a Regiſter. But this their meeting, whoſe profeſſion " reached only to the matter of our antiquities, deſerved to have an incorporative connection, " by way of authority royal; for want whereof, they being depriv'd of the benefit of ſuf- " fection and ſubſtitution, a few of their friends and perſons dying, the thing itſelf is abſo- " lutely vaniſh'd: ſucceſſion performing that in civil bodies, whith generation does in na- " tural.[g]

Theſe diſcourſes were written between the year 1590 and 1605; therefore do, I think, ſomewhat diſprove Sir Henry Spelman's computation (at leaſt that ſummons does) that this ſociety of Antiquaries was diſcontinued for twenty years and then reviv'd in 1614. King James was about this year, or ſoon after, ſo hot upon his college of controverſial divinity at Chelſea, that I wonder not at his diſcouragement of the ſaid ſociety, thro' I know not what ſuſpicion or pretence of their troubling matters of ſtate or religion, whereby their meeting was wholly broke of; tho', as Spelman affirms, they had reſolved to forbare all arguments on thoſe ſubjects. [g] Their names, however, deſerving to live with honour, the ſaid author ſets them down, as they aroſe to his mind, promiſcuouſly, in the following manner—Thomas earl of Dorſet, Henry earl of Northampton, Fitzalen the laſt earl of Arundel, William lord Burghley, the Herberts earls of Pembroke, the learned lord Lumley, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Henry Billingsley, Sir Gilbert and Sir William Dethicke, Sir Henry Fanſhaw, Dr. Bartholomew Clark, and dean Couſins; Sir Daniel Donne, Sir Walter Cope and Ralegh; Mr. Benedict Barnham, Dr. Cowel, Francis Thynne Eſq; Lancaſter; Mr. Glover, Somerſet; Heneage, keeper of the records; Beneſield, Erdſwick, Lambert, Valence, &c. Eſqs. Mr. Talbot, and Mr. John Stow, &c. Then telling the king how juſtly the diſſolution of ſo well an intended exercife was lamented by all thoſe worthy patriots, who knew his majeſty's realms afforded living perſons of prime worth, fit to keep up and celebrate that Round Table, he cites ſome of their names; as, lord William Howard, lord Carew, Sir Fulk Grevile, Sir Robert Cotton, Sir P. Manwood,

But, to return a little into the more open and publick current of action, we muſt here obſerve, that king Henry the fourth of France having, about the end of the laſt parliament, informed the queen of England, by an ambaſſador, that he had held ſome conferences with the Spaniſh miniſters about a peace, but would come to no concluſion without her conſent, and that of the united ſtates; her majeſty ſent ſome commiſſioners over: and, while they were negotiating this buſineſs in France, ſhe had the argument very cloſely debated in her council at home. Here Eſſex was one of thoſe, who would by no means liſten to any manner of accommodation; and, while the matter was upon the carpet, was ſo expeditious as to produce a formal apology, in writing, for his reaſons; it being dated in 1598, and written before the king of Spain's death in the beginning of September the ſame year. Yet, upon this topic, there enſued a warm diſpute, ſays Camden, betwixt the queen and Eſſex; as alſo upon her chuſing ſome able miniſter to ſuperintend the affairs of Ireland. She look'd upon the earl's uncle, Sir William Knolles, as a proper perſon for that charge. Eſſex prefer'd Sir George Carew, perhaps on purpoſe, ſays Camden, to get rid of him: and, when the queen would not be perſuaded to approve his choice, he, quite forgetting all duty, turn'd his back upon her in a contemptuous manner. The queen, unable to bear his inſolence, diſmiſs'd him her preſence with a box on the ear. The fury this threw the earl into, is better conceiv'd than expreſs'd; but having, with his hand on his ſword, told the queen, "He would not have taken ſuch a blow from her father," he retired from court. The lord-keeper Egerton ſent him a prudent and pacifying letter; in which, among other wholſome motives to ſubmiſſion and complacency, he ſays, "In this courſe "you hold, if you have any enemies, you do that for them which they could never do for "themſelves; while your friends you leave to ſcorn and contempt." The earl return'd a long and paſſionate anſwer, as Camden calls it; in which it appears, he had alſo ſuffer'd ſome impriſonment; and wherein he makes this reply to thoſe objections: "In this courſe do I any "thing for my enemies? When I was preſent, I found them abſolute; and therefore I had "rather they ſhould triumph alone, than have me attendant upon their chariots. Or do I "leave my friends? When I was a courtier, I could ſell them no fruit of my love; and "now I am a hermit, they ſhall bear no envy for their love to me."[a] But the lord-keeper ſoon brought him out of his hermitage; and he was, in a little time, re-admitted into the queen's favour. However, his friends, according to Camden, were apt to date his ruin from this unlucky circumſtance: and indeed, it hence appears, he had no enemies ſo great, or who ſo much conſpired to his fall, as his own paſſions, his unreaſonable expectations of an abſolute conformity to his own will, and impatience to behold any body aſpire to diſtinction, who did it not thro' his patronage and protection. Of this he gave a moſt notorious example about this time; in which he made Ralegh a publick object of his oppoſition, tho' it ended in his own diſgrace, and his relapſe into the queen's diſpleaſure; which he might have prevented, had he

Thus in a MS. entitled, an Addreſs for a Corporation Royal, to be founded under the title of king James his Academ, or College of Honour. Fol. eleven ſheets, p. 6, 7, 8, 9. My reaſons that it was written in 1619, and conjectures by whom, I have given in the book itſelf; which is in the poſſeſſion of Mr. George Vertue, whoſe readineſs to impart from his own curious collections, and procure from thoſe of his learned and worthy friends, whatever might be uſeful to my preſent undertaking, deſerves more frequent acknowledgments, as having in ſeveral other places conduced to the illuſtration thereof. This liſt of our primitive antiquaries, and that in the learned Dr. Smith's life of Sir Robert Cotton, together with thoſe in Mr. Hearne's Preface, p. 41. aforeſaid, and p. 112, may perhaps ſomewhat alleviate this laſt author's "deſpair of getting a perfect catalogue of "thoſe eminent and excellent men, tho' ſeveral of their "names were induſtriouſly conceal'd ſince the diſſolution "of the ſociety." And this remark will lead us to obſerve, how obſcurely even Sir Walter Ralegh is huddled over in the liſt here above exhibited. It was ſurely intended as a courtly compliment, thus to lop off all diſtinction or title of honour, by ſaddling him behind another Sir Walter, and ſhewing his very name headleſs, to that perſon who had newly made his body ſo. Another obſervation which occurs to me from this liſt is, that it ſeems to carry the antiquity of this ſociety higher than is commonly apprehended: for if Robert Glover, who was made Somerſet herald in 1571 (as I find in a MS. written by the late Peter Le Neve, Eſq; Norroy, upon the ſucceſſion of the heralds from queen Mary's reign) died in 1583, as I think the ſame MS. demonſtrates, or at leaſt as Dr. Fuller informs us; the ſaid ſociety muſt have been exiſtent in this year, how much more early ſoever it was before. As to its interrupted progreſs down to our time, it would demand, as it does deſerve, an ample hiſtory to diſplay it. This general view we may here ſpare room for: That in the former part of king Charles's reign it bloom'd out afreſh; but droop'd in the civil wars. It ſeems to have ſhone forth again after Oliver Cromwell's death; for then Mr. Aſhmole, in the Diary of his own Life, mentions the Antiquaries Feaſt; but, during the factions in the cloſe of king Charles II's reign, to have been under a cloud. It was revived in the reign of his late majeſty, anno 1717, and has continued to this day. Having gather'd in this ſpace to a body of fifty or ſixty members, nobility as well as gentry, and clergy as well as laity; ſome of whom are well known in the Republick of Letters for their own labours, and many highly deſerving from it, for contributing to the improvement of other mens; among which, gratitude cannot omit the Life of Sir W. Raleigh.

[a] Theſe quotations I have made from the ancient and fair copies in a volume of State Letters, written between the years 1533 and 1629, among the valuable collections of the right honourable the lord Coleraine, fol. 345, 351; where Eſſex's letter to the lord-keeper concludes with theſe words: "Let Solomon's foot laugh when he is "ſtricken; let thoſe who mean to make their profit of "princes ſhew to have no ſenſe of princes injuries; let "them acknowledge an infinite abſoluteneſs on Earth "who do not believe an abſolute infiniteneſs in Heaven, "&c." But hereby diſcover'd himſelf an ill imitator of his old tutor in court-conduct, Leiceſter, who had attained to the art not only of pocketing all affronts, but of conſtruing them into favours, and even converting them into benefits.

kept his word to the lord-keeper, and ſuffer'd Ralegh to have triumph'd alone: for, during this reconciliation, or laſt blaze Eſſex made with any credit at court, this memorable conteſt ſeems to have been promoted by him, at the martial exerciſes perform'd on the queen's birth-day, which was the 17th of November: At leaſt, I think it could not happen later than the year above-cited in this reign; becauſe Eſſex's violent courſes throughout the remainder of it, allow of no opportunity or countenance for his farther appearance at thoſe entertainments: and, as for the preceding birth-days, Eſſex ſeems not have been ſpirited up by his incendiaries enough for raiſing ſuch a diviſion or party, as appeared upon this occaſion, till the laſt year, when they return'd from the iſland voyage; and then it muſt have happen'd during the ſitting of the parliament, which may not be ſo probable. Therefore, I ſhall here recite the ſcatter'd circumſtances I have met with, relating to this event, till I am better inform'd in what year more certainly to fix it.

THESE martial exerciſes were the juſts or turnaments wherewith the moſt active nobles and cavaliers of thoſe times celebrated the queen's birth-day every year, in the Tilt-yard, near her palace at Whitehall. Here her majeſty was commonly herſelf a ſpectator of them, with her attendants of both ſexes; as likewiſe all the foreign ambaſſadors, and a numerous concourſe beſides both of the court and city. Hiſtory has not been very particular of Ralegh's appearance at thoſe aſſemblies; as by what colour or impreſſes he diſtinguiſh'd himſelf, with what ſucceſs he ran the carreers, or what favours he bore away: but, as upon all other publick occaſions, he made a moſt rich and ſplendid figure; ſo we find, upon theſe days of triumph, none ſurpaſs'd him in military bravery. I have ſomewhere read of his curious fine armory; and, as I remember, that part of it is, or was preſerv'd in the Tower of London; but it is more apparent that, probably for ſome of theſe grand entertainments, he either made himſelf, or was preſented by his royal miſtreſs with, a ſuit of armour all of ſolid ſilver: for there are ſtill in being, not only ancient paintings, repreſenting him about this part of her reign in that glittering and warlike habiliment, as hereafter will be farther deſcribed; but mention is alſo made in ſome writings of his being thus arm'd at all points, and ſhining in thoſe poliſh'd plates of ſilver [a]. Yet who were his competitors, and what his ſucceſs in theſe robuſt exerciſes, there is little, I fear, remaining to ſatisfy us, more than thoſe dark and diſperſed hints of that extraordinary oppoſition or contention which Eſſex raiſed againſt him about this time, as was obſerved: and this being the original or copy of a like contrivance, practiſed not long before or after it in France (by marſhal Biron, as I remember to have read) may, from thence, and the correſponding teſtimony of an author, whoſe credit and intelligence are not to be doubted, be preſumed to have happen'd in the following manner.

ABOUT the time that Eſſex, by other like inſtances of his incurable humour to monopolize the multitude, fell into, or confirmed, the queen's diſpleaſure, he had by ſome of his followers learnt, that Sir Walter Ralegh, with a very gallant train, gorgeouſly accoutred, was to make his appearance the next tilting-day in orange-colour plumes. Hereupon Eſſex provided a much more numerous cavalcade, and deck'd them out exactly in Ralegh's colours: then the earl himſelf appearing at the head of all, arm'd cap-a-pee in a compleat ſuit of orange-colour, not only paſs'd for the ſole knight or champion of that diſtinction, by drowning all diſtinction in Sir Walter Ralegh, but thereby incorporated him and his train only as ſo many more of his own eſquires, pages, and other retinue or ſervants, who made up the parade upon theſe occaſions. The earl of Clarendon certainly points at this malignant ſtratagem, where, ſpeaking of thoſe dangerous indiſcretions which were the harbingers of Eſſex's ruin, he mentions among them "His glo-"rious feather-triumph; when he cauſed two thouſand orange-tawney feathers, in deſpite of "Sir Walter Ralegh, to be worne in the Tilt-yard, even before her majeſty's own face [b]." But it muſt have been ſomewhat ſurprizing to ſee them enter the liſts, and orange-tawney running againſt itſelf. Yet the earl's ſucceſs, which is alſo come to light, ſeems not to have been much regretted, being ſo agreeable to the merit of uſurpers; inſomuch that it proved Ralegh's feather triumph in the concluſion. For, tho' the lord Bacon might have reaſon not to mention the earl's name, where he tells us a gentleman, who came to the tilt all in orange-tawney, and ran very ill, came again the next day all in green, and ran worſe; [c] yet another author, inſtead of this gentleman, names Eſſex; [d] and goes on, as the lord Bacon does, with obſerving, that "One of the ſpectators hereupon asking, Why this tilter (who ſeemed to be known in both

SUCH like diſturbances and ill blood as theſe conteſts muſt have bred, might well make the queen weary of having Eſſex any longer about the court, and deſirous of removing him to ſome employment where he might more commendably exerciſe his martial qualities. A good occaſion offer'd itſelf in Ireland, where Tir-Oen's rebellion had now overſpread almoſt the whole kingdom. A conſultation was therefore held for ſending over the fitteſt perſon to ſuppreſs it. The lord Mountjoy was firſt propos'd: but Eſſex himſelf made exceptions againſt his want of experience and activity; alledging, Ireland requir'd a perſon of the firſt rank, who was an old general, and conſiderable for honour, intereſt and eſtate, to gain him reſpect and influence there; by which Camden thinks he would have recommended himſelf, and adds, that when the queen therefore reſolv'd on Eſſex, he ſlightly refus'd it, adviſing her to ſome abler perſon; tho', continues that hiſtorian, he had an objection ready againſt any perſon ſhe ſhould have named. Notwithſtanding this authority, and that Eſſex's ſmooth-tongu'd adverſaries were for lending ſpurs to the ambition that wanted a bridle,[a] he ſeems to me, by a letter of his own genuine ſtyle, in proſe and verſe, to the queen, at his going over in the end of March 1599, to have look'd upon the government of that kingdom as the moſt irkſome kind of baniſhment, and to have enter'd upon it with the utmoſt averſion.[b] His conduct in it was anſwerable to the expectations of judicious men; and one of his own ſervants, who attended him thither, ſays, it was his blackeſt employment, that Ireland was ordain'd to be the ſepulchre of his father, and the gulph of his own fortunes.[c]

ABOUT four months after Eſſex was thus diſpoſed of, there were great apprehenſions in England of an invaſion; but from what quarter is not well diſtinguiſh'd: ſix thouſand ſoldiers were ſuddenly raiſed to guard the city and queen's perſon. Chains were drawn acroſs the ſtreets of London, watches ſet, and lights hung out at every man's door for above a fortnight.[d] By ſea ſixteen or eighteen ſhips of the royal navy were fitted out with wonderful ſpeed, under the command of the lord Thomas Howard, as admiral, in the Elizabeth Jonas, and Sir Walter, vice-admiral, in the Ark-Royal. Whether occaſion'd by any miſtruſt the Engliſh and Spaniards had of one another, or a policy held on both ſides to make peace with ſword in hand, my author does not reſolve; but is ſure the preparation on both ſides was very great, as if one expected an invaſion from the other: and yet it was generally conceiv'd not to be intended by either; but that our fleet had only relation to the earl of Eſſex, then in Ireland, as if he had ſome deſperate deſign to try his friends in England, and to be revenged of thoſe he thought his enemies. However it was, the care and coſt was not ſo great as neceſſary; for it was known, that the Adelantado had drawn, both his ſhips and galleys, to the Groyne; which was not uſual, but upon ſome action intended for England or Ireland: and, ſeeing we were not to be ſurpriz'd, he diverted them afterwards to a different uſe. Another benefit that aroſe to the nation, by putting it into this ſudden poſture of defence, was the great dexterity and expedition wherewith it was taught to ſpring into arms: for the incredible ſpeed and order of the commanders, in raiſing ſuch a land army, and fitting out ſuch a royal navy, was ſo admired, both by Spain, France and Holland, that all foreigners confeſs'd, Her majeſty's deeds in war were not heretofore more dreadful to her enemies than, now only her preparations for it. Inſomuch that, it is ſaid, an envoy was ſent by the Archduke from Bruſſels with overtures of peace, tho' they did not then ſucceed. Whether a deſign'd invaſion from Spain was hereby blown over, or her majeſty was better ſatisfied about the earl of Eſſex, we find not; but ſhe commanded her fleet home, after it had been about a month at ſea.[e]

NEAR a month after this, Eſſex returned privately out of Ireland, with ſome of his choice friends; one whereof, named Sir Chriſtopher St. Lawrence, offer'd to murder the lord Gray, whom they met upon the road, and to diſpatch ſecretary Cecyll when they came to court; but Eſſex would not encourage ſo baſe an act. The queen was now at Nonſuch: hither Eſſex haſten'd to preſent himſelf on his knees before her, in her privy-chamber early in the morning, and when her majeſty leaſt dreamt of him, ſays Camden; who adds, that ſhe entertain'd him with ſome marks of her grace and favour, tho' not with that freedom he uſed to find. But nothing of that unſeaſonable ſurpriſe and fatal diſcovery upon this viſit is mentioned either by him, or any of our other hiſtorians, which a foreigner, with the air of romance, natural to his country, reports to have then happen'd, and which I ſhall therefore refer to his own words.[a] The queen indeed order'd Eſſex to his apartment, and there to continue, as Camden goes on; for the earl had not only diſoblig'd her before, but now given freſh provocation by leaving Ireland without her permiſſion, and for ſhuffling up a truce there, which might be broke at a fortnight's warning; whereas he might have made an effectual compoſition with the rebels, and was impower'd to give them a general act of indemnity. The excuſes he offer'd before the council, were ſo unſatisfactory, and his behaviour ſo contemptuous, that the queen thought proper to commit him to cuſtody; but appointed it to be in the lord-keeper's houſe rather than a common priſon, chiefly to obſtruct the infuſions of his pernicious adherents, to whom he was ſo infatuated, that he could not relinquiſh them, tho' one of the objections, which would be raiſed againſt him, was by his own hand pre-ſuppoſed to be, the leaving of that kingdom in ſuch an unſettled poſture, and returning into this, with ſuch a pack of ſwordſmen at his heels.[b] Thus much was thought neceſſary here to relate of him, that it may appear, his own paſſions, with the counſels of his pretended friends, and not thoſe, who were vulgarly thought his enemies, prov'd his overthrow.

WHILE Eſſex was thus in reſtraint, commiſſioners were ſent over to Bulloigne to negotiate the peace with Spain. This was in May 1600. And about the ſame time we find Sir Walter Ralegh was alſo ſent, with the lord Cobham, upon an embaſſy concerning the ſame, into Flanders. Their buſineſs was kept very ſecret; yet, Albert arch-duke of Auſtria, and governor of the Netherlands, having charged the queen of England, it ſeems, with relieving the Hollanders, and being likely to take ſome umbrage at ſo many perſons of conſiderable rank going over volunteers to prince Maurice, as the lord of Northumberland, lord Rutland, and others; ſecretary Cecyll wrote to the ſaid commiſſioners at Bulloigne, that if the arch-duke ſhould object in the like manner to Cobham and Ralegh, they were to return anſwer, "That theſe had no "charge, nor carried either horſe or men, except ſome half a dozen of their own attendants; "and finding the queen ſo reſolved to have a peace (if good conditions could be had) they "obtained leave, with importunity, to ſee that one action (then expected) before they might "deſpair of ſeeing any more of the like kind in her majeſty's time." Thus much of this matter we have in a letter of ſecretary Cecyll's to thoſe commiſſioners. In another written by Sir Henry Neville, who was one of thoſe commiſſioners, to Mr. Winwood, he mentions it as a report, that Cobham and Ralegh were gone over upon pretext to ſee the camp and ſiege of the fort Iſabella near Oſtend, before which prince Maurice lay; but thinks they had ſome other end; and that in England there was ſome alarm taken at theſe matters, altho' he was not worthy to know it. The ſaid Sir Henry, in another letter to Mr. Winwood, ſays, that the journey of Cobham and Ralegh was not upon curioſity only; but that they carried ſome meſſage (to prince Maurice it ſeems) which did no harm, and that he would reveal the particulars when he was better informed of them. Theſe three letters were written in July this year, and in the firſt of them we perceive Ralegh was returned into England by the fourteenth day of the ſaid month.[c]

WHEN he arrived at court, the government of Jerſey was, it ſeems, vacant by the death of Sir Anthony, ſon of Sir Amias Paulet. The queen had many addreſſors for this preferment; but ſhe thought none ſo worthy of it as Sir Walter Ralegh. About ſix weeks after, that is, in the latter end of Auguſt, his patent was paſſed, with grant of the manor or lordſhip of St. Germain in the ſaid iſland, and all the lands and tenements therein. [d] There is a learned inhabitant of this iſland, who in his curious and exact hiſtory of it, giving us a ſucceſſion of the governors, ſays, "Sir Walter Ralegh came in after the Paulets, the year only before his royal "miſtreſs queen Elizabeth died; and was attainted the firſt year of king James: ſo that we "were ſoon bereaved of the happineſs we promiſed ourſelves under ſo excellent a perſon. His "bare name in the liſt of our governors does honour to the iſland." [e] Yet, as the ſame author further obſerves out of the ſaid patent, "When Sir Walter Ralegh himſelf had this govern-"ment given him by queen Elizabeth, ſhe ſtruck off three hundred pounds a year from it, "which ſhe took into her own diſpoſal; and made that great man, ſo renowned for his emi-"nent ſervices to her and to the whole nation, be contented with the remainder." [a]

Eſſex had now been called before the council at the lord-keeper's, where, for the matters laid to his charge, he was ſuſpended from ſome of his offices. But the courſe of penitence and reſignation, which he held for a while, gave great hopes, after he had obtained his liberty, that he would recover himſelf alſo at court; till his creatures blew him up again with their poiſonous counſels, and led him to expect not only a reſtoration to favour, but with unreaſonable intereſt; "inſomuch, that he neglected the queen's pardon, becauſe it came not accompanied with a "new grant of his leaſe for the farming of ſweet wines," as a noble author obſerves: [b] Who adds, "if ever that uncouth ſpeech fell from him of the queen, which is deliver'd to us by "one who was then much converſant in the ſecrets of the court, [c] that ſhe was as crooked in "her diſpoſition, as in her careaſe; all my wonder at his deſtruction is taken from me." After this ſpeech, the queen did as good as deny him the wine-licences aforeſaid, as Camden relates. Then Eſſex threw himſelf open to all ill impreſſions, renewing the project he had begun in Ireland of removing by force his enemies at court. He curried favour with king James in Scotland, by ſeveral reſpectful letters; wherein he labour'd to prejudice the king againſt thoſe who had any influence in the Engliſh court, and was very particular in acquainting him with the intereſt of his adverſaries; as one of whom he failed not to ſet forth Sir Walter Ralegh, with the formidable power he had in the weſt of England, and now again in the iſle of Jerſey; that Cobham was warden of the Cinque-Ports; lord Burghley, preſident of the north, and Sir George Carew, preſident of Munſter, in the ſouth of Ireland: That thoſe were places commodious for the Spaniards to land; and theſe, perſons well-affected to the king of Spain, and altogether, with the lord-treaſurer, admiral and ſecretary, ſteer'd the helm of government. Then he practiſed with the ſaid king to ſend ambaſſadors into England, to preſs a publick declaration of his title to the ſucceſſion, prepares inſtructions for that purpoſe, ſtill inſtancing the exorbitant power of his enemies, their diſaffection to the king of Scots, and great veneration for the infanta. Theſe proceedings were outwardly varniſh'd over, all this while, with the gloſs of conſcience and religion; he won over the puritans and their preachers to his party, commiſerated the afflicted condition of the papiſts, retained a crew of Deſperado's to guard his houſe, and left none uncountenanc'd, who had nothing to hope for, but changes and revolutions.

Prejudic'd in k. James's opinion by Eſſex.

THUS theſe ill humours kept gathering till Sunday the 8th of February following, and then broke out, as may be ſeen at large in our hiſtories of theſe times. At court the guard was

[c] This was Sir Walter Ralegh, who mentions this paſſage in the following manner. "Undutiful words of a "ſubject do often take deeper root than the memory of "evil deeds. The duke of Biron found it, when the "king had him at advantage. Yea, the late earl of "Eſſex told queen Elizabeth, That her conditions were as "crooked as her careaſe; but it coſt him his head, which "his inſurrection had not done, but for that ſpeech." doubled, doubled, being appris'd of this eruption; and the morning it happened, Sir Walter Ralegh ſent, out of particular kindneſs, to Sir Ferdinando Gorges, one of Eſſex's adherents, and governor of Plymouth fort, to come in all haſte to him at Durham-houſe to ſpeak with him, and, as the more private way, that he would come by water. Gorges, in the Manuſcript he writ to vindicate himſelf from the imputation of betraying Eſſex by this meeting, avers, that he advertiſed his lordſhip of this meſſage, and that upon council the earl was willing he ſhould go; but directed him to appoint his meeting with Ralegh upon the Thames, and not to land at Durham-houſe; alſo to take with him a guard for ſecuring his return. The conference that paſſed between them, as Gorges relates it, was only this: "When Sir Walter Ralegh's boat "came to me, he being all alone, and I having two gentlemen, he told me, that he had "ſent for me to admoniſh me to make all haſte out of the town down to my charge; there "being a warrant out for the ſending me to the fleet. For his kind advertiſement I gave "him thanks; but told him withal, becauſe I knew the preſent occaſion would ſoon diſcover "itſelf, that it came too late; for I had engaged myſelf in another matter. He further in- "quiring of me, what it was? I told him, there were two thouſand gentlemen who had re- "ſolved that day to live or die free-men. He proteſted unto me he heard not of it until that "morning, but did not ſee what they were able to do againſt the queen's authority. My "anſwer was, it was the abuſe of that by him and others, which made ſo many honeſt men "reſolve to ſeek a reformation thereof. His reply was, that no man is without a colour for "his intent; and adviſed me to look to myſelf, and to remember my duty and allegiance. "I anſwer'd, that I knew not any man who did not more reſpect his allegiance than his life, "as the end would make apparent; and thus we parted; he to the court, and I to Eſſex- "houſe."[d] In the confeſſion made by this Gorges, eight days after that of their inſurrection above-named, before ſome of the privy-council, it appears, Sir Chriſtopher Blount had perſuaded him to murder or ſeize Sir Walter Ralegh at this meeting upon the water.[e] For not doing either, Gorges apologizes in the Manuſcript aforeſaid after this manner. "If it be de- "manded of me why I did not then take Sir Walter Ralegh. Firſt, it was not a matter I ever "propos'd; tho' many perſuaded me ſo to do. Secondly, I never held it an act fitting among "men to betray any that repoſe truſt in us; and he putting himſelf into my hands, with what "honeſty could I have avowed ſo barbarous a deed, unleſs he had given me the firſt occaſion "by violent deeds or unkind words; for either of which, I was both reſolved and prepared. "And at my return, I deliver'd unto my lord what had paſſed between Sir Walter Ralegh "and myſelf, which he received with applauſe, as may be teſtified by thoſe who were preſent, "and yet alive."[f] Laſtly, in another part of the ſaid Manuſcript, Gorges ſays, "The "reaſon why I acknowledge I had means to have taken or killed Sir Walter Ralegh was, the "better to make it appear, that there was neither malicious or butcherous courſe intended to "him or any; and alſo to give him cauſe to acknowledge himſelf in that reſpect beholden "unto me; whereby to take from him occaſion to exerciſe his power (which I knew to be "great at that juncture) to my ruin. For I did believe, he could not in reaſon be ſo void of "human reſpect, as not to requite one courteſy with another; as alſo it was no matter of "treaſon againſt her majeſty, but rather a manifeſtation of the contrary, approving this in- "tent to be particular againſt Sir Walter Ralegh, and others."[g] This is the conference which "paſſed between them a few hours before the inſurrection, as Gorges has repreſented it.

His conference with Sir Ferd. Gorges, an accomplice in Eſſex's inſurrection.

After Eſſex, with his party, had made ſeveral excurſions, and ſome perſons had been ſlain both on his ſide and the queen's. After he had been proclaimed a traitor by the king of arms in ſeveral parts of the city; and was driven, by water, to ſeek garriſon in his own houſe; we find Ralegh mentioned among the ſeveral nobles and knights who inveſted it; tho' he appears in no particular action againſt the ſaid earl or his company. But, when the earl ſoon after ſurrender'd himſelf, and was brought to examination, he profeſs'd that he was to have been aſſaulted or aſſaſſinated by his private enemies; of this we have the following account publiſh'd by authority. "As in all former diſcontentments, he had "gone the beaten path of traitors, turning their imputation upon counſellors and perſons of " credit with their ſoveraign: ſo now he was forced to deſcend to the pretext of a private " quarrel; giving out, how that evening, when he ſhould have been called before the lords of " the council, there was an ambuſcade of muſketeers placed upon the water, by the device of " my lord Cobham and Sir Walter Ralegh, to have murder'd him in the way as he paſs'd. A Slander'd by Eſſex. " matter of no probability (continues my author) thoſe perſons having no ſuch deſperate eſtates " or minds as to ruin themſelves and their poſterity by committing ſo odious a crime. On the " contrary, it was certain, Sir Ferdinando Gorges accuſed Blount of perſuading him to kill, or " at leaſt apprehend Sir Walter Ralegh; and that Gorges rejecting this advice, Blount ſent four " ſhot after him in a boat, which Blount deny'd not; and aſked Ralegh forgiveneſs for it at " the time of his death." [a] But there were other improbabilities to diſcredit this ſlander (as we may ſafely call it, ſince the ſtate call'd it by a groſſer name) beſides that the perſons ſo accuſed had reputations and eſtates better eſtabliſh'd, than to overthrow them by ſuch a deteſtable deed; " as Eſſex's declining to produce or name any author of ſuch an information: be- " ſides his varying from himſelf (like the judges, in the ſtory of Suſannah, from one another) " in the place; as one while he was to have been murder'd in his bed; and another, on the " water: alſo in the time and perſons; as that it was to have been done by Jeſuits, and ſome " days before: ſo that in the end, this accuſation by Eſſex was reſembled to the action of Pi- " ſiſtratus, who proceeded ſo far in this kind of fiction and diſſimulation, that he lanced his " own body, and came wounded before the people, as tho' he had been aſſaulted by his " private enemies; thus obtained a guard about his own perſon, whereby he afterwards uſurped " upon the ſtate." [b] Further, what may perfectly clear up the innocence of Cobham and Ra- Cleared. legh from this unworthy calumny, is the acknowledgment which Blount made at his own trial; when, being aſked by ſecretary Cecyll, " Whether he thought my lord Cobham and Sir Wal- " ter Ralegh intended any ſuch aſſaſſination of the earl? he anſwer'd, that he did not believe " they ever meant any ſuch thing, nor that the earl himſelf feared it; only, it was a word caſt " out to colour other matters.[c]" And laſtly, what may tend to prove, that Ralegh did rather compaſſionate and incline to befriend the earl, than harbour any enmity that was implacable againſt him, is, that one of the earl's own faction, captain Thomas Lee, ſhould have ſuch hopes, that Ralegh might be perſuaded into the danger of diſobliging the queen by importunity, or other violent means, for retrieving both Eſſex and Southampton from the jaws of death, as, by way of propoſition, to tell Sir Robert Croſs, who had been an old officer under Ralegh in ſeveral engagements at ſea, " That Sir Walter Ralegh might get himſelf eternal honour and love, " more than ever he can otherwiſe, if he would procure her majeſty's warrant to free the lords; " which he might compaſs, by undertaking her perſon:[d]" for this does not only ſhew the opinion that was held of Ralegh's power with the queen, but the probability that he might be induced to exert it for the reſcue of thoſe noblemen. We find he did uſe his intereſt for ſome Procures a who were drawn in unawares, and got a pardon for Sir Edmund Bainham; alſo for John Littleton, and Orell a brave old ſoldier: the two former were men of fortune, and their purſes might bleed, or be threaten'd upon this occaſion. But, as Camden obſerves, few paid the fines laid on them. pardon for ſome of the confederates.

On the 19th of February, Eſſex was arraign'd at Weſtminſter; and we find, in his trial, that Sir Walter Ralegh, with forty of the queen's guard, was, as captain thereof, there preſent upon duty. [e] Ralegh was here examin'd about the conference before-mention'd; and all he ſaid was, " That Gorges told him on the water, Eſſex had put himſelf into a ſtrong guard at his " houſe; and this would be the bloodieſt day's work that ever was; wiſhing he would ſpeed " to court for the prevention of it; and that he himſelf wiſhed Gorges to refuſe their company, " elſe he would be undone,[f]". This is all Ralegh ſaid of that conference; which Gorges, here alſo in court, confirm'd. But Eſſex ſeems to charge Gorges with prevarication, where he replies, " Whatſoever Sir Walter Ralegh hath ſaid, differeth altogether from that which Sir Fer- " dinando told us at Eſſex-houſe, upon his return from the water." And indeed it is not likely he ſhould tell Eſſex he adviſed Ralegh to go to court and prevent the inſurrection. Six days after, Eſſex was beheaded in the Court-yard of London Tower. diſtinction, there preſent was Sir Walter Ralegh, probably in his charge again as captain of the guard. He ſtood near the ſcaffold, according to his own aſſertion; that he might better anſwer, if Eſſex ſhould be deſirous of ſpeaking to him. But his enemies expounded his preſence there in ſuch a barbarous ſenſe, ſays Camden, as if he had preſſed near the place of execution, only to feaſt his eyes with the tragedy of the earl's ſufferings; and the greateſt or moſt notorious of Ralegh's enemies (who is known to us) he who betrayed him to his own untimely end, as will be obſerv'd, did after Ralegh's death, when he could not anſwer for himſelf, inſinuate, that he not only inſulted upon Eſſex being dead, but even plotted his downfal, as that "he had called the earl's ſaintſhip in queſtion," had writ in ſome letters, "that the great boy "died like a calf, and like a craven;" and that, ſoon after the execution, a gentleman, returning from Spain, touched at Sherborne, who, being aſked by Ralegh, "what they ſaid in "Spain of Eſſex's death?" anſwered, "They had not heard of it; but he was ſorry to hear, "that in the Iſland voyage the earl had brought him to his mercy;" to which, that Ralegh anſwer'd, "but I truſt I am now quit with him;" and, as a more evident demonſtration, ſays, that the night before the earl's ſuffering, "Ralegh gave inſtructions to the lieutenant of the Tower for "the execution of the warrant:" which ſurely he did not do without authority. But theſe particulars, it muſt be obſerved, come from the perſon ſtigmatiz'd with having enſnared Ralegh to his deſtruction, and to the perſon who deſtroyed him, with endeavour to palliate the conduct of both to the world.[a] And as we find thoſe obloquies gave not ſatisfaction to their author's contemporaries: ſo we have produced them, that they may not eſcape the reception they deſerve of poſterity. As for Ralegh's comportment to Eſſex, we may gueſs what it was while the earl was alive, ſince he made no exceptions to it at his death, when he had free liberty of ſpeech; and when Ralegh came to the ſame end, it appears by his laſt words, that he had relented more at the earl's fate, than any thing we hear of in his pretended friends; and that he retir'd from the ſight of the earl at the time of his death, in compliance with the miſconſtruction of the populace, tho' he afterwards repented it; ſince the earl had a deſire to ſee and ſpeak with him before he took his farewel of the world.

THIS deſire was, in all probability, to aſk Ralegh forgiveneſs, for having ſo diſhonourably treated and traduced him, to countenance his own raſh purpoſes. For juſt ſuch a deſire had Sir Chriſtopher Blount, when his own execution approached on the 18th of March following at Tower-hill; where, underſtanding that Ralegh, as captain of the guard, was near the ſcaffold, he ſaid, "Sir Walter Ralegh, I thank God that you are preſent: I had an infinite deſire "to ſpeak with you, to aſk you forgiveneſs e're I died; both for the wrong done you, and "for my particular ill intent towards you: I beſeech you forgive me." Ralegh anſwer'd, "that he moſt willingly forgave him, and beſought God to forgive him, and to give him his "divine comfort; proteſting before the Lord, that whatever Sir Chriſtopher Blount meant "towards him, for his part, he never bore him any ill intent:" and further ſaid to him, "I "pray you, without offence, let me put you in mind, that you have been eſteemed not only a "principal provoker and perſuader of the earl of Eſſex in all his undutiful courſes, but eſpe- "cially an adviſer in that which has been confeſs'd, of his purpoſe to tranſport a great part of "her majeſty's army out of Ireland into England, to land at Milford, and thence to turn it "againſt her ſacred perſon: you will do well to tell the truth herein, and to ſatisfy the world." Blount reply'd, "When I was brought from Reban to Dublin, and lodg'd in the caſtle; his "lordſhip and the earl of Southampton came to viſit me; and he began thus plainly with me: "That he intended to tranſport a choice part of the army of Ireland into England, and land them "in Wales, at Milford, or thereabouts: and ſo ſecuring his deſcent, would gather ſuch other "forces, as would enable him to march to London." I anſwer'd, "I would that night con- "ſider of it." Next day the earls came again; I told them, "Such an enterprize, as it was "moſt dangerous, would coſt much blood; ſo as I could not like it. But I rather adviſed "him to go over himſelf, with a good train, and make ſure of the court, than make his own "conditions; and tho' we never reſolved to hurt her majeſty's perſon, yet I know, and muſt "confeſs, If we had failed of our ends, we ſhould, rather than have been diſappointed, even have "drawn blood from herſelf." Then giving a few farther hints of their progreſs in general, he leaves the reſt to his confeſſions made before the privy-counſellors, whom he names, and to whom he beſeeches Sir Walter Ralegh to commend him for their favourable and charitable dealing. lords lords Gray, Compton, and the reſt, he made a decent end.[a] Thus have we connected all the paſſages of Eſſex's inſurrection, wherein we have found Ralegh any ways mention'd or concern'd; which, with ſeveral other remarkable parts of his ſtory, thoſe authors, who had read many of the tracts, letters, records, and other manuſcripts whence it is here drawn out, have viſibly curtail'd and ſuppreſs'd in their annals and chronicles of this reign, which were publiſh'd in the next.

THE following ſummer, in the year 1601, it appears, that Ralegh attended upon the queen in her progreſs; and, when the king of France came to Calais, on the alarm of the archduke's beſieging of Oſtend, her majeſty was at Dover. Ambaſſadors were ſent over to each other on this occaſion; and, in that private diſpatch of the marquis of Roſney, afterwards duke of Sully, related only by himſelf, we find, that upon his landing at Dover, he was received by Ralegh, in company with the lords Cobham, Sidney, and others.[b] The interview, then expected between theſe two princes, was not brought to paſs; nor ſeem the propoſals, made to her majeſty about the war with Spain, to have had the full effect that was hoped for; becauſe, not long after, on the 5th of September, there arrived at London another ambaſſador from France, named the duke of Biron, with a very noble, numerous and ſtately equipage, to the number of three or four hundred perſons. The queen was then in Hantſhire; and, during the thirteen days ſhe was entertained at Baſing, the marquis of Wincheſter's ſeat, the duke of Biron, with his retinue, was brought to the Vine, a fair houſe in the ſaid county of the lord Sandys, which was furniſh'd with ſeven ſcore beds by the neighbouring gentry, and with all other accommodations from the queen's palaces, for the reception of the ſaid ambaſſador. I leave this entertainment to the deſcription of the French and Engliſh hiſtorians, who obſerve it was one diſcontinued feſtival, and that the like was never made by any of our princes in a progreſs. 'Tis more particularly to be expected, that Ralegh did here attend upon the court, becauſe he was commonly appointed to entertain the foreign miniſters, eſpecially of France or the States, being ſo well acquainted with thoſe people and their policies: and when the queen left the country, we find, among the ten perſons ſhe there knighted (a greater number than ever ſhe had confer'd that honour upon at one time) that one of them was Carew,[c] the brother of Sir Walter Ralegh. But as for that paſſage, in a French hiſtorian lately quoted, between the queen and the ambaſſador when they were in London, of her ſhewing him, among the heads of thoſe rebels which were ſtuck upon the Tower, that of the earl of Eſſex;[d] it has been proved fabulous by Camden,[e] who would doubtleſs have detected other ſuch falſities in the ſaid French author, relating to our Engliſh Hiſtory, and in particular to Sir Walter Ralegh, had his Annals extented to the year, in which we ſhall be obliged to take notice thereof.

Receives the French ambaſſador at Dover.

SOON after the queen's return from this progreſs, her laſt parliament met at Weſtminſter, and that was on the 27th day of October. This was a ſeſſion full of important buſineſs, and Ralegh appears frequently engaged in it. The firſt or moſt ancient liſt of the members of the houſe of commons, at leaſt extant, is, as I have been told by an eminent antiquary, that which we have of this parliament;[f] and herein it appears, that Sir Walter Ralegh was one of the knights of the ſhire for the county of Cornwall, John Arundell, Eſq; being the other; and that Sir Carew Ralegh was one of the burgeſſes for Foway in the ſame county. The firſt ſpeech we have of Sir Walter's, upon record in this parliament, was on November the 4th; and in oppoſition to the act for ſowing of hemp, "For my part, ſaid he, I do not like this conſtraining

This is that Sir Carew Ralegh, who appears, in the court-rolls of Gillingham in Glocesterſhire, to have been one of the ſtewards, his brother Sir Walter being the other of that manor, in theſe times belonging to the crown; as I have it from a letter of ſome obliging remarks upon the family of the Raleghs, written by William Nicholas, Eſq; of Weſt-horſely in Suſſex. This muſt be alſo the ſame Sir Carew Ralegh, who had, in 1616, for what conſideration is not mention'd, a hundred pounds paid him from the government, as I find in an Abſtract of the State of his Majeſty's Revenue, reprinted 8vo. 1692, p. 30. Laſtly, the ſame Sir Carew Ralegh, who married Dorothy, daughter of Sir William Wroughton, and relict of Sir John Thynne, by whom he had Gilbert, heir of Downton; and he, by Lucy, daughter of Sir Gilly Wroughton, of Broad-hinton in Wilts, had ſeveral children, as Gilbert, George, Walter, Katharine, Anne, &c. This I gather from a pedigree of the Raleghs, in the poſſeſſion of Brown Willis, Eſq; mention'd at the beginning of this work; wherein it farther appears, the ſaid Sir Carew, his ſon and grand-children, were all alive in 1623. And hence the Wiltſhire Raleghs have flouriſh'd to theſe latter times.

But theſe particulars, it muſt be obſerved, come from the perſon ſtigmatiz'd with having enſnared Ralegh to his deſtruction, and to the perſon who deſtroyed him, with endeavour to palliate the conduct of both to the world.[a] And as we find thoſe obloquies gave not ſatisfaction to their author's contemporaries: ſo we have produced them, that they may not eſcape the reception they deſerve of poſterity. As for Ralegh's comportment to Eſſex, we may gueſs what it was while the earl was alive, ſince he made no exceptions to it at his death, when he had free liberty of ſpeech; and when Ralegh came to the ſame end, it appears by his laſt words, that he had relented more at the earl's fate, than any thing we hear of in his pretended friends; and that he retir'd from the ſight of the earl at the time of his death, in compliance with the miſconſtruction of the populace, tho' he afterwards repented it; ſince the earl had a deſire to ſee and ſpeak with him before he took his farewel of the world.

THIS deſire was, in all probability, to aſk Ralegh forgiveneſs, for having ſo diſhonourably treated and traduced him, to countenance his own raſh purpoſes. For juſt ſuch a deſire had Sir Chriſtopher Blount, when his own execution approached on the 18th of March following at Tower-hill; where, underſtanding that Ralegh, as captain of the guard, was near the ſcaffold, he ſaid, "Sir Walter Ralegh, I thank God that you are preſent: I had an infinite deſire "to ſpeak with you, to aſk you forgiveneſs e're I died; both for the wrong done you, and "for my particular ill intent towards you: I beſeech you forgive me." Ralegh anſwer'd, "that he moſt willingly forgave him, and beſought God to forgive him, and to give him his "divine comfort; proteſting before the Lord, that whatever Sir Chriſtopher Blount meant "towards him, for his part, he never bore him any ill intent:" and further ſaid to him, "I "pray you, without offence, let me put you in mind, that you have been eſteemed not only a "principal provoker and perſuader of the earl of Eſſex in all his undutiful courſes, but eſpe- "cially an adviſer in that which has been confeſs'd, of his purpoſe to tranſport a great part of "her majeſty's army out of Ireland into England, to land at Milford, and thence to turn it "againſt her ſacred perſon: you will do well to tell the truth herein, and to ſatisfy the world." Blount reply'd, "When I was brought from Reban to Dublin, and lodg'd in the caſtle; his "lordſhip and the earl of Southampton came to viſit me; and he began thus plainly with me: "That he intended to tranſport a choice part of the army of Ireland into England, and land them "in Wales, at Milford, or thereabouts: and ſo ſecuring his deſcent, would gather ſuch other "forces, as would enable him to march to London." I anſwer'd, "I would that night con- "ſider of it." Next day the earls came again; I told them, "Such an enterprize, as it was "moſt dangerous, would coſt much blood; ſo as I could not like it. But I rather adviſed "him to go over himſelf, with a good train, and make ſure of the court, than make his own "conditions; and tho' we never reſolved to hurt her majeſty's perſon, yet I know, and muſt "confeſs, If we had failed of our ends, we ſhould, rather than have been diſappointed, even have "drawn blood from herſelf." Then giving a few farther hints of their progreſs in general, he leaves the reſt to his confeſſions made before the privy-counſellors, whom he names, and to whom he beſeeches Sir Walter Ralegh to commend him for their favourable and charitable dealing. Laſtly, having alſo declared he died in the Catholic faith, and bid farewel to the lords Gray, Compton, and the reſt, he made a decent end.[a] Thus have we connected all the paſſages of Eſſex's inſurrection, wherein we have found Ralegh any ways mention'd or concern'd; which, with ſeveral other remarkable parts of his ſtory, thoſe authors, who had read many of the tracts, letters, records, and other manuſcripts whence it is here drawn out, have viſibly curtail'd and ſuppreſs'd in their annals and chronicles of this reign, which were publiſh'd in the next.

THE following ſummer, in the year 1601, it appears, that Ralegh attended upon the queen in her progreſs; and, when the king of France came to Calais, on the alarm of the archduke's beſieging of Oſtend, her majeſty was at Dover. Ambaſſadors were ſent over to each other on this occaſion; and, in that private diſpatch of the marquis of Roſney, afterwards duke of Sully, related only by himſelf, we find, that upon his landing at Dover, he was received by Ralegh, in company with the lords Cobham, Sidney, and others.[b] The interview, then expected between theſe two princes, was not brought to paſs; nor ſeem the propoſals, made to her majeſty about the war with Spain, to have had the full effect that was hoped for; becauſe, not long after, on the 5th of September, there arrived at London another ambaſſador from France, named the duke of Biron, with a very noble, numerous and ſtately equipage, to the number of three or four hundred perſons. The queen was then in Hantſhire; and, during the thirteen days ſhe was entertained at Baſing, the marquis of Wincheſter's ſeat, the duke of Biron, with his retinue, was brought to the Vine, a fair houſe in the ſaid county of the lord Sandys, which was furniſh'd with ſeven ſcore beds by the neighbouring gentry, and with all other accommodations from the queen's palaces, for the reception of the ſaid ambaſſador. I leave this entertainment to the deſcription of the French and Engliſh hiſtorians, who obſerve it was one diſcontinued feſtival, and that the like was never made by any of our princes in a progreſs. 'Tis more particularly to be expected, that Ralegh did here attend upon the court, becauſe he was commonly appointed to entertain the foreign miniſters, eſpecially of France or the States, being ſo well acquainted with thoſe people and their policies: and when the queen left the country, we find, among the ten perſons ſhe there knighted (a greater number than ever ſhe had confer'd that honour upon at one time) that one of them was Carew,[c] the brother of Sir Walter Ralegh. But as for that paſſage, in a French hiſtorian lately quoted, between the queen and the ambaſſador when they were in London, of her ſhewing him, among the heads of thoſe rebels which were ſtuck upon the Tower, that of the earl of Eſſex;[d] it has been proved fabulous by Camden,[e] who would doubtleſs have detected other ſuch falſities in the ſaid French author, relating to our Engliſh Hiſtory, and in particular to Sir Walter Ralegh, had his Annals extented to the year, in which we ſhall be obliged to take notice thereof.

Receives the French ambaſſador at Dover.

SOON after the queen's return from this progreſs, her laſt parliament met at Weſtminſter, and that was on the 27th day of October. This was a ſeſſion full of important buſineſs, and Ralegh appears frequently engaged in it. The firſt or moſt ancient liſt of the members of the houſe of commons, at leaſt extant, is, as I have been told by an eminent antiquary, that which we have of this parliament;[f] and herein it appears, that Sir Walter Ralegh was one of the knights of the ſhire for the county of Cornwall, John Arundell, Eſq; being the other; and that Sir Carew Ralegh was one of the burgeſſes for Foway in the ſame county. The firſt ſpeech we have of Sir Walter's, upon record in this parliament, was on November the 4th; and in oppoſition to the act for ſowing of hemp, "For my part, ſaid he, I do not like this conſtraining

This is that Sir Carew Ralegh, who appears, in the court-rolls of Gillingham in Glocesterſhire, to have been one of the ſtewards, his brother Sir Walter being the other of that manor, in theſe times belonging to the crown; as I have it from a letter of ſome obliging remarks upon the family of the Raleghs, written by William Nicholas, Eſq; of Weſt-horſely in Suſſex. This muſt be alſo the ſame Sir Carew Ralegh, who had, in 1616, for what conſideration is not mention'd, a hundred pounds paid him from the government, as I find in an Abſtract of the State of his Majeſty's Revenue, reprinted 8vo. 1692, p. 30. Likewiſe the ſame who ſold Widdycombe Ralegh to one of the Martyns, as is before obſerved; and the ancient patrimony of Fardel to Walter Heale, Eſq; of Brixton, as John Prince informs us in the Worthies of Devon, fol. 402. Laſtly, the ſame Sir Carew Ralegh, who married Dorothy, daughter of Sir William Wroughton, and relict of Sir John Thynne, by whom he had Gilbert, heir of Downton; and he, by Lucy, daughter of Sir Gilly Wroughton, of Broad-hinton in Wilts, had ſeveral children, as Gilbert, George, Walter, Katharine, Anne, &c. This I gather from a pedigree of the Raleghs, in the poſſeſſion of Brown Willis, Eſq; mention'd at the beginning of this work; wherein it farther appears, the ſaid Sir Carew, his ſon and grand-children, were all alive in 1623. And hence the Wiltſhire Raleghs have flouriſh'd to theſe latter times.

" of men to manure or uſe their ground at our wills; but rather let every man uſe his " ground to that which it is moſt fit for, and therein uſe his own diſcretion. For halſiers, " cables, cordage, and the like, we have plentifully enough from foreign nations; and we " have countries here in England that make uſe thereof in abundance: and the bill of Tillage " may be a ſufficient motive to us in this caſe, not to take the courſe that this bill intends. For " where the law provides, that every man muſt plough the third part of his land; I know " divers poor people have done ſo, to avoid the penalty of the ſtatute, when their abilities have " been ſo poor, that they have not been able to buy ſeed-corn to ſow it withal; nay, they " have been fain to hire others to plough it; which, if it had been unplough'd, would have " been good paſture for beaſts, or might have been converted to other good uſes."[a] Upon this motion, all the houſe bid away with the bill: but it was put to the queſtion, whether it ſhould be committed or no? Some doubt ariſing, the houſe was divided; and the Yea's were 103, the Noes 162: ſo the bill was not committed. It was afterwards put to the queſtion for ingroſſing; and, notwithſtanding Mr. Comptroller's ſpeech for the weight of it (which is not preſerved) it was deny'd, and ſo abſolutely rejected. Three days after, Sir Walter Raleigh was at the committee in the houſe, touching the ſubſidy. Here he moved them to conſider for what intent they came thither, and now in their coming, what was to be conſider'd. " For the " ſubſidy, ſaid he, the manner and quality thereof, I will now only intimate thus much to you; " that the laſt parliament, only three ſubſidies were granted, upon fear that the Spaniards were " coming; but now we ſee they are come, and have ſet foot even in the queen's territories " already; therefore, are the more of us to be reſpected and regarded. And ſeeing the ſale " of her majeſty's own jewels; the great loans her ſubjects have lent her, yet unpaid; the continual " ſelling of her lands, and decaying of her revenues; the ſparing even out of her own purſe " and apparel for our own ſakes, will not ſerve; but ſhe muſt yet be fain to call her court of " parliament for our advice and aid in this caſe; I wiſh, for my part, as a particular member " of the common-wealth, that we may not do leſs than we did before; and that we may alſo " bountifully, according to our eſtates, contribute to her majeſty's neceſſities, as they now ſtand." This ſpeech was confirm'd by many other members, and met with no oppoſition that we read of. But the manner of raiſing this ſubſidy created ſome ſhort debate; in which Sir Francis Haſtings moved, that the three pound men might be exempted; and all others, above that rate, to pay according to the rate, to make up a full ſubſidy. To this Sir Walter Raleigh anſwer'd, " If all pay, none will be aggrieved; if any be exempted, doubtleſs it will breed much grief; " the feeling will be great to thoſe three pound men that will feel any thing, but it will be no- " thing to them that know any thing." Sir Edward Hobby, who, it ſeems, ſat near the door, not hearing well this ſpeech, ſaid, " You ſhould ſpeak ſtanding, that the houſe might hear " you." Raleigh anſwer'd, " That being in a committee, he might ſpeak ſitting or ſtand- " ing:" ſo (without riſing) repeated his former words. In the end this propoſal was agreed to, and ſecretary Cecyll reported to the whole houſe, " that moſt voices concluded, there ſhould " be no exception of the three pound men, becauſe, according to their rate, ſome were aſſeſs'd " under value; beſides, ſeparation might breed emulation, ſuſpicion of partiality and confu- " ſion." Yet when Cecyll, among thoſe who lanched out,[b] carried the matter ſo high, as to ſay, " that neither pots or pans, nor diſh nor ſpoon, ſhould be ſpared, when danger is at our " elbows; nor would by any means have the three pound men excluded, becauſe he'd have the " king of Spain know, how willing we are to ſell all in defence of God's religion, our prince " and our country;" and when Mr. Francis Bacon, in his ſpeech, concluded it was " Dulcis " tractus pari jugo; therefore the poor, as well as the rich, not to be exempted:" Raleigh did anſwer; " I like it not, that the Spaniards, our enemies, ſhould know of our ſelling our pots " and pans to pay ſubſidies; well may you call it policy, as an honourable perſon alledg'd; " but I am ſure it argues poverty in the ſtate. And for the motion that was laſt made, Dulcis " tractus pari jugo: call you this par jugum, when a poor man pays as much as a rich? and " peradventure his eſtate is no better than it is ſet at, or but little better; while our eſtates are " three or four pounds[c] in the queen's books, and it is not the hundredth part of our wealth;

[b] Of whom, none more remarkable than ſerjeant Heale; who marvelled much the houſe ſhould demur upon granting this ſubſidy, or in the time of payment; " When all " we have, ſaid he, is her majeſty's; and ſhe may law- " fully, at pleaſure, take it from us: yea, ſhe has as " much right to all our lands and goods, as to any re- " venue of her crown." At which the houſe humm'd and laugh'd. " Well, all your humming, ſaid the ſerjeant, " ſhan't put me out of countenance." So to mend the matter, he told them, " he could prove his former poſition " in the time of king Henry III, k. John, k. Stephen, " &c." At this, the houſe was louder than before, till they humm'd the ſerjeant into his ſeat; but he was afterwards more particularly expos'd for theſe ſlaviſh principles.

[c] So Heywood Townſhend, fol. 204. But, thirty or forty pound, in Sir Simon Dewes, fol. 633.

" therefore

" therefore it is neither dulcis nor par." This might flow as well from the natural ſource of his own benignity, as from any compliance with the queen's inclination to favour the poorer ſort, for whom Ralegh ſeems, by her command, to have before indeed been a choſen advocate: [a] but he knowing, as well as the reſt of the members, by former experience, that ſuch a ſupply, as her majeſty now wanted, being no leſs than three hundred thouſand pounds, according to Cecyll's repreſentation, could not be raiſed, if ſuch an exemption were admitted of; the former propoſition prevail'd, and the three pound men were neceſſarily included.

When the complaint againſt monopolies was made on the 20th of November, and Dr. Bennet mention'd that of cards, I can't perceive how it could be juſtly obſerved in the journals, to make any change in the countenance of Sir Walter Ralegh; ſince in the ſame journals it is alſo obſerved, that the patent for cards was now granted to Edward Darcy. [b] But, when Mr. Martin ſpoke of a " country that groaned under the burthen of monſtrous and unconſcionable " ſubſtitutes to monopolitans of ſtarch, tin, fiſh, cloth, oil, vinegar, ſalt, and what not." Sir Walter Ralegh reply'd, " I am urged to ſpeak in two reſpects; the one, becauſe I find myſelf " touched upon in particular; the other, in that I take ſome imputation and ſlander to be " offered unto her majeſty: I mean by the gentleman who firſt mention'd tin. For that being " one of the principal commodities of this kingdom, and being in Cornwall, it has ever (ſo " long as there were any) belonged to the dukes of Cornwall; and they had ſpecial patents of " privilege. It has pleaſed her majeſty freely to beſtow on me that privilege, and that patent; " being word for word the very ſame the duke's is. And becauſe, by reaſon of my office of " Lord-warden of the Stannaries, I can ſufficiently inform this houſe of the ſtate thereof, I will " make bold to deliver it unto you. When the tin is taken out of the mine, and molten and " refin'd, then is every piece, containing a hundred weight, ſealed with the duke's ſeal. And In right of his patent for the pre-emption of tin. " by reaſon of this privilege (which I now have) he ever had the refuſal in buying thereof; " for the words of the patent are, Niſi nos emere voluimus. Now I will tell you, that before " the granting of my patent, whether tin were but at ſeventeen ſhillings, and ſo upward to fifty " ſhillings a hundred; yet the poor workman never had but two ſhillings a week, finding him- " ſelf: but ſince my patent, whoſoever will work, be tin at what price ſoever, they have four " ſhillings a week truly paid: there is no poor that will work there, but may, and have that " wages." But, notwithſtanding his merit, as well as right, Ralegh concluded, ſaying, " Yet if " all others may be repeal'd, I will give my conſent as freely to the cancelling of this, as any " member of this houſe." It is noted, that a great and uncommon ſilence followed this ſpeech. At laſt Sir Francis Haſtings ſaid, in reſpect thereto: " I joy to ſee ſo great a reformation, that " we may ſpeak quietly, and be heard peaceably; every man has not alike ſenſe or judgment, " neither is every man's memory alike. I wiſh, that if any gentleman, who ſpeaks of this, " or any other ſubject as curious, ſhall let fall any word amiſs or unpleaſing, that it may be " attributed rather to earneſtneſs, than want of duty." Throughout the further proceedings againſt the numerous monopolies now in force, we find not any mention made of his patent aforeſaid, among thoſe which were particularly promis'd to be revok'd or aboliſh'd as grievances to the ſtate. On the 24th of November, Sir Edmund Morgan and Mr. Pemberton, both members of the houſe, being ſerved with ſubpœnas to appear in the court of Chancery, the ſame day, at the ſuit of Sir Walter and Sir Carew Ralegh, they had the privilege granted them. The officers, who ſerved thoſe ſubpœnas, were taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant, but ſoon releaſed, upon pleading they knew not thoſe gentlemen to be members of parliament. [c] This is all I find of that ſuit concerning Sir Walter Ralegh. On the 2d of December, he ſpoke againſt the defects and hardſhips in a bill that was read for reformation of abuſes in inns; as that, " it would deprive thoſe, who, by their lordſhips or manors, had right to enquire into " the defaults of ſelling liquors by full meaſure, of their privilege; that, by diſabling a man " for ever after of being an inn-keeper, how detrimental it might be to the inheritance of " thoſe who had inns, ſome at a hundred pounds per annum; and how dangerous to inn-keep- " ers, who might, by the negligence of a ſervant, ſuffer: all which he left to the diſcretion " of the houſe." [d] After other like objections, by another member or two, we hear no more of it. Soon after, the means of ſuppreſſing the pirates of Dunkirk, now grown ſtrong both in arms and ſhipping, came under the conſideration of this houſe. As one remedy againſt them, it was propos'd, to reſtrain the tranſportation of ordnance, and a bill to prohibit the ſame was read a ſecond time on the 8th of December; but, before it was committed, there paſſed many ſpeeches upon this important argument. It ſeems, a patent for tranſporting them had been granted to Sir Henry Nevill, and the queen's duty thereby roſe to three thouſand pounds a year; yet this profit no ways ballanc'd the inconveniences. For, being carried into all countries that were friends with Dunkirk, and confederates with Spain, the Spaniards had ſuch plenty, that they now uſually ſold a hundred weight of iron ordnance for ſeven ducats and a half. The laws were moreover urg'd in 33 of Henry VIII, and 2 of Edward VI, which prohibited the tranſporting of gun metal; and tho' guns were not then made of iron, they now were; therefore it was within the power of thoſe laws. Sir Walter Raleigh, in approbation of this motion, ſaid, " I am ſure heretofore one ſhip of her majeſty's was able to beat ten Spaniards; but now, " by reaſon of our own ordnance, we are hardly match'd one to one. And, if the Low Coun- " tries ſhould either be ſubdued by the Spaniard, or yield unto him upon a conditional peace, " or ſhall join in amity with the French, as we ſee them daily inclining, I ſay, there is nothing " does ſo much threaten the conqueſt of this kingdom, as the tranſportation of ordnance; and " therefore I think it a good and ſpeedy courſe to proceed by way of petition, leſt we be cut " off from our deſires, either by the Upper Houſe, or before, by the ſhortneſs and ſudden end- " ing of the parliamant."[a] The generality agreed with him in the needfulneſs of reſtraining this privilege; however, they proceeded by way of bill, which paſſed the commons, but not the lords; for other buſineſs interfering, it fell aſleep till the end of the ſeſſion, and then the ſpeaker Crook, who was to repreſent it to her majeſty, forgetting his promiſe, it came to nothing.

Againſt the tranſportation of ordnance.

On the 9th of December the diſpute was renew'd, whether the ſtatute of tillage ſhould be continued? This ſtatute was made in the time of dearth, and Sir Walter Raleigh agreed with [a] Sir Walter Raleigh has alſo written upon this ſubject in two or three places. In his diſcourſe, touching a war with Spain, and the protecting of the Netherlands, written not long after he made the aforeſaid ſpeech, having told king James how he remember'd, that within theſe thirty years, two of her majeſty's ſhips would have commanded one hundred ſail of theirs; and that when he was a captain in Ireland, a hundred foot and a hundred horſe would have beaten all the force of the ſtrongeſt provinces: he adds, " but of late I have known an Eaſterling fight, " hand to hand, with one of her majeſty's ſhips; and that " the Iriſh have, in this laſt war, overthrown with even " or far leſs number. The Netherlands (continues he) in " thoſe days, had wooden guns, and the Iriſh had darts; " but the one is now furniſh'd with as great a number of " Engliſh ordnance as ourſelves, and the other with as " good pikes and muſkets as England hath." See Ralegh's three Diſcourſes, 8vo. 1702, p. 16. In another diſcourſe he afterwards writ, touching a marriage between prince Henry of England, and a daughter of Savoy, ſpeaking of the Netherlands, he has theſe words; " Whereas, " in my time, I have known one of her majeſty's ſhips " command forty of theirs to ſtrike ſail; they will now " undertake us one to one, and not give us a good mor- " row: they maſter us both in their number and in their " mariners; and they have our own ordnance to break " our own bones withal. We had reaſon to help them; " but not to help them up to that height, as to make " them able to tread upon our own heads." Thus in the old MS. of that diſcourſe, communicated by the noble earl of Oxford. Laſtly, in another diſcourſe Sir Walter Ralegh wrote after this, I mean that on the Invention of Shipping, he has more copiouſly argued upon this head. Theſe arguments I ſhall here alſo annex, both as what will exemplify the conſtancy of his judgment, and prove the genuineneſs of theſe diſcourſes; tho' two of them are poſthumous publications, and the other was never publiſh'd. " There is no ſtate, ſays he, grown in haſte, but " that of the United Provinces, eſpecially in their ſea- " forces; and by a contrary way to that of France, or " Spain; the latter by invaſion, the former by oppreſſion. " For I myſelf may remember, when one ſhip of her " majeſty's would have made forty Hollanders ſtrike ſail, " and to come to anchor; they did not then diſpute de " mari libero; but readily acknowledg'd the Engliſh to " be Domini maris Britannici." And a little further: " But whence comes this diſpute? not from the encreaſe " of numbers, not becauſe our neighbours breed more " mariners than we do, nor from the greatneſs of their " trade in all parts of the world; for the French creep " into all corners of America as they do, and the Spani- " ards and Portugueſe employ more ſhips by many (fiſh- " ing trades excepted) than the Netherlands: but it comes " from the deteſtable covetouſneſs of ſuch particular per- " ſons as have gotten licences, and given way to the " tranſporting of Engliſh ordnance. Fuit hæc ſapientia " quondam, publica privatis ſecernere, ſacra profanis; and " that in ſo great abundance, that not only our good " friends, the Hollanders and Zelanders, have furniſhed " themſelves, and have them lying on their wharfs to " ſell to others; but all other nations have had from us, " not only to furniſh their fleets, but to garniſh all their " forts and other places, fortifying their coaſts; without " which, the Spaniſh king durſt not have diſmounted ſo " many pieces of braſs in Naples, and elſewhere, to arm " his great fleet in 1588. But it was directly proved in " the lower houſe of parliament, Anno .... of queen " Elizabeth, that there were landed in Naples above 140 " Culverins Engliſh; ſince which time, and not long ſince, " it is lamentable that ſo many have been tranſported into " Spain. But thoſe belike who then determin'd it, and " the tranſporters, have now forſaken the country; and " tho' the procurers remain, I am reſolved they alſo have " forſaken the care of his majeſty's eſtate, and the ho- " nour of this nation. I urge not this point, as thinking " it unfit to furniſh his majeſty's good friends and allies, " who have had with us one common enemy for many " years. But all politic ſtates have well obſerved this " precept, Ut ſic tractarent amicum, tanquam inimicum " futurum; for, what are all the ſhips in the world to be " valued at, other than a company of floating tubs, were " they not furniſh'd with ordnance, either to offend others, " or defend themſelves? If a ſhip of 1000 tons had in " her 1000 muſketeers, and never a great gun; with one " Crumſter, carrying ten or thirteen Culverins, ſhe may " be beaten to pieces, and her men ſlaughter'd. Certain- " ly the advantage, which the Engliſh had by their bows " and arrows in former times, was never ſo great as we " might now have had by our iron ordnance, if we had " either kept it within the land, kept it from our ene- " mies, or imparted it to our friends moderately: for, " as by the former, we obtained many notable victories, " and made ourſelves maſters of many parts of France; " ſo by the latter, we might have commanded the ſeas, " and thereby the trade of the world itſelf. But we have " now, to our future prejudice, and how far to our pre- " judice I know not, forged hammers, and deliver'd them " out of our hands to break our own bones withal." See judicious and ſelect Eſſays by Sir Walter Ralegh. 8vo. 1650, p. 27, 32, &c.

thoſe who were for having it now repeal'd. His reaſon for it was, becauſe "many poor men "are not able to find ſeed to ſow to much ground, as they are bound to plough, which they "muſt do, or incur the penalty of the law. Beſides, all nations abound with corn. France "offer'd the queen to ſerve Ireland with corn for ſixteen ſhillings a quarter, which is but two "ſhillings the buſhel; if we ſhould ſell it ſo here, the ploughman would be beggar'd. The "Low-countryman and the Hollander, who never ſow corn, have, by their induſtry, ſuch plen- "ty, that they will ſerve other nations. The Spaniard, who often wants corn, had we never "ſo much plenty, would never be beholden to the Engliſhman for it, neither to the Low-coun- "tryman, nor to France, but will fetch it even of the very Barbarian; and that which the "Barbarian has been ſuing for theſe two hundred years (I mean for traffick of corn into Spain) "this king, in policy, has ſet at liberty of himſelf, becauſe he will not be beholden to other "nations. And therefore, I think, the beſt courſe is, to ſet it at liberty, and leave every man "free, which is the deſire of a true Engliſhman." [a] After other ſpeeches, it was put to the queſtion, whether the bill of tillage ſhould be committed? and it paſs'd in the affirmative. But, it having pleas'd her majeſty to licenſe Mr. Dormer, under her letters patents, with a Non-obſtante, this ſtatute, to encloſe three hundred acres of ground, he prayed the houſe to admit of this proviſo; therefore it was put to the queſtion, and carried. The Noes demanded a diviſion of the houſe: whereupon Mr. Richard Martin obſerv'd, the Noes had always carried it in this parliament when they came to a diviſion; many ſtaying with the Yea's, becauſe they would not loſe their places. Sir Walter Ralegh roſe to anſwer him; but many hurrying out to the diviſion, he and Cecyll, it ſeems, took ſome diſpleaſure; for, after the diviſion, when Mr. Dormer's proviſo carried it again by a majority, whereby the houſe was ſet quiet, Sir Walter Ralegh ſaid, "I thought I had deſerved of the houſe to have been heard to ſpeak, as well as he that ſpake "before the diviſion; and in that I offer'd to ſpeak, and was not heard, I had wrong: for "him that laſt ſpake, it was out of humour, and not out of judgment. Notwithſtanding, I "think it a monopoly, and the ſpeech to be both perſuaſion, and to lay a great imputation up- "on the houſe: and this is all I would have ſaid before."

For liberty of ſpeech.

Againſt an encloſure.

Next day came on the queſtion, whether the tax for Dover-haven ſhould be continued by force of the ſtatute; which was three-pence a ton for the burthen of every ſhip. One member, Mr. Swale, objected, that the charge amounted to at leaſt a thouſand marks a year, yet the haven was never the better; and that it was grown a proverbial wiſh of any tax, that it would not continue like that of Dover-haven. But Mr. John Boys ſhewed the conveniency of this haven, and how many hundred pounds worth of ſtones were ready to repair it: Sir John For-teſcue alſo obſerv'd, what large ſhips of burthen it would receive; how neceſſary it is for the paſſage of all merchants: as alſo that the tax was ſmall, and the time might be when it would need a great tax at one time. Laſtly, Mr. Comptroller having likewiſe expreſs'd how imprudent it was to take away this tax, now they were debating how to defend themſelves from the Dunkirkers, which would weaken the moſt neceſſary haven of England, Sir Walter Ralegh was more particular in theſe words: "There are divers havens which have been famous, and now "are grown to decay, as Tinmouth, Seaton and Winchelſey; Rye is of little receipt; Sandwich "(as a burgeſs of that town, Mr. Peak, ſaid this parliament) is even a going. The tax being "employed as it ſhould be, I hold it both good and neceſſary; and there is no trade of fiſher- "men to Newfoundland, but by this haven of Dover; which, if the tax be taken away, and "that go to decay, her majeſty ſhall loſe one of the beſt and moſt neceſſary havens of Eng- "land, which hath all the commodities that Mr. Comptroller ſhewed, and lies oppoſite to all "our enemies countries, who may ſoon be with us, and we not able to reſiſt them, or help "ourſelves, ſhould we want this haven. I think it therefore fit this matter ſhould be con- "ſider'd of, and committed:" and ſo it was. [b]

For the tax to repair Dover-haven.

The 12th of December was read, the third time, a bill for the more diligent reſort to church on Sundays, which produced ſeveral ſpeeches in the houſe. The recuſants were very numerous at this time, no leſs than fifteen hundred in Yorkſhire, as Dr. Bennet affirm'd, which might be one reaſon for now urging this bill; but thoſe, who were no ways popiſhly inclin'd, perceived

[b] Idem, fol. 309. See further on this ſubject, Sir Walter Ralegh's Memorial to queen Elizabeth, touching the port of Dover; being a brief diſcourſe, declaring how honourable and profitable to her majeſty, and how neceſſary and commodious for the realm, the making of Dover-haven ſhall be, and in what ſort; with how little charge and great perfection the ſame may be accompliſh'd: printed in a pamphlet, entitled, An Eſſay on Ways and Means to maintain the Honour and Safety of England, &c. publiſh'd by Sir Henry Sheers, Knt. 4to. 1701. There was a certificate, touching Dover-haven, from Mr. William Borough, author of ſeveral other maritime diſcourſes, in a volume of Sir Francis Walſingham's State-Papers, relating to the navy, fol. 216; as I find in his Table-book of their contents (before-mention'd) p. 41.

ſeveral inſufferable defects in it; as Mr. John Bond, who, among other arguments, was not for expoſing the Eccleſiaſtical authority among their enemies, as more impotent than a twelve-penny fine. At laſt there was a proviſo added to it, "That if any man came eight times a "year to church, and ſaid the uſual divine ſervice twice every Sunday, and holy-day in his "houſe, with his whole family, that ſhould be a ſufficient diſpenſation." But the bill, weak enough of itſelf, was overthrown by this conjunction, after Sir Walter Ralegh had ſhewed, "That all the church-wardens of every ſhire muſt come to the aſſizes, to give information to "the grand jury. Say then there be a hundred and twenty pariſhes in a ſhire, there muſt now "come extraordinarily two hundred and forty church-wardens; and ſay, that but two in a "pariſh offend in a quarter of a year, that makes four hundred and eighty perſons (with the "offenders) to appear: what great multitudes this will bring together! what quarelling and "danger may happen, beſides giving authority to a mean church-warden! how prejudicial this "may be!" with divers other reaſons againſt it, and inſtances of the ambiguities and equivocations in it: and as for the proviſo newly added, "it was a plain toleration from coming "to church; and the parſon could not prevent or conſtrain any, if they read ſervice at home." Hereupon it was put to the queſtion, and the houſe was divided; the Yeas went forth, and were a hundred and five, and the Noes within were a hundred and ſix: ſo it was thrown out by one voice. But the Yeas urging they had the ſpeaker's voice, which would make it even; this grew a queſtion, whether he had a vote? Sir Edward Hobby thought he had one; but Sir Walter Ralegh argued, "that he was foreclos'd of his voice, by taking that place "which it had pleaſed them to impoſe upon him; and that he was to be indifferent for both "parties;" withal ſhewed, "that by the old order of the houſe, the bill was loſt:" the ſpeaker himſelf confirm'd his obſervation, and confeſs'd, he had not, by cuſtom, any vote. Then Mr. Boyer, ſecretary to the lord-treaſurer Buckhurſt, would have retrieved it, by ſuggeſting, there was ſome foul play; declaring, a member was pulled back by the ſleeve at going out, and charged Mr. Dale of the Middle-Temple: to which Sir Walter Ralegh anſwer'd, in a humorous manner, "Why! if it pleaſe you, it is a ſmall matter to pull one by the ſleeve, for "ſo I have done myſelf oftentimes;" which, tho' a familiar phraſe for checking or reproving one's ſelf for any weakneſs or error, yet a very diſingenuous and incongruous conſtruction was forced upon it by the Comptroller and Cecyll; as if, "large was his conſcience, or very flexible, "that, in a matter of this conſequence, would be drawn backwards or forwards by the ſleeve," Ralegh took no notice of them, and the ſpeaker being allowed to have no voice, the bill was thrown up, and they took their leave of it. Beſides the ſpeeches Ralegh made in parliament, which we have thus drawn together, as far as they are upon record, he appears in the committees of many other bills, and in ſeveral conferences with the lords, as may be ſeen in the journal books of both houſes; but being only mention'd in general, we need not here be ſo particular as to recite them: therefore ſhall only obſerve, that the commons, having granted the queen a liberal ſubſidy, and her majeſty given her royal aſſent to nineteen publick and ten private acts, this laſt parliament, in her reign, was diſſolv'd on the 19th of December.

Againſt the defects in the Sabbath bill.

In the beginning of the year 1602, Mr. Carew's Dedication of his Survey of Cornwall is dated, as was before intimated; wherein that author has, with ſuch energy, copied forth the moſt amiable diſtinctions of Ralegh's mind: this agreeable picture thereof, and the many other noble attitudes in which we have ſeen it diſplay'd, have made me inquiſitive what portraitures remained of his perſon, that we might better judge of the correſpondence between them; how well, in one aſpect, the ſprightleneſs of genius conſorted with the ſolidity of judgment; how well, in one figure, the roughneſs of war, with the ſplendor and magnificence of courts. I have, at laſt, had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing theſe characters united in that portrait of Sir Walter Ralegh, ſtill remaining with the deſcendants of his family.[a] It is a half length, repreſenting him in the ſilver armour before-mention'd, and richly adorn'd in the ſkirts, the ſword and belt with diamonds, rubies and pearls. It ſeems, by the darkneſs and fulneſs of the hair, with the freſhneſs and clearneſs of the countenance, to have been the picture of him before his Guianian expedition above related; but the inſcription, upon another very old draught in the ſame poſture and habit, mentions his government of Jerſey.[b] Farther, to deſcribe this piece here, will be needleſs, ſince it is now brought into ſculpture by an excellent hand, and ready to be made publick. Another painting I have alſo ſeen of him, and this is at full length; probably an original. It agrees very well with the foregoing, in the form of the face, and colour of the hair and beard; at leaſt as far as may be expected from the hands of different artiſts, ſome alteration perhaps by repairs, and ſome difference of years in the object; whereby he ſeems, in this laſt, more ruddy and tann'd than the other. For, by the inſcription thereon, partly ſtill legible, it appears, that this picture was painted in this laſt year of the queen, above-mention'd; and that his ſon Walter, who is likewiſe here drawn by him, was then eight years of age. Further, in this picture the ſtature of Sir Walter Ralegh meaſures about ſix feet, is well ſhap'd, and not too ſlender: he is apparell'd in a white ſattin pink'd veſt, cloſe ſleev'd to the wriſt; and over the body of it a brown doublet, finely flower'd and embroider'd with pearl; his belt of the ſame colour and ornament, in which hangs his ſword; and on the other ſide, over the right hip, is ſeen the pommel of his dagger. In his hat, which he has on, is a little black feather, with a large ruby and pearl-drop at the bottom of the ſprig in place of the button. His trunks or breeches, with his ſtockings and ribbon-garters, fring'd at the end, are all white; and buff ſhoos, tied with white ribbons. His ſon, ſtanding under his left elbow, is fair and pret- His ſon's.

tily featur'd; dreſs'd in a blue ſilk jacket and trowſes, guarded down with narrow ſilver gal-loon; ſtockings blue, and white ſhoos; gloves in the right hand, hat or cap in the left, and a ſilver ſword by his ſide.[a] A year before this, the lady Ralegh's picture was alſo painted, as appears by the date upon it. It is a half-length like the firſt, but painted on board; a high finiſh'd piece, in the labour'd manner of thoſe times, by ſome maſterly hand; has been well kept, and is doubtleſs an original. It repreſents her a fair handſome woman, turn'd perhaps And his of thirty. She has on, a dark colour'd hanging-ſleeve robe, tuffted on the arms; and under lady's.
it, a cloſe-bodied gown of white ſattin, flower'd with black, with cloſe ſleeves down to her wriſt; has a rich ruby in her ear, bedrop'd with large pearls; a lac'd whiſk riſing above the ſhoulders; her boſom uncover'd, and a jewel hanging thereon; with a large chain of pearl round her neck, down to her waiſt.[b] Theſe are all the paintings I have ſeen of them, that I can count authentic, or moſt likely to bear any true reſemblance. But have been credibly inform'd of a picture of Sir Walter Ralegh, in miniature, taken not long before his death; and another at large, repreſenting him alſo in a white ſuit, which he had, beſet with jewels, to the value of threeſcore thouſand pounds; and that one diamond thereof, worth a hundred His rich ap-pounds, remained in the family till the beginning of the late queen's reign. In this picture parel.
there is a ribbon-garter, fring'd at the ends, ty'd about his left arm. This, according to the tradition that remains in his family, was his lady's (otherwiſe might be thought one of the queen's favours at the Tilt-Yard) which he brought one morning, when he was oblig'd to attend her majeſty early, as a token, that, for diſpatch, he had rode a hundred and twenty miles ſince he took leave of her late the night before. But ſuch a number of jewels, which might be call'd extravagance in others, was no expence to Sir Walter Ralegh, who had many other kinds of treaſure, as well as this in Spaniſh prizes, or otherwiſe in traffick with foreign nations; and as for his ſtately appearance in, by wearing of them upon ſome ſpecial occaſions, it is not only confirm'd by circumſtances, in part before-mention'd, but alſo by ſome authors; who are not expected to take notice of it with great commendation: yet the Jeſuit Drexelius might perhaps have found more dazling examples to dreſs out his Dialogue upon Attire, nearer the time he wrote it,[c] and to have parallel'd with the Roman emperors he produces, than Ralegh; even tho' Sir Walter might, upon ſome great aſſemblies at court, have his very ſhoos bedeck'd with precious ſtones, that exceeded the value of ſix thouſand ſix hundred pieces of gold, as that author relates.[d] All I think here further obſervable upon the pictures of Sir Walter Ralegh, is, that after ſo many which may be called genuine, and many more pretended to be ſo, ſtill in being, there have been ſuch frequent occaſions of engraving his effigies for his books; yet we have never had, till now, more than two ſculptures, which can pretend to have been taken from any paintings; that even theſe are different from any above deſcrib'd; and that all the reſt of the copper prints we have of him, whereof near half a ſcore might be reckon'd, are copies only from the laſt of thoſe two.[a]

AMONG the reſt of the particulars, we ſhall briefly relate of Sir Walter Ralegh, in this laſt year of the queen's reign; a voyage, which he now ſet out for the ſupply of his colony in Virginia, is principally to be remember'd. For tho' he had made an aſſignment of his patent to other undertakers, as is before obſerv'd; yet they making no ſucceſsful progreſs, he was ſo regardful of the Engliſh he had planted there, that he ſent to them almoſt every other year, even from the time of the ſaid aſſignment. For, beſides the five voyages before epitomiz'd, which himſelf chiefly was at the expence of, for the firſt plantation of Virginia, we are well inform'd of five voyages more; which, ſince thoſe, he ſet forth thither[b] for the relief of his countrymen, as well as for further diſcoveries of thoſe parts, and alliance with the people; and that the laſt of theſe voyages, under the command of captain Samuel Mace, was made this year. In all which, Sir Walter Ralegh might very well have diſburs'd forty thouſand pounds, as was before obſerv'd; ſince, in a French author (lately come to hand) I have found the two firſt voyages only to Virginia coſt him and his friends threeſcore thouſand crowns:[c] yet were not the Engliſh ſo ſecurely eſtabliſh'd in this moſt promiſing plantation, as Sir Walter Ralegh would have had them; for, from the ſhort account we have of this laſt voyage, and other circumſtances, we may obſerve the ſaid colony was much impair'd by the barbarous Indians, as indeed Ralegh's purſe ſeems alſo to have been by theſe frequent communications to it. Nor was it without much blood, as well as money, that this ſettlement was at laſt fix'd by the ſucceeding undertakers in the next reign: and all owing to the want of that timely and competent aſſiſtance from the queen or ſtate, whereby the moſt worthy attempts for the publick good were even in theſe, as well as other times, ſo generally ſtarv'd. But Ralegh afterwards gave ſome emphatical reaſons for this unhappineſs; whence we may evidently pe rceive, it was to the queen's conſulting ſo much, and relying upon the perſuaſions of her ſcribes, men unexperienc'd in all warlike or adventurous enterprizes, narrow domeſtick politicians, or mere courtiers, who were moſt conſtant at her ear; that ſhe ſo frequently did things by halves,[d] as well in conqueſts and diſcoveries, as in rewards and preferments, eſpecially of military men.[e]

The number of voyages he ſet forth to Virginia.

Thus

[a] Of theſe two ſculptures or prints of Sir Walter Ralegh, the firſt is an extraordinary rarity; inſomuch, that many virtuoſi and antiquaries, who have ſearched after, and collected the graved heads of eminent perſons, for many years together, have not ſo much as ever heard of it: the felicity and the favour are therefore the greater, that I have been oblig'd with the ſight of it by general Dormer, who has procur'd a freſh and fair impreſſion of it from France into his choice and coſtly collections; for it is a French piece, in the Octavo ſize, and graved by Thomas Leau, an artiſt, who was encouraged by ſome of our nobility in theſe times for the excellence of his hand. It repreſents him in a cloſe-bodied ſilk coat, laced; agrees pretty well in the features with thoſe before deſcrib'd, eſpecially the high forehead and cornering up of the hair above the right temple. It has a compartment or group at the bottom, diſplaying his victory over the fleet in the bay of Cadiz; yet, in the large Latin inſcription, expreſſing his titles and offices of command, there is mention made of his government of Jerſey: ſo I conclude it was graved between his preferment thereto, and the queen's death. The other print of him, is that which we ſee prefix'd to moſt of the editions of his Hiſtory of the World, whether to the firſt edition I am not yet certain, the oldeſt that I have ſeen being among the heads, annexed to Henry Holland's Baſilogia, was graved by Simon Paſs in the year 1617, repreſenting him in a cloſe-bodied ſuit, thickly laced; a full laced ruff and truncheon in his hand: alſo when he was more aged and corpulent, than we ſee him in any of thoſe before-mention'd. By the viſible eraſement of a long inſcription that was at the bottom, for the ſubſtitution of that which is more brief, the plate ſhould ſeem to have been graved before that year; but by the truncheon in his hand, not till he had his command as general for his laſt expedition; yet, being probably taken from ſome authentic painting, it lay moſt ready to be copied, when any print was wanting for his leſſer works. This is all I ſhall here obſerve upon the pictures of Sir Walter Ralegh; and, for much of this, we are obliged to the knowledge and induſtry of the ingenious Mr. Vertue.

[b] See an excellent diſcourſe upon the benefits that may grow to England by American plantations, entitled, Virginia's Verger; in Purchas's Pilgrims, vol. 4.

[c] This particular I find in that ſcarce book, mention'd before in this life, fol. 34. entitled, L'Hiſtoire Notable de la Floride, &c. 8vo. Paris 1586, dedicated by M. Baſanier, an eminent mathematician, A illuſtre et vertueux Seigneur Walter Ralegh Chevalier Anglois, &c. That editor, in this dedication, expreſſing, among other commendations, the laudable and unſhaken conſtancy wherewith Ralegh perſever'd, in advancing the honour and profit of his country, inſtances as moſt evident and freſh in memory, Les deux voyages faits depuis deux ans ença, par vos vaſſeaux, vers les parties occidentalles; ou vous & aucuns de vos amys n'avez moins employe de Soixante Mil' eſcus. This dedication is followed with ſome Latin verſes on Sir Walter Ralegh, by Johannes Auratus, the French king's poet and interpreter of the Greek tongue, an epigram in Latin, and an anagram upon Sir Walter Ralegh's name, in French, by Martin Baſanier: And laſtly, another Latin poem, in praiſe of thoſe who had made diſcoveries in the new world, by Richard Hakluyt, then in France; from all which it will appear, how highly Sir Walter Ralegh was diſtinguiſh'd by his ſaid contemporaries among and even above the preceding diſcoverers of unknown countries. For the ſight and uſe of this ſcarce treatiſe among others, as well as ſeveral curious obſervations relating to Sir Walter Ralegh, I muſt acknowledge myſelf much beholden to the rare library and courteous communications of Sir Hans Sloane.

Thus thoſe ſpeculative counſellors, tho' they could not hinder brave and active ſpirits from budding out into noble beginnings, of moſt hopeful benefit to the common-wealth; yet could, by ſtopping the channel of ſupplies or encouragements, blite them from advancing to any fruitful or profitable concluſions; and this, only to bring down thoſe of ſuperior ſervice and merit, to a level with themſelves.

WHETHER the expence of thoſe voyages was the cauſe of Sir Walter Ralegh's ſelling, about this time, his eſtate, or ſome part of it in Ireland, is not ſo expreſly told us, as that it was become leſs advantageous to him ſince the late rebellion in that kingdom. But we find, that a little before Sir George Carew, now preſident of Munſter, took the caſtle of Carrigfoyl Kerry, Mr. Richard Boyle (afterwards earl of Cork) not only bought a ſhip of Sir Walter Ralegh's, call'd the Pilgrim, but ſoon after the ſaid preſident conquer'd Bere-haven caſtle, he, having adviſed the ſaid Mr. Boyle to buy alſo Sir Walter's lands in Munſter, ſent him into England with two letters; the one to ſecretary Cecyll, giving an account of Mr. Boyle's abilities, deſired, that he would introduce him to Sir Walter Ralegh, and recommended him to this great man (ſays my author) as a proper purchaſer of his ſaid lands; the other letter was written, by Sir George Carew, to Sir Walter Ralegh himſelf, acquainting him, that the bearer was capable of making the purchaſe; and that he thought he might be willing to diſpoſe of it, ſince the management thereof, in thoſe turbulent times, gave him a great deal of trouble, and the income it produced was very inconſiderable: ſo, after a meeting, the bargain was ſtruck up, and conveyances executed. Theſe lands, ſoon after in the peaceable times, became a great eſtate to Mr. Boyle: and this purchaſe, as he afterwards gratefully remember'd in the Memoirs he wrote of his own life when he was earl of Cork, was the third addition and riſe to his eſtate. [a]

Sells his eſtate in Ireland.

As for the eſtate at Sherborne, it appears, he now ſettled it upon his ſon Walter; and that the deeds were drawn in Midſummer, this preſent year, for ſo we have it from his own words. [b] This ſettlement, as I underſtand it, was of the remainder of the leaſe for ninety-nine years: for tho' the biſhop of Sarum, Dr. Henry Cotton, had the laſt year aſſign'd over to the queen, the fee and inheritance alſo of the ſaid premiſſes, and her majeſty granted the ſame by her letters patent to Sir Walter Ralegh before her death, yet he did not make them over to his ſon, till the ſeventh year of her ſucceſſor. [c] The reaſon of ſettling his eſtate upon his ſon at this time, appears alſo to have riſen from a challenge, which he had lately received from Sir Amias Preſton (who had been knighted at Cadiz by the earl of Eſſex ſince we laſt ſpoke of him) and which Ralegh ſays himſelf, "he intended to anſwer." [d] The cauſe of their quarrel I never could meet with in print or manuſcript; yet conceive Ralegh had good reaſon on his ſide, becauſe he afterwards ſhewed publickly himſelf, how deliberate he was in his preparations for it, by ſorting his writings, and how reſolved, by ſettling his eſtate. [e] But from what excellent hands ſoever Dr. Fuller received his information, that, upon ſome diſtaſte, Sir Amias ſent Ralegh this challenge; we may be pretty certain from what Ralegh has mention'd, that the ſaid information, or this author's account of it, is erroneous, where he adds, "that Sir Walter declin'd it." Indeed, I agree he might do ſo, "without any abatement to his valour, "wherein he had abundantly ſatisfied all poſſibility of ſuſpicion, and with great advancement "of his judgment; for having (continues Fuller) a fair and fixed eſtate, with wife and children "(child he ſhould have ſaid) being a privy-counſellor (here he miſtakes again) and Lord-warden "of the Stannaries;" my ſaid author thinks, "Sir Walter looked upon it as an uneven lay "to ſtake himſelf againſt Sir Amias, a private and ſingle perſon, tho' of good birth and cou- "rage; yet of no conſiderable eſtate." [f] But if Ralegh did accept of the challenge, as it appears plainly he did, when he might have had ſuch fair reaſons of evaſion; thoſe inequalities

"the proſperous actions are ſo exceedingly priz'd, the actors "are ſo unproſperous and neglected. The cauſe, I ſay, "which hath wrought one and the ſame effect in all "times, and among all nations, is this; that thoſe, who "are neareſt the perſon of princes (which martial men "ſeldom are) can, with no good grace, commend, or at "leaſt magnify, a profeſſion far more noble than their "own; ſeeing therein, they ſhould only remind their "maſters of the wrong they did unto others, in giving "leſs honour and reward to men of far greater deſerving, "and of far greater uſe, than themſelves." Hiſtory of the World, lib. 5. cap. 6. ſect. 2.

But, it ſeems, the ſaid earl of Cork was afterwards ſadly plunder'd of his great eſtate; for, at the breaking out of the civil wars, he wrote theſe words in a letter to another nobleman. "Thus your lordſhip "ſees in what miſerable condition we are fighting, night "and day, to preſerve ourſelves and our caſtles; for all "we had without doors is loſt; and poor I, that, beſides "my houſe, demeſnes, parks, iron-works, fiſhings, "and other commodities, had a revenue of fifty "pounds per diem, cannot now truly ſay, that I have fifty "pounds per annum in certain revenue." in in Preſton will either prove Sir Walter a generous adverſary, or that the injury he received from Sir Amias was indiſpenſable. Now this repreſentation ſeems to have been officiouſly and unneceſſarily ſhaped to make Ralegh's actions conformable with his writings; for (continues our ſaid author) "this is conſonant to what he has written ſo judiciouſly about duels, condemning "thoſe for ill honours where the hangman gives the garland."[a] However, they were afterwards reconcil'd, as Fuller concludes; and, upon the whole, Sir Walter Ralegh ſeems to have ſhewn a much more creditable conduct herein, than Sir Francis Vere a little while before had done in the difference between him and a certain nobleman.[b]

But here we are no longer to take notice of ſuch open adverſaries; for now, in the very cloſe of this year, on the 24th of March, ends the long reign of glorious Elizabeth, and now ſets the ſun of Ralegh's external honour and felicity; yet, like that ever active planet, will ſhine reſplendently to the heavens, when he is clouded or eclipſed to mankind. How he fell into this eclipſe, record, the only, or greateſt luminary of time paſt, does but dimly or doubtfully diſcover. All we can do, is diligently to aſſemble every unextinguiſh'd ſpark which darts any light this way; then ſee if they will afford that guidance to the truth, by being congregated, which they have not yet been obſerv'd to yield aſunder. And firſt, we may remember to have before read of the prepoſſeſſions which Eſſex is affirm'd to have inſtill'd unto king James againſt Ralegh; and, after the earl's death, there are ſeveral circumſtances implying that Cecyll did the like. For tho' Cecyll and Ralegh join'd againſt Eſſex and his faction; yet, when theſe were overthrown, they divided, and ſeem to have had a trial of ſkill with one another. And one author ſays, that "Ralegh, wanting ſtrength, tho' not wit, to be the treaſurer's rival, "periſh'd, becauſe not thought to own humility enough to be his ſervant; it being more ſafe "at court to have many enemies of equal power, than one falſe ambitious friend that has at-"tained to the abſoluteneſs of command."[c] In ſhort, Cecyll ſeems to have uſed thoſe arts of inſinuation with king James before his coming into England; to which Ralegh could not bend himſelf. That he then held clandeſtine correſpondences with Scotland, is apparent from that ſtory in Sir Henry Wotton, who tells us, "that her majeſty, taking the air on Black-heath, "attended by Cecyll when the poſt rode by; and, hearing he came from Scotland, ſhe called "for his packet: Cecyll, tho' he knew it contained letters, which, to diſcover, were as ſo "many ſerpents, yet, making more ſhew of diligence than doubt, to obey, called in great "haſte for a knife to rip it up; but, approaching at ſome diſtance with it, he told the queen "it looked and ſmelled ſo ill favour'dly, coming out of the filthy budget, that it muſt needs "be air'd firſt, becauſe he knew how offenſive ill ſcents were to her majeſty: ſo got opportu-"nity to ſeparate what he would not have ſeen,"[d] and ſhe ſmelt nothing of the matter. One talent above the reſt Cecyll was not wanting in to recommend him to this new ſoveraign; and this was ſuch a faculty of diſcovering plots, as if he thought he ſhould be looked on as uſeleſs without them. For, as a noble author obſerves, "It ſeemed as neceſſary for him, that there "ſhould be treaſons, as for the ſtate, that they ſhould be prevented. And, tho' he created "none, yet he fomented ſome conſpiracies, that he might give frequent evidences of his loy-"alty; having not the advantage of others in perſon to gain eſtimation, therefore did it by "theſe eminent ſervices:"[e] and as for king James, he was ſo apprehenſive, ſo ſuſceptible of ſuch impreſſions, that, when he was but croſs'd or diſturb'd in his ſports, he would charge people with treaſon: nay, we are particularly told by thoſe who were otherwiſe friends to his memory, that his carver, once at table, giving him accidentally a nick on the finger (as he was routing in the diſh) his majeſty, at the ſight of his own blood, could not forbear calling out treaſon; and that Guſtavus Adolphus, king of Sweeden, was wont to make himſelf merry with this expreſſion: and all this inſtanced, by my ſaid author, to ſhew, that for any clamour of this a This curious and copious digreſſion againſt duels, which that author alludes to, is in Sir Walter Ralegh's Hiſtory of the World, lib. V. cap. III. S. XVII. ſect. 2. Sir Walter has alſo, in his inſtructions to his ſon, written a chapter againſt Private Quarrels; in which he no leſs wiſely, than bravely, ſays, "Thou ſhalt be in as much "danger in contending with a brawler in a private quar-"rel, as in a battle, wherein thou may'ſt get honour to "thyſelf, and ſafety to thy prince and country; but, if "thou be once engaged, carry thyſelf bravely, that they "may fear thee after." And a little further, "I would "not have thee, for any reſpect, loſe thy reputation, or "endure publick diſgrace; for better it were not to live, "than to live a coward, if the offence proceed not from "thyſelf; if it does, it ſhall be better to compound it "upon good terms, than to hazard thyſelf; for, if thou "overcome, thou art under the cruelty of the law; if "thou art overcome, thou art dead or diſhonour'd, &c." kind, king James's word was no ſlander.[a] But more directly to our purpoſe there is another writer, who, making ſome critical enquiriy into the preliminaries of Sir Walter's fall, ſays, "Sir Robert Cecyll, principal ſecretary of ſtate, fearing the great abilities of Ralegh, and being "wearied with the troubleſome impertinences of Gray and Cobham; all which had joined with "him in deſign againſt the earl of Eſſex, their common enemy; had done their errand to king "James (whoſe counſels he deſir'd to engroſs to himſelf alone) before his coming into Eng-"land."[b] And when the king was arriv'd, there was matter enough to exaſperate Cecyll againſt Ralegh, if, through any deſign of recrimination, Sir Walter did preſent to his majeſty a memorial; wherein "he reflected heavily upon Cecyll in the matter of Eſſex; and, vindi-"cating himſelf, threw the whole blame upon the other: further laying open (at the end "thereof) the conduct of Cecyll and his father alſo, in the matter of the queen of Scots (his "majeſty's mother) bitterly charging the death of this unfortunate queen upon them." However, ſays my author, "this had no influence over the king, and only irritated Cecyll the more "againſt Ralegh."[c] But what ſeems ſufficient to have incenſed the king alſo againſt Ralegh, was his being of that party, who, in regard of the inveterate feuds between England and Scotland, deſired the king might be obliged to articles; for, as another writes, "among theſe "noble and publick ſpirits, were Sir John Forteſcue, Sir Walter Ralegh, the lord Cobham, "&c. all frowned upon after by the king, who had yet the luck to live ſo long as to change "his opinion, and wiſh the number of his countrymen had been limited, and they not ſuf-"fer'd, like locuſts, to devour this kingdom."[d] There were not wanting ſtill other particulars, which might render Ralegh obnoxious to a man of the king's jealous diſpoſition; for "he had (at the time of his majeſty's acceſſion to the throne) the daughter and heir of Baſſet "to his Ward, who was to be married to his ſon Walter, her eſtate worth three thouſand "pounds per annum; but ſhe was (after his condemnation, we ſuppoſe) taken from him, "and married to Mr. Henry Howard, who died ſuddenly at table; and ſhe was afterwards "married to the earl of Newcaſtle, who profeſs'd he would never have wedded her, if young "Walter Ralegh had been alive; conceiving her, before God, to be his wife, for they were "married as much as children could be."[e] Now theſe Baſſets, as we find elſewhere, were thoſe of Umberlegh and Heanton-Court in Devonſhire; who, being deſcended from the Plantagenets, laid ſome claim at this very time of the king's entrance to the crown of England.[f] But whatever diſcountenance Ralegh might receive at his firſt meeting of the king, in his journey from Scotland,[g] whence he ſet out on the 5th of April 1603, and arrived at Theobalds, which was Cecyll's ſeat, on the 3d of May, and at London four days after; it ſeems not to have amounted to a peremptory diſmiſſion from his majeſty's ſervice or preſence: for we are told, "the king uſed Ralegh for ſome weeks with great kindneſs, and was pleaſed to acknowledge "divers preſents which he had received from him being in Scotland; for which he gave him "thanks. But, finding him a martial man, addicted to foreign affairs and great actions, he "feared leſt he ſhould engage him in a war."[h] That Ralegh was in company with the king;

But Stow ſays, when the king came towards York, his train increaſed by ſuch numbers of gentlemen from the South, as made proviſion ſo dear, that he was fain to publiſh an inhibition againſt the inordinate acceſs: ſo that many were ſtop'd in their way. Thus perhaps the countermand might not be particular of any perſon; however ſome, as we ſee, apply it to Ralegh, as others have alſo done to Cobham; affirming, the king check'd him for his abſence from his charge at that dangerous time, being then Lord-warden of the Cinque-Ports. and that ſome of his converſation turned upon this ſubject we have from his own words, where he ſays, "I offer'd his majeſty, at my uncle Carew's, to carry two thouſand men to invade "the Spaniards without the king's charge."[a] And this agrees with his writing a diſcourſe, which he did or intended to deliver to his majeſty againſt the peace with Spain now in treaty, which ſeems to be the ſame that was a hundred years afterwards publiſh'd by his grandſon.[b] Herein he adviſed his majeſty to protect the Netherlands; for, ſays he, a poor neighbour's houſe, ſet on fire, is to be better guarded or watched, than a great city afar off. Herein he perſuades the king to deliberate, and not come to a haſty concluſion of peace with the Spaniards; for, when the houſe is built, it is ill mending the foundation. Herein he ſays, "I dare not "write all I deſire; for I know not to whoſe hands theſe may come. This I beſeech your "majeſty to know, that it proceeds from an humble and a faithful heart, which your majeſty "cannot beat from the love of your royal perſon and good eſtate."[c] And laſtly, I ſhall obſerve, that herein he alſo mentions another diſcourſe, "how war may be made againſt Spain "and the Indies; which I will, ſays he, alſo preſent your majeſty, if you will vouchſafe the "reading thereof:"[d] but this, I think, has never appear'd in print. The former of theſe diſcourſes is humbly and diſcreetly addreſs'd with variety of arguments and obſervations from his own knowledge and experience; alſo ſtrengthened with many hiſtorical examples of foreign countries, and political maxims or ſentences from the ancient claſſicks: all which he had plentifully at command in any topic he undertook to write, or even ſpeak of: ſuch the extenſiveneſs of his remarks and his reading; ſuch the felicity of his memory and talents of application. But, if reaſon would have prevail'd, it was not wanting alſo from other hands; ſo that Sir Walter Ralegh was not ſingular in his diſſuaſions of the king, but had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing foreigners, as well as his own countrymen, ſubſcribe to his ſentiments;[e] and the lord Henry Howard, tho' otherwiſe brought into the court-meaſures, yet could not, it ſeems, conſent to theſe of a general pacification; therefore was, as well as Ralegh, excluded from the benefit of thoſe rich preſents, which the marquis of Roſny, ambaſſador from France, made to all thoſe courtiers who promoted the ſame; inſomuch that Howard, being aſked by the king How it happen'd he had not a jewel as well as the reſt? anſwer'd, in alluſion to Eſop's fable, Non ſum gallus, itaque non reperi gemmam.[f] The cauſes, which moved the king of Spain to ſue for this peace, Ralegh did afterwards, with great perſpicuity, lay open;[g] but his preſent oppoſition of it, and the conſequences of that, ſeem to have been the hinges upon which his whole fortune now turn'd; I ſay, the moſt apparent cauſe to me of all thoſe ſorrows and ſufferings which fill up the melancholy remains of his ſtory. This unfortunate event, which he was above ſhunning, by trimming and temporiſing in a matter which he knew ſo highly concern'd the honour and advantage of his country, he has himſelf ſo excellently accounted for, where he ſhews the ill ſucceſs which attends ſuch ſincere conduct, and how proſperity is the fruit of ſlaviſh or hypocritical compliances;[h] that I could not, but from the ſaid occaſion of the greateſt viciſſitude in his life, form the introduction to this account of it.

[g] Ralegh lays down five reaſons for the king of Spain's making this peace with England and the Netherlands: "as firſt, his having ſo exhauſted his treaſure, that he "was no longer able to maintain the archduke's army. "Secondly, the great interruption of his trade, and loſſes "of his merchants, to the breaking of both his banks at "Seville. Thirdly, his fear that the Engliſh and Netherlands would plant in the Weſt-Indies. Fourthly, to recruit his coffers, and enable himſelf to break into war "again. Fifthly, that the Engliſh may decline, and forget the paſſages and pilotage to the Weſt-Indies, and "their ſea-officers may be worne out; for, except a little "trade for tobacco, there is not a ſhip that ſails that way: "and ſeeing the Spaniards may hang up the Engliſh, or "put them to death by torments, as they do; and that "the Engliſh dare not offend the Spaniards in thoſe parts, "a moſt notable advantage gotten in the concluſion of "the peace! it is certain, that the Engliſh will give over "that navigation to the infinite advantage of the Spaniſh "king both preſent and future. For theſe cauſes of importance it was, that the Catholic king ſought the "peace of England and the Netherlands; and ſo much all "men of judgment diſcern." See theſe reaſons more at large in Sir Walter Ralegh's Dialogue between a Jeſuit and a Recuſant, among the genuine Remains, publiſh'd at the end of an abridgement of his Hiſtory of the World, by Philip Ralegh, Eſq; 8vo. 1700.

[h] In a curious diſcourſe, where he learnedly and religiouſly reconciles fortune with reaſon and providence, Ralegh has theſe words. "But it may be objected, that, "if fortune and chance were not ſometimes the cauſes of "good and evil in men, but an idle voice whereby we "expreſs ſucceſs, how comes it then, that ſo many worthy and wiſe men depend upon ſo many unworthy and "empty-headed fools? that riches and honour are given "to external men, and without kernel; and ſo many "learned, virtuous and valiant men, wear out their lives "in poor and dejected eſtates? In a word, there is no "other inferior or apparent cauſe, beſides the partiality "of men's affection, but the faſhioning and not faſhioning "ourſelves according to the nature of the times wherein we "live. For whoſoever is moſt able, and beſt ſufficient to

THUS have we ſeen ſeveral circumſtances, and theſe are all I have met with in this interval, whereby Ralegh might undeſignedly and unluckily become diſagreeable to a man of king James's temper; but, on the other ſide, little or nothing that could ſo inflame Ralegh againſt the king, as to make him run headlong into ſuch violent conſpiracies, as could only end in his own ruin. Suppoſe the king did diſcourage Ralegh's attendance upon him at his entrance, diſlike his patent for wines, or removed him from the guards, to oblige Sir Thomas Erſkin, his countryman and favourite, whom he afterwards preferr'd to higher dignities; and this is all I have met with that could give offence on the king's part: will this be thought ſufficient provocation for a man of Ralegh's reaſon and judgment, ſo tender of fame and reputation, ſo ſettled in family, ſo well ſituated in his fortune, no leſs than three thouſand pounds a year, as was confeſs'd at his trial, beſides many other profitable, and I may ſay princely poſſeſſions on the ſeas, as well as the land, to plot commotions or inſurrections; yet enervate himſelf for the execution of them, by reſigning, as he ſays himſelf he did, his office of chiefeſt power, the wardſhip of the Stannaries? Nay, further, to herd with a motly and disjointed crew of prieſts, alſo with profeſs'd enemies to himſelf, not to mention knaves and fools; and, on a ſudden, reſolve to turn rebel, ruffian and cut-throat; to be the Coryphæus, to murder the king with his own hand, and all his innocent progeny! for this is the charge that the fertile pens of French writers have heap'd upon him. Indeed, I was ſomewhat ſtartled, when I read it in a hiſtory that bears the name and character of Thuanus, tho' I thought he might poſſibly come at it by miniſterial direction to an Engliſh reſident, till at laſt I found his author to be no other than one of his own countrymen, whom Camden, as I have before obſerv'd, has refuted in other paſſages that are even more credible. Now theſe tell over this deſperate ſtory thus. In the month of June Sir Walter Ralegh, a man equally dexterous at conſultation or action, ſays Thuanus, and famous for his memorable expeditions to the Indies, taking leave of his ſiſter at London, intreated her to commend him to God in her prayers, for he was going to a place from whence he expected never to return. She, ſuſpecting that he was going to fight a duel, with the ſame levity diſpers'd it among the ladies of her acquaintance, till the rumour came to court. Then Ralegh's friends and relations flock'd about him to know this enterprize; he, apprehending himſelf detected, readily made a whole confeſſion and diſcovery of the matter. The king was inform'd, and greatly aſtoniſh'd, but would needs have Ralegh before him, who, then aſking his pardon, acknowledg'd, that ſeeing his majeſty give more countenance to the Scots than the Engliſh, and had depriv'd him of his command in the guards, and that many great men expected, when he was eſtabliſh'd on the throne, he would be reveng'd for the death of his mother, he had therefore enter'd into a conſpiracy with others, whom he named, to ſhed his royal blood; and that they had unanimouſly deputed him to be his majeſty's executioner, when he rode a hunting. Hereupon the ſaid conſpirators were taken up and try'd, as theſe authors proceed to relate. [a] If there had been any truth in this ridiculous ſtory, which I think no one has before taken the pains to relate in Engliſh, that confeſſion had neither eſcap'd the attorney-general Coke at Ralegh's trial, when they were ſo lamely put to it to bring him in guilty without ſufficient proof, nor king James's apologetical Declaration after Ralegh's death, in which his majeſty, and his coun-

" to diſcern, and has withal an honeſt and open heart, " and loving truth; if princes, or thoſe who govern, endure no other diſcourſe than their own flatteries; then, " I ſay, ſuch a one, whoſe virtue and courage forbids " him to be baſe, and a diſſembler, ſhall evermore hang " under the wheel; which kind of deſerving well, and " receiving ill, we always falſely charge fortune withal: " for whoſoever ſhall tell any great man, or magiſtrate, " that he is not juſt; the general of an army, that he is " not valiant; and great ladies, that they are not fair; " ſhall never be made a counſellor, a captain, or a courtier. Neither is it ſufficient to be wiſe with a wiſe " prince, valiant with a valiant, and juſt with him that " is juſt; for ſuch a one has no eſtate in his proſperity; " but he muſt alſo change with the ſucceſſor, if he be of " contrary qualities; ſail with the tide of the time, and " alter form and condition, as the ſtate or ſtates-maſter " changes: otherwiſe, how were it poſſible that the moſt " baſe men, and ſeparate from all imitable qualities, " could ſo often attain to honour and riches, but by ſuch " an obſervant ſlaviſh courſe?" A little further, having quoted out of Menander, " That every fool is won " with his own pride, and the flattering applauſe of " others:" he infers, " That whoſoever will live altogether out of himſelf, ſtudy other men's humours, and " obſerve them, ſhall never be unfortunate. On the contrary, that man, who prizes truth and virtue, except " the ſeaſon wherein he lives be of theſe, and all ſorts of " goodneſs, fruitful, ſhall never proſper by the poſſeſſion " or profeſſion thereof." So, after other learned authorities and proper examples, concludes with the following ingenious alluſions, " Whoſoever therefore will ſet " before him Machiavel's two marks to ſhoot at, riches " and glory, muſt ſet on, and take off, a back of iron to a " weak wooden bow, that he may fit both the ſtrong and " the feeble. For as he, who firſt deviſed to add ſails to " rowing veſſels, did either ſo proportion them, as, being faſtened aloft, and towards the head of his maſt, " he might abide all winds and ſtorms, or elſe he ſome " time or other periſh'd by his own invention: ſo that " man, who prizes virtue for itſelf, and cannot endure to " hoiſt and ſtrike ſail, as the divers natures of calms and " ſtorms require, muſt cut his ſails and his cloth of mean " length and breadth, and content himſelf with a ſlow " and ſure navigation; to wit, a mean and free eſtate." cil together, have no leſs lamely offer'd weaker reaſons for taking away his life, as will be fully repreſented in its proper place.

By our Engliſh accounts it appears there was ſomewhat of a plot, but it was never prov'd that Ralegh was engag'd in it; however, his great enemy, the attorney-general Coke, affected to compare him with the conſpirators, "to Sampſon's foxes, which were join'd in the tails, tho' their "heads were ſever'd." What ſhare he had in that plot may further be judg'd by the promotions which the conſpirators intended themſelves upon the ſucceſs of it; for whereas one was to be lord chancellor, another lord marſhal, this lord treaſurer, that maſter of the horſe, and t'other ſecretary of ſtate: how comes it, as one author well obſerves, that Ralegh, able to officiate any, had no office in the ſtate aſſign'd him? [a] But perhaps the beſt means to clear him, may be the very trial, by which he was condemn'd. 'Tis too common, and too tedious, to be thought needful of tranſcribing it here at length; not to ſay ſo full of barbarous partiality and foul language, eſpecially by Coke himſelf, that he was expoſed for it upon the publick theatre; [b] and thoſe, who revere the laws of our country, have been ſo aſhamed of it, as rather to wiſh the proceedings have been falſely related, than believe ſuch a ſentence could paſs upon ſuch unſufficient evidence. But the character of this trial, and of that attorney-general, I leave to others; [c] and ſhall here only, from the ſeveral copies or accounts of it I have met with, draw out a ſhort regular narrative of the moſt material matters of fact, wherein Ralegh appears any way concern'd; and it is as follows:

There was one Matthew de Laurencie, a merchant of Antwerp, attendant on count Aremberg, who now, about the beginning of June, came over ambaſſador-extraordinary from Albert, archduke of Auſtria, to congratulate king James, and aſſiſt in compoſing the general peace. With this merchant the lord Cobham had held intelligence ſome years before, upon matters of ſtate, with licence. Five days after Aremberg's arrival, that is to ſay, about the 9th of the ſame month, Cobham repair'd to him with Laurencie, and that night Cobham ſupp'd, with Sir Walter Ralegh, at Durham-houſe in the Strand; whereby Ralegh came to underſtand, that Cobham had freſh negotiations with Aremberg; and was, as the chief of thoſe who oppoſed the peace, offered a ſum of money by Cobham to be a promoter of it; tho' that offer, alſo made to Ralegh before Aremberg came, [c] was afterwards pretended, as will appear, to have been for treaſonable purpoſes. In the next month, thoſe perſons with whom Cobham tranſacted the conſpiracy (or part of it) then on foot, were diſcover'd; either by the Spaniſh faction in revenge to Ralegh, the greateſt enemy of Spain alive, thinking he was then too far hamper'd in, or acquainted [c] The learned and ingenious author of the preface, to the collection of State-Trials in ſix volumes folio, having ſpoken of ſuch counſel as are wont to preſs nothing illegal againſt the priſoner, or unreaſonable, nor uſe any artifices to deprive him of his juſt defence, adds, "Theſe will "appear in a different light from thoſe, who, with rude "and boiſt'rous language, abuſe and revile the unfortu-"nate priſoner, who ſtick not to take all advantages of "him, however hard and unjuſt, which either his igno-"rance, or the ſtrict rigour of the law, may give them; "who, by force or ſtratagem, endeavour to diſable him "from making his defence; who browbeat his witneſſes "as ſoon as they appear, tho' ever ſo willing to declare "the whole truth; and do all they can to put them out "of countenance, and confound them in delivering their "evidence, as if it were the duty of their place to con-"vict all who are brought to trial, right or wrong, "guilty or not guilty; and as if they, above all others, "had a peculiar diſpenſation from the obligations of "truth and juſtice. Such methods as theſe ſhould be be-"low men of honour, not to ſay men of conſcience; yet, "in the peruſal of this work, ſuch perſons will too often "ariſe to view: and I could wiſh, for the credit of the "law, that that great oracle of it, the lord chief juſtice "Coke, had given leſs reaſon to be number'd among this "ſort." So, as a moſt notorious example, refers us to the trial of Sir Walter Ralegh.

Another author before this, having ſhewn us with what temper and ſuperior command Sir Walter Ralegh behav'd himſelf under all the ſcurrilities which the attorney-general threw upon him, goes on thus. "We have given the "reader a taſte of the eloquence of the bar in that reign, "to ſhew how far the hopes of places and preferment "will ſometimes carry men of ſenſe and learning from "reaſon and juſtice. This Billingſgate way of arguing "is the more remarkable in a perſon of the lord Coke's "character, whoſe writings are ſtill oracles in Weſtminſter-"hall; and ſcolding and calling of names were commonly "the refuge of ſuch wretched lawyers as were the tools "of a party; who, having neither ſenſe, law, nor lan-"guage on their ſide, thought to ſupply the want of them "with railing and impudence: which kind of baiting "and worrying of ſtate priſoners to death, by the king's "counſel, was reviv'd by judge Jefferies in king Charles "and king James II's reign; and it being much eaſier to "call a man rogue, than to prove him ſo, the example he "ſet was followed by too many, till the reverend bench of "judges in the reign of king William and our preſent "ſoveraign queen Anne, frown'd upon that cruel practice, "and put an end to it." The Life of Sir Walter Ralegh in Lives Engliſh and Foreign. 8vo. 1704. vol. I. p. 124.

And before all this, even to Coke's own face, as much was objected, when he himſelf was humbled, and fallen into diſgrace, by one of his own acquaintance, who told him, "As your pleadings were wont to inſult over miſery, "and inveigh bitterly againſt the perſon, ſo are you ſtill "careleſs in this point, to praiſe and diſgrace upon ſlight "grounds, and that ſuddenly; ſo that your reproofs or "commendations are for the moſt part neglected and "contemn'd, when the cenſure of a judge, coming ſlow, "but ſure, ſhould be a brand to the guilty, and a crown "to the virtuous. You will jeſt at any man in publick, "without reſpect to the perſon's dignity or your own. "This diſgraces your gravity, more than it can advance "the opinion of your wit; and ſo do all actions which "we ſee you do directly with a touch of vain-glory. "You make the laws too much lean to your opinion; "whereby you ſhew yourſelf to be a legal tyrant, &c." Thus in a letter admonitory to the lord Coke, MS. ſign'd A. B. in a volume of State-Letters, among the curious collections of the lord Coleraine, fol. 772. This Letter is alſo printed in the Cabala, and an extract of it in Arthur Wilſon's Hiſtory of king James.

with it to escape; or by some one of the English conspirators to secure himself: and, when the lord Cecyll (for he was lately made baron of Essenden) found, upon the first news of Anthony Copley, one of these conspirators, who was apprehended the 6th of July,[a] that the king's person was to be surpriz'd by the lord Grey of Wilton, and George Brook, brother to the lord Cobham, he suspected Cobham himself was in the secret; and Cobham's great intimacy with Ralegh at this time, who was now buying an estate for him, and settling his household affairs, drew Ralegh also into suspicion. Hereupon Cecyll, meeting Ralegh upon Windsor terrace, tells him, "the lords of the council had something to say to him;" so he was examin'd about the surprizing treason, and particularly about Cobham, as appears from his own words,[b] whom he fully cleared. After examination, Ralegh further said: "Whatsoever correspondence there "was between Cobham and Aremberg, Laurencie might be better able to give account of it, there- "fore advised to the calling upon him;" tho', as he further explain'd, "he knew of no intelli- "gence between them, but such as might be warranted:" and that advice he wrote also in a letter to Cecyll. When Ralegh return'd from examination a private prisoner to his own house, Cobham sent to him to know what had pass'd; Ralegh writ an answer by captain Keymis, "that he was examin'd, and had clear'd him of all;" and Keymis bid Cobham "be "of good comfort, for one witness could not condemn him:" this precaution, to arm Cobham against making discoveries, was, after his confession of it, objected against Ralegh; but he utterly deny'd, that he sent any such verbal message.[d] Now when Cobham was brought to his examination at Richmond, one date whereof appears to have been July 18; and after he had, by a constant denial, cleared both himself and Ralegh of all that was question'd against them, Cobham was, by device, says my author (in an epistolary narrative of his trial, at which he was present[e]) induced to think, that Ralegh had first impeach'd and betray'd him. For that part of Ralegh's letter aforesaid to Cecyll, referring the lords to Laurencie for Cobham's transactions with Aremberg, being shewed to Cobham, and accompanied, it seems, with such artful suggestions as were proper to inflame a man of Cobham's weakness, had the desired effect; for he being led thereby to imagine that Ralegh had accus'd him of all, or more than he knew, burst out into vehement exclamations against Ralegh, and in his rage, or madness, made the following confession. "That having a passport to go to the Spanish king, he in- "tended first to confer with the archduke; and, because he knew he had not money to pay "his own army, meant from thence to go to Spain, to deal with the king for six hundred "thousand crowns, then to return by Jersey; and that nothing should be done about the "distribution of that money to the discontented in England, till he had spoken with Sir Wal- "ter Ralegh: Further, that he had never enter'd into these courses, but by his instigation. "He spake also of plots, but of the particulars could give no account; yet acknowledg'd he "was afraid that Ralegh, upon his return to Jersey, would have him and the money to the "king."[f] After all this, before Cobham departed to the stair-foot, he retracted his confession, and profess'd he had done Ralegh wrong:[g] nor does it appear, says my author, that he did subscribe it.[h] In another branch of his examination, Cobham said he had of Ralegh a book, written against the king's title, which he gave to his brother Brook, and that Ralegh said it was foolishly written. But this he also retracted, as we shall hear. Upon this, and other parts of his confession more foreign to Ralegh, concerning the advancement of lady Arabella Stuart to the crown, as also from that of George Brook, a known enemy to Ralegh, as Cecyll could not deny; "asserting his brother Cobham told him (tho' Cobham, in his confession, re- "fused to own it) the lord Grey and others were only on the bye, but he and Ralegh were "on the main; thereby meaning, said Brook, the taking away of the king and his issue;" together with what Ralegh acknowledg'd in his own examination; "That Cobham offer'd him "eight thousand crowns for his furtherance of the peace, tho' the lord Cecyll and earl of Nor- "thumberland were to have the same proffers;"[i] and that in some discourses he might have said, "the way to invade England was to begin with stirs in Scotland." Upon these circumstances, I say, Ralegh was indicted at Stains on the 21st of September following;[k] and from hence that heavy indictment appears to have been accumulated upon him, which we see prefixed to his trial. Three days afterwards Cobham and Grey were alſo indicted at the ſame place; and, not long after this, they were all three return'd priſoners to the tower of London. When the time of their trial drew nigh, that is to ſay in the beginning of November, Ralegh got a poor fellow in the tower to caſt up a letter, faſten'd to an apple, in at Cobham's window, while the lieutenant was at ſupper, to intreat him (becauſe he then knew not but Cobham might be arraign'd before him:) "for God's ſake, to do him juſtice by his anſwer, and ſignify to him, "that he had wronged him in his accuſation;" and Cobham did, by an anſwer under his hand, confeſs the ſame; which not being perhaps ſo full and expreſſive as Ralegh expected, he afterwards ſent Cobham another letter, deſiring he would publiſh his innocence at his arraignment. But, notwithſtanding that Ralegh did not now requeſt any further juſtification under his hand, Cobham ſent him another anſwer,[a] clearing him in the moſt ſolemn and perfect manner, as will preſently appear. Now by reaſon of the plague, which raged ſo violently in and about London, the term having been proclaim'd to be held at Wincheſter, the ſtate-priſoners, who were thus indicted for the plot, were conveyed thither in great pomp. I find, that Ralegh went in his own coach, under the cuſtody of Sir Robert Manſell, on the 10th of November, to Bagſhot in Surrey, twenty-four miles from London; and, two days after, from thence, the other thirty miles, to the caſtle at Wincheſter. The conſpirators conducted thither at the ſame time, were George Brook, under the charge of Sir William Wade; Sir Griffin Markham, under Sir Robert Wroth; beſides Sir Edward Parham, Bartholomew Brookſby, Anthony Copley; alſo William Watſon and William Clark, two prieſts, under-wardens of the Tower, and the keeper of the Gate-houſe, together with a guard of fifty light horſe: as for Cobham and Grey, they ſet out ſix days, and arrived three days before, at the ſaid caſtle, under the like guard.[b]

And acknowledges the wrong.

Arraign'd at Wincheſter.

And here Cobham having been prevail'd on to make freſh accuſations in a letter to the lords, at leaſt ſubſcrib'd with his name, which will be produced a little further, Ralegh's trial was firſt brought on; and this was on the 17th of the month aforeſaid. He excepted not againſt his Jury, being all ſtrangers: but we are told by one, who ſeems to have had good intelligence of this matter, "That there was appointed for Ralegh another jury, the foreman of "which was Sir Michael Stanhope, the next Sir Edward Darcy, the next Sir William Kille-"grew, all men of honour, and near ſervants to the late queen Elizabeth: but theſe be-"ing found not for their turn, they were all changed over night, and thoſe others (named in "the common printed trial) put in their places."[c] After the indictment had been opened, and aggravated by ſerjeant Heath and attorney Coke, in ſpeeches, manifeſtly fathering the treaſons of the reſt upon Ralegh, for no other reaſon that I can ſee, but becauſe he was a man of wit, and a ſwordſman: Cobham's examination was read as before quoted. Here Ralegh firſt ſhewed the unreaſonableneſs and improbability of the accuſation therein againſt him, as follows: "It is ſtrange for me, ſaid he, to deviſe with Cobham, that he ſhould go to Spain to perſuade "the king to diſburſe ſo much money, he being a man of no love in England; and I "having reſign'd my room of chiefeſt command, the wardenſhip of the Stannaries; it is ſtrange "for me to make myſelf a Robin Hood, or a Ket, or a Cade, I knowing England to be in "better ſtate than ever it was. I knew Scotland united, Ireland quieted, Denmark aſſur'd, "which before was ſuſpected. I knew, that having a lady, whom time had ſurpriz'd, we "had now a lawful ſucceſſor. The ſtate of Spain was not unknown to me. I had written a "diſcourſe, which I intended to preſent unto the king againſt the peace with Spain. I knew "the Spaniard had ſix repulſes, three in Ireland, and three at ſea; and once in 1588, by my "lord-admiral, alſo at Cadiz. I knew he was diſcourag'd and diſhonour'd. I knew the king "of Spain to be the proudeſt prince living, but now he comes creeping to my maſter for a "peace. I knew, whereas he had before in his ports ſix or ſeven ſcore ſail of ſhips, he has "now but ſix or ſeven. I knew, of twenty-five millions he had from his Indies, he has ſcarce "one left. I knew him ſo poor, that the Jeſuits in Spain were fain to beg at the church-door. "Was it ever read or heard, that any prince ſhould diſburſe ſo much money, without a ſuf-"ficient pawn? I knew her own ſubjects, the citizens of London, would not lend her majeſty "money, without lands in mortgage. I knew the queen did not lend the ſtates money, with-"out Fluſhing, Brill, and other towns, for a pawn; and can it be thought he would let Cobham "have ſo great a ſum? I never came to the lord Cobham's, but about matters of his profit, "as the ordering of his houſe; and I had of his, when I was examin'd, four thouſand pounds "worth of jewels for a purchaſe, a pearl of three thouſand pounds, and a ring worth five " hundred pounds. If he had had a fancy to run away, he would not have left ſo much " money to have purchas'd a leaſe in fee-farm. I ſaw him buy three hundred pounds worth " of books to ſend to his library at Canterbury, and a cabinet of three hundred pounds to " give Mr. Attorney for drawing the conveyances; and God in heaven knows, not I, whe- " ther he intended to travel: but for the practice with Arabella, or letters to Aremberg, or " any diſcourſe with him, or in what language he ſpake unto him; if I knew any of theſe " things, I would abſolutely confeſs the indictment, and acknowledge myſelf worthy of a " thouſand deaths." And a little further concerning Cobham's examination: " He that hath " been examin'd, has ever been aſked if it be according to his meaning, and then to ſubſcribe. " Methinks, my lords, when he accuſes a man, he ſhould give ſome account and reaſon of it; " it is not ſufficient to ſay we talked of it. If I had been the plotter, would not I have " given Cobham ſome arguments, whereby to perſuade the king of Spain, and anſwer his " objections? I knew Weſtmoreland and Bothwell, men of other underſtandings than Cob- " ham, were ready to beg their bread." [a] Here being obſtructed by other matters, the attorney fell at laſt into that paſſage of Cobham's telling Brook, " You are on the bye, Ralegh and I are on the main." But Cobham would not confirm his ever having ſaid ſuch words. [b] Brook, who had pretended he did ſay them, was allowed to have been Ralegh's enemy; [c] ſo the expreſſion was not proved. Another matter they kept ſome coil about was, the book Cobham ſaid he had of Ralegh, written againſt the king's title. This was nothing more than a Defence of the queen's Proceedings againſt Mary queen of Scotland, written by one Robert Snag, a lawyer, and found by Ralegh in the library of the late lord-treaſurer Burghley, which he had liberty of ſearching for ſome geographical deſcriptions of the Weſt-Indies. Ralegh had declared to Cobham that it was fooliſhly written, but deny'd that he gave it him; and tho' Cobham, in his examination, ſaid it was given him by Ralegh, he revoked that confeſſion upon being further queſtion'd about it (as one of the lords of the council own'd;) and ſaid, the truth was, " he took the ſame of himſelf out of Sir Walter Ralegh's ſtudy when he was " aſleep;" [d] ſo much to be depended on were lord Cobham's accuſations. But there was nothing acted thereby to the king's prejudice, for the book was burnt. [e] As for the evidence of a rumour in Lisbon, brought into court by one Dyer, a pilot, who anſwering to a queſtion, " when " the king would be crown'd?" made by ſome-body or other there, that " he hop'd 'twould " be ſhortly;" was told again, " it ſhould never be, for Don Ralegh and Don Cobham would " cut his throat firſt:" Ralegh made light of it, as of ſuch a rumour and ſuch a witneſs he might; and ſaid, " If Cobham had practice with Aremberg, it might well be known abroad: " and that the duke of Buckingham was named with Jack Straw's treaſon to countenance it." [f] But none of theſe little circumſtances were much inſiſted on; and we are told by one who was preſent, that, " touching the ſetting up of Arabella, nothing at all was proved; nor " touching the invaſion here, or ſedition in Scotland, or even the deſtruction of the king, &c. The " proof againſt Ralegh (as the ſame writer continues a little further) did reſt only upon Cob- " ham's accuſation, and ſome preſumptions, whereof that only was the ground: therefore Ra- " legh ſpent moſt of the time in diſabling that accuſation, as being only utter'd in fury and " paſſion," [g] through the device aforeſaid, of making Cobham believe that Ralegh had firſt accuſed him. Beſides, that he had renounced and repented it; and altho', " afterwards by " practice, ſays my ſaid author, he did affirm it, yet would he never be brought to ſet his " hand to the examination: all which was clear." Then Ralegh, ſeeing this retraction ſo unjuſtly overlook'd, " labour'd to prove theſe two points out of ſcripture, civil law, ſtatute " law, common law and conſcience; in every of which he had been plentifully read (as the " ſame auditor of his arraignment goes on:) firſt, that there ought to be produced againſt " him two witneſſes: ſecondly, that his accuſer might be brought to accuſe him face to face." Agreeable hereto are Ralegh's own words, after he had urged the ſtatutes of Edward III, Edward VI, and queen Elizabeth; produced the opinions of judges in the law, and precedents from their writings; beſides teſtimonies from the Old and New Teſtament; where he ſays, " If by the ſtatute, civil law, and God's word, it be requir'd that there muſt be two wit- " neſſes at leaſt, bear with me, if I deſire but one." [h] But truly it was an unreaſonable requeſt; thoſe ſtatutes were repeal'd, and the law would not allow of it now; tho' we are inform'd that king James himſelf, taking notice how Cobham was with-held, ſhould ſay, "If he could "have ſpoken any thing againſt Raleigh, they would have brought him from Conſtantinople "to have accuſed him."[a] Well therefore might he deſire the jury to conſider, "There is no cauſe "ſo doubtful, which the king's counſel cannot make good againſt the law.[b] These men do "uſually defend bad cauſes every day againſt men of their own profeſſion, and as able as "themſelves: if they can do ſo, what may they not do with me, who never ſtudied law till "I came into the tower of London; who have been practis'd in other affairs; am weak of "memory, and feeble as you ſee? (for he was fain to have a pen and ink to help him in the "long ſpeeches that were made againſt him.") Then ſaid he, more cloſely to them, "If "you would be content to be judg'd upon Suſpicions and Inferences: if you would not have "your accuſation ſubſcrib'd by your accuſer: if you would not have your accuſer brought to "your face (being in the ſame houſe too) where you are arraign'd: if you would be con-"demn'd by an accuſation of one that has recanted, and is truly ſorrowful for it: if you, "in my caſe, would yield your bodies to torture, loſe your lives, your wives and children, "and all your fortunes, upon ſo ſlender a proof; then am I ready to ſuffer all theſe things:"[c] or (as the common trial has it) "If you would be contented to be ſo judged, judge ſo of "me."[d] Now tho' Raleigh at laſt put himſelf on it, that if Cobham would only ſpeak before God and the king, "that ever he knew either of Arabella's matter, or the money out of Spain, "or of the ſurprizing treaſon, or would accuſe him with things equivalent, in any main point, "or any ways to have been an inſtigator of him to deal with the king of Spain;"[e] yet would they not let Cobham confront him, or give his teſtimony vivâ voce: and tho' Raleigh did not directly conſent to be determin'd by Cobham's accuſation, if they ſhould now produce it juſti-fied under his hand;[f] yet he was forced to ſubmit to what they had in reſerve of this kind, which was the letter above-mention'd, written to the lords at Wincheſter the day before the trial. Some ſay, this letter was not written by Cobham himſelf; but that Sir William Wade, one of Cecyll's creatures, tampering with his weakneſs, got Cobham to write his name to a blank; to which, ſays my author, Wade no queſtion wrote the accuſation.[g] Others imply, that Cobham did himſelf write it; tho' after he was inſtructed by a letter from his lady, that there was no way to ſave his own life, but to accuſe Raleigh; and that it was ſo reported upon the going together of the jury.[h] This letter was read with great triumph and exultation by Coke, as follows. "I have thought it fit to ſet down this to my lords, wherein I profeſs on "my ſoul to write nothing but the truth. I am come now near to the period of my time; "therefore I confeſs the truth before God and his angels. Raleigh, four days before I came "from the Tower, cauſed an apple to be thrown in at my chamber window; the effect of it "was, to intreat me to right the wrong I had done him, in ſaying that I would come home "by Jerſey; which under my hand to him I have retracted. His firſt letter was thrown in "the ſame manner; wherein he prayed me to write him a letter, which I did. He ſent me "word the judges met at Mr. Attorney's houſe; and that there was good hope the proceed-"ings againſt us ſhould be ſtaid; he ſent me another time a little tobacco. At Aremberg's "coming, Raleigh dealt with me to procure him a penſion of fifteen hundred pounds a year, "for which he promiſed, that no action ſhould be againſt Spain but he would give knowledge "before-hand. He told me the ſtates had audience with the king. He hath been the origi-"nal cauſe of my ruin; for I had no dealing with Aremberg, but by his inſtigation. He hath "been the cauſe of my diſcontentment; he adviſed me not to be overtaken with preachers, "as Eſſex was; and that the king would better allow of a conſtant denial, than to accuſe any."[i] But this advice to a denial, and by that example, and the deſire of any ſuch penſion from Spain, Raleigh proteſted to be falſe. And further, to ſhew them what a baſe diſhonourable recreant Cobham was, he pull'd out the letter which Cobham a few days before wrote to him voluntarily in the Tower, deſiring the lord Cecyll to read it, becauſe he knew his hand; and that the jury would obſerve, if Cobham's teſtimony were of any credit with them, how much more ſolemnly it was writ to clear, than the other to condemn him; being in theſe words: "Seeing myſelf "ſo near my end; for the diſcharge of my own conſcience, and freeing myſelf from your "blood, which elſe will cry vengeance againſt me: I proteſt, upon my ſalvation, I never "practis'd with Spain by your procurement; God ſo comfort me in this my affliction, as you are a true

" a true ſubject for any thing that I know. I will ſay with Daniel, Purus ſum à ſanguine hujus: " So God have mercy on my ſoul, as I know no treaſon by you." [a] This was the laſt evidence given; yet the jury brought in their verdict guilty: this letter, laſt produced to acquit Ralegh, not prevailing with them ſo much, it ſeems, as the letter before, which was laſt, tho' leſs forcibly, written by Cobham to accuſe him, " which, all things conſider'd, ſays the " perſon, who heard the whole trial, was no more to be weigh'd than the barking of a dog; and " I would not (continues he) for much, to have been of the jury, to have found him guilty." [b] Condemn'd.
" Some of his jury, we are further told, were, after he was caſt, ſo far touch'd in conſcience, " as to demand of him pardon on their knees;" [c] and even Coke, the attorney himſelf, being " retir'd into a garden to take ſome air, when his man brought him word that the jury had " condemn'd Ralegh of treaſon, anſwer'd, Surely thou art miſtaken, for I myſelf accuſed " him but of miſpriſion of treaſon; and this relation, upon the word of a Chriſtian, I have " received, ſays my author, from Sir Edward Coke's own mouth." [d] Sentence being given, Ralegh humbly deſir'd, the king might know the proofs againſt him; that he ſtill perſiſted in his loyalty, notwithſtanding that verdict; which he would pray, that his ſaid jury might never anſwer for: and only craved pardon for concealing lord Cobham's offer to him, which he did through a confidence that he had diverted him from thoſe humours. So accompanied the ſheriff to the priſon " with admirable erection, yet in ſuch ſort as a condemn'd man ſhould " do." [e]

THUS was he " tired out of his life, as one obſerves, by the bawling of the king's counſel " on one ſide, and the bench's inſiſting on a confeſſion, extorted from the lord Cobham out " of fear, on the other, rather than convinced:" [f] and thus did his adverſaries reap diſhonour and reproach in their victory, while he received triumphant applauſes in his overthrow, like ſome flowers which are ſweeter in their fall, than others in their bloom. He ſtood at a bay with them from morning till night, " to the great admiration of the hearers, [g] who all thought " that a man of ſuch underſtanding and experience, would hardly be drawn into a plot ſo " foul and ſo fooliſh." [h] " Divers, who went thither his enemies, went away with commiſe- " ration of his injuries and misfortunes, thinking never man ſpake better for himſelf." [i] One of his auditors ſays, " He behaved himſelf ſo worthily, ſo wiſely, ſo temperately, that in half " a day the mind of all the company was changed, from the extremeſt fate, to the extremeſt " pity:" [k] and another ſays, That " Sir Walter Ralegh's carriage was moſt remarkable; " firſt, to the lords; humble, yet not proſtrate: towards the jury; affable, but not fawning; " rather ſhewing love of life, than fear of death: towards the king's counſel; patient, but " not inſenſibly neglecting; not yielding to imputations laid againſt him in words: and it was " wonder'd, that a man of his heroic ſpirit, could be ſo valiant in ſuffering; that he was " never overtaken in paſſion, &c." [l] On the other ſide, as to Coke's behaviour, we ſhall, to what has been ſaid, only obſerve, as one means to account for it, that if Eſſex was known to have ever been in any wiſe a friend or patron to him, as it appears he was in a private memorial of an honourable perſon, who was of the ſame college in Oxford with Ralegh, and almoſt of the ſame ſtanding; then Coke might perhaps think of retrieving himſelf in the eye of the world, and making atonement for his ingratitude to the ſaid earl, alſo at his trial, and to his memory after his death, by his inhumanity now to one of the contrary faction. Cecyll, on the other ſide, play'd a ſmooth edge upon Ralegh throughout the trial; his blade ſeemed ever anointed with the balſam of compliment or apology, whereby he gave not ſuch rough and ſmarting wounds, tho' they were as deep and fatal as the other. But Ralegh could diſtinguiſh crooked friendſhip, and perhaps the grounds of it, in this place, as well as he has done crooked wiſdom in another; [m] when, to thoſe ſpeeches, where Cecyll ſaid, " My affection, " to you Sir Walter Ralegh was not extinguiſh'd, but ſlaked, in regard of your deſerts: " and, excepting your faults (I call them no worſe) by God I am your friend:" he anſwer'd, " Whoever is the workman, it is reaſon he ſhould give account of his work to the work- " maſter." [n] As to any impertinences that occurr'd in the trial, they appear no-where ſo much as in the perſonal reflections made by the ſaid attorney Coke, and the lord chief juſtice

Popham, whom Camden juſtly calls a cenſorious man;[a] they being foreign to the matters Ralegh was charged with, therefore he wiſely looked over them. But theſe, and the other irregularities throughout the whole proceedings, which have left men ſo unſatisfied in the juſtice of them againſt Sir Walter Ralegh, and ſo little inclin'd to believe him the criminal his enemies made him,[b] being ſumm'd up by an able hand, and one whoſe province it more properly was to judge of them, I ſhall take my leave of the ſaid trial, with a reference to his obſervations on it.[c]

THAT Ralegh expected nothing leſs than this kind of treatment from thoſe hands, is plain by the letter which he wrote to the king himſelf juſt before his trial; wherein having ſaid, "I know, that, among many preſumptions gather'd againſt me, your majeſty has been perſuaded, that I was one of thoſe who were greatly diſcontented, and therefore the more likely to prove diſloyal; but the great God of heaven and earth diſclaim me from both worlds if I were not the contrary, and if I took not great comfort to behold your majeſty; always learning ſome good, and bettering my knowledge by your majeſty's diſcourſe: and having humbly beſeeched him not to believe any of thoſe, who, under pretence of offences to kings, do eaſily work their particular revenge;" he ſays a little further, "For my part, I proteſt before the ever-living God, that I never intended treaſon, conſented to treaſon, or perform'd treaſon againſt you; and yet I know I ſhall fall into their hands, e quibus non poſſum evadere, unleſs by your majeſty's gracious compaſſion I be ſuſtain'd."[d] Another letter, which he wrote to the lords, gives us ſome further light or aſſurance, that the offer made to him for one intention, and to others for another, was conſtrued as made to him for both; where, ſpeaking of the two principal accuſations againſt him, he ſays, "the firſt was, that money was offer'd me with a pretence to maintain the amity, but the intent was to have aſſiſted his majeſty's ſurprize: the other, that I was privy to my lord Cobham's Spaniſh journey. For the firſt, it ſeems, this money was offer'd to others long after it was offer'd to me, and upon other conſiderations than it was to me. For myſelf I avow, upon my allegiance, that I never knew or ſuſpected either the man or the new intention. To me it was but once propounded, and in three weeks after I never heard more of it; neither did I believe that he had any commiſſion to offer it: for, if that word amity had been uſed to me colourably, I muſt have been alſo made acquainted with the true end for which it ſhould have been given; which it ſeems was for the ſurprize: but of any ſuch horrible purpoſe, if ever I had ſo much as a ſuſpicion, I refuſe your lordſhips favour, and the king's mercy. I know your lordſhips have omitted nothing to find out the truth; but, as you have not err'd, like ill ſurgeons, to lay on plaiſters too narrow for ſo great wounds, ſo I truſt that you will not imitate unlearned phyſicians, to give medicines more cruel than the diſeaſe itſelf. For the journey into Spain, I know I was accuſed to be privy thereto; but I know your lordſhips have a reputation of conſcience, as well as induſtry. By what means that revengeful accuſation was ſtirr'd, you, my lord Cecyll, know right well, that it was my letter about Keymis; and your lordſhips all know whether it be maintain'd, or whether, out of truth, and out of a Chriſtian conſideration, it be revok'd." A little further he ſays, "God knows, and I can give an account of it, that I have ſpent forty thouſand pounds of [c] Sir John Hawles, ſollicitor-general to the late king William, in his Reply to a ſheet of paper, entitled, The Magiſtracy and Government of England vindicated; printed in fol. 1689. having obſerved, that the accuſations of Sir Walter Ralegh did not amount to a legal proof; ſays further, p. 35, as follows: "Not to mention all that might be excepted to in the trial of the caſe cited; I would know, by what law is the depoſition of a perſon, who might be brought face to face to the priſoner, read as evidence? I would know, by what law it is forbidden, that the accuſer ſhould be brought face to face to the accuſed? I would know, by what law Brook's depoſition of what the lord Cobham told him of Ralegh, was evidence againſt Ralegh? I would know, by what law the ſtory Dyer told of what an unknown man ſaid to him at Liſbon of Don Ralegh, was evidence againſt Ralegh? I would know, by what ſtatute, the ſtatutes of the 25th of Edward III, and 5th of Edward VI. are repeal'd? This trial was ſo very irregular throughout, that I would willingly believe it was not ſo as it is related; but, if it were ſo, I am ſure none can defend it: and even for that reaſon, if any ſuch reſolution was in the caſe, as is cited, I am ſure it ought to carry no credit with it: and there is no reaſon to believe there was any ſuch reſolution; there being no occaſion for it; the queſtion being only fact, which Sir Walter deny'd. The circumſtances of his trial, in which the court always over-rul'd the priſoner, were ſomewhat like the lord Ruſſel's; he complained of the ill uſage of the king's counſel, as well as the lord Ruſſel; and both had reaſon ſo to do. Hearſay was admitted to be given in evidence againſt both; all that either of them ſaid for themſelves, tho' very material, was ſlighted. The one was put in mind, at his trial, of the death of the earl of Eſſex; as the other was, of the death of the viſcount Stafford; both, in their dying ſpeeches, vindicated themſelves of thoſe aſperſions. The principal witneſſes, in both caſes, had, before the trials, affirm'd, they knew nothing againſt them: they were both accuſed with having heard what other perſons had ſaid in their company, and had not diſcover'd it; they both gave the ſame anſwer, that they could not help other men's talk. I think it is plain, at this day, that of Sir Walter Ralegh is thought a Sham-plot; what the lord Ruſſel's is thought, let the author ſay."

" my lord-admiral and my lord of Suffolk can witneſs. I diſcover'd, myſelf, the richeſt part " of all his Indies; I have planted in his territories. I offer'd his majeſty, at my uncle Ca- " rew's, to carry two thouſand men to invade him without the king's charge. Alas! to what " end ſhould we live in the world, if all the endeavours of ſo many teſtimonies ſhall be blown
" off with one blaſt of breath, or be preſented by one man's word?" " Think therefore (ſays
" he a little further) I beſeech you, on my great affliction with compaſſion; who have loſt
" my eſtate, and the king's favour, upon one man's word; and as you would that God ſhould
" deal with you, deal with me." He concludes in this manner: " Your lordſhips know, " that I am guiltleſs of the ſurprize intended; you know, or may know, that I never accept" ed of the money, and that it was not offered me for any ill; and of the Spaniſh journey,
" I truſt your conſciences are reſolved. Keep not then, I beſeech you, theſe my anſwers and " humble deſires from my ſoveraign lord, qui eſt rex pius et miſericors, et non leo coronatus."[b] In another letter which he wrote to the king after his trial, he has theſe words: " Loſt I am for " hearing a vain man, for hearing only, and never believing or approving; and ſo little " account I made of that ſpeech of his, which was my condemnation, that I never remember'd
" any ſuch thing, till it was at my trial objected againſt me." This letter he nobly concludes, with a deſire only to repay a lent life with a love and affection equal to the goodneſs wherewith his majeſty ſhould pleaſe to beſtow it.[c]

If theſe letters had any good effect, it appeared not immediately, Ralegh being kept near a month at Wincheſter after he was condemn'd, in daily expectation of death. We find, that when the report of the arraignments was made to the king in his privy-chamber at Wilton, he carried himſelf ſo reſervedly, that no-body could gueſs how well he was ſatisfied with the equality of condemnation, till he made, himſelf, a difference in the puniſhment. The two prieſts were executed on the 29th of November, and George Brook on the 5th of December following. His majeſty alſo ſign'd warrants for Cobham, Grey and Markham, to be beheaded on the 9th day of the ſaid month. But, in the particular narrative of this proceeding to execution, Ralegh is not ſo much as mention'd; and this might be owing to the extraordinary diſappointment of that purgation, which was expected from one of thoſe three next to be executed: for the day aforeſaid being come, Markham was firſt brought to the ſcaffold; and, having ended his ſpeech, prayers, with all he had to ſay, and being on his knees, ready to receive the ſtroke of the ax; up ſteps John Gibb, groom of the king's bed-chamber, to Sir Benjamin Tichbourne, the ſheriff of Hampſhire, with his majeſty's warrant to ſtay the execution; ſo Markham was told he muſt withdraw a while into the hall, to be confronted by the lords. Then lord Grey was brought upon the ſtage; and he is ſaid to have poured out his prayers and his confeſſion, tho' not one word of them recorded in our narrative aforeſaid; then was he alſo call'd aſide. Laſtly, Cobham was brought, and expos'd in the ſame manner; and his devotions to God are mention'd; but not a word of the treaſon, his guilt or innocence, or concerning any promoter of his diſloyalty or diſcontent: ſo when he had done, the ſheriff found it time to unravel the plot, by proclaiming and magnifying his majeſty's mercy, as we have it in the ſame author; who yet cannot forbear comparing his own relation to a comedy, " repreſenting ſo
" many lively figures of juſtice and mercy in a king, of terror and penitence in offenders,
" and of ſo great admiration and applauſe in all others as appear'd in this action, carried on
" only and wholly by his majeſty's own direction."[d] But whereas Coke had (after his outragious manner) charged Ralegh in the trial frequently with being the chief plotter and traitor in all this conſpiracy: we now ſee the king, in his warrant aforeſaid, contradicting him, where he ſays, to uſe his own dialect, that, " the tuo prieſtis, and George Brooke, vaire the principall
" plotteris and intiſairs of all the reſt, to the embracing of the ſaidis treaſonabill machina-
" tions:"[e] and yet you find, in the trial again, that Brook's treaſon was diſtinct, and to be kept

kept ſecret from Raleigh, becauſe there Brook tells Markham "take heed how you make "lord Cobham acquainted; for, whatever he knows, Raleigh the witch will get it out of "him." [a] In ſhort, the whole proceeding is ſo full of inconſiſtences, ſlanders, and other like odious effects of a falſe and malicious proſecution, that we may well conclude with that hiſtorian, who ſays, "the king had ground enough to ſhew mercy, which ſome of the condemn'd "party obtain'd." [b]

BUT Raleigh, it ſeems, did laſt taſte of it, and for no other apparent reaſon, but becauſe he was the only one whom his enemies ſtill wanted matter to exclude from it; as may be gather'd from what Cecyll wrote to a correſpondent three days after the king's warrant of ſuſpence, to the others before-mention'd; where, among theſe wonderful inſtances of his majeſty's clemency, we are told, "He pretended to forbear Sir Walter Raleigh for the preſent, "till the lord Cobham's death had given ſome light how far he would make good his accuſa-"tion:" [c] and tho' we hear not that he ever did make it good, yet was the pretended time of Raleigh's execution ſo determin'd, however we find not, that he, like the reſt, was ever brought to the place; that he wrote, what he intended for his laſt words, to his wife, the night before he expected to be put to death, in a very moving letter, full of the moſt generous acknowledgments, of the wiſeſt, moſt religious and affectionate advice to her, no leſs than of the moſt heroic and magnanimous ſentiments in regard to himſelf, and to that ſuffering which ordinary ſouls ſo naturally ſhrink at. It is too long to recite in this place, beſides has been often printed, and may be eaſily met with in his works. The hiſtorical paſſages in it acquaint us, that his lands were conveyed to his ſon, as is before-mention'd: that he intended his wife the profits of his wine-office, half his goods, and all his jewels, except ſome one to his ſon: that Baily owed him two hundred, or, as other editions have it, a thouſand pounds; [d] and his brother Adrian Gilbert ſix hundred: that he had alſo much money owing him in Jerſey, beſides the arrearages of the wines, which would pay all his debts. Towards the concluſion, he intreats her "to get thoſe letters, if it be poſſible, which I writ, ſaid he, to the lords, where-"in I ſued for my life. God is my witneſs, that it was for you and yours that I deſir'd "life. But it is true that I diſdain myſelf for begging it; for know it, dear wife, that "your ſon is the ſon of a true man, and one, who, in his own reſpect, deſpiſes death, and "all his miſhapen and ugly forms. I cannot write much; God knows how hardly I ſteal "this time, while others ſleep; and it is alſo high time, that I ſhould ſeparate my "thoughts from the world. Beg my dead body, which living was deny'd thee, and either "lay it at Sherborne, if the land continue, or in Exeter church, by my father and mother. "I can ſay no more; time and death call me away." And as, in the former part of this letter "he truſts that his blood will quench their malice, who had thus cruelly murder'd him:" ſo in the concluſion, "he prays to God, that he may forgive his perſecutors and accuſers." BUT after all this uſage, Cobham never confirming his accuſation of Sir Walter Raleigh, they both were, with the reſt of the priſoners, returned, on the 15th of December, to the Tower of London: [f] thoſe, of whom the leaſt profit was to be made, were either acquitted, or did afterwards get their liberty; among whom was Markham, who travell'd abroad, but endured greater diſtreſs in his ſtate of freedom, than he had in his reſtraint. [g] But Grey, it ſeems, died in the Tower, [h] and with Cobham it went nigh to fare ſtill worſe; for he would have ſtarved there, being ſo cloſely fleec'd as he was by the court-beggars of his great eſtate, had they not alſo laid thereby a kind of a fine upon his majeſty for his offences; the crown being impoſed upon to ſupport him in his many years confinement, as Raleigh himſelf has ſufficiently diſcover'd. [i] The lord Cecyll, who was created earl of Saliſbury in 1605, and lord-treaſurer, upon the death of Buckhurſt, earl of Dorſet, in 1608, did very much engroſs the revenues of the crown, as Raleigh made appear to the king himſelf, in an excellent Dialogue he dedicated to his majeſty; where, among the particulars, of Cecyll's neglecting an increaſe of 40,000 pounds to the king's eſtate, the conferring a 10,000 l. fine upon Devonſhire and his miſtreſs, the engroſſing to himſelf many goodly manors, and the exchange of Theobald's for Hatfield, which the greateſt ſubject or favourite queen Elizabeth had, never durſt preſent hiſtory, we may obſerve, that ſome years after their confinement, Ralegh is ſaid to have himſelf procur'd a re-examination of Cobham, and to have been abſolutely cleared by him. But the practices which were uſed againſt him therein, are repreſented ſo foul and wicked, as to have given ſome, whoſe intereſt it was to favour the adminiſtrations of theſe times, occaſion to ſuſpect the aſſertion; tho' it is corroborated by ſeveral material circumſtances, as well as the teſtimony of coeval writers. The author, in whom we firſt meet with this paſſage, and whoſe ſhorter account of it is before related, to ſhew that Ralegh's life was ſurreptitiouſly taken away, gives it us again more circumſtantially, and as a true ſtory, thus, "Queen "Anne, that brave princeſs, was in a deſperate, and ſome believed incurable diſeaſe, whereof "the phyſicians were at the furtheſt end of their ſtudies to find the cauſe, at a non plus for "the cure. Sir Walter Ralegh being, by his long ſtudies, an admirable chymiſt, [a] undertook "and perform'd the cure; [b] for which he would receive no other reward, but that her majeſty "would procure, that certain lords might be ſent to examine Cobham, whether he had accuſed "Sir Walter Ralegh of treaſon at any time under his hand? the king, at the queen's requeſt "(and in juſtice could do no leſs) ſends ſome lords and others of the council (which, as our "author goes on, were the duke of Lenox, Saliſbury, Worceſter, Suffolk, Sir George Carew, "and Sir Julius Cæſar) to demand of Cobham, whether he had not, under his hand, accuſed "Sir Walter Ralegh at Wincheſter, upon that treaſon he was arraign'd for? Cobham did pro-"teſt, never, nor could he; [c] but, ſaid he, that villain Wade did often ſollicite me, and, "not prevailing that way, got me, by a trick, to write my name upon a piece of white "paper, which I, thinking nothing, did; ſo that, if any charge came under my hand, it was "forged by that villain Wade, by writing ſomething above my hand, without my conſent "or knowledge. [d] Theſe ſix returning to the king, the reſt made Saliſbury their ſpokeſman; "who ſaid: Sir, My lord Cobham hath made good all that ever he wrote or ſaid. Where it is "to be noted, that this was but an equivocating trick in Saliſbury; for it was true, that Cob-"ham had made good whatever he had writ, but never wrote any thing to accuſe Ralegh; by "which you ſee the baſeneſs of this lord, the credulity of the king, and the ruin of Sir Wal-"ter Ralegh." [e] As for the miſerable end this lord Cobham made, the ſame author relates it; [f] and it is alſo confirm'd by others, who were well acquainted with the hiſtory of theſe times, and durſt have named to her; he farther inſtances, that, "It "had been an honeſt ſervice to the king, to have alſo "added 7000 l. lands of the lord Cobham's, with his "woods and goods, worth 30,000 l. more. For thoſe "lands, remaining with George Brook's children but "during their lives, had been the king's for ever in ef-"fect; but to wreſt them from the king, and draw the "inheritance upon himſelf, the treaſurer perſuaded his "majeſty to relinquiſh his intereſt for a petty ſum of "money; and, that there might be no counter-working, "he ſent Brook ſix thouſand pounds to make friends; "whereof lord Hume had two thouſand pounds back "again, Buckhurſt and Berwick had the other four thou-"ſand pounds, and the treaſurer and his heirs the maſs "of land for ever." What then came to the king by this confiſcation? (ſays one of the correſpondents in the ſaid Dialogue.) "His majeſty (anſwers t'other) by all thoſe "goodly poſſeſſions, woods and goods, loſes five hundred "pounds a year, which he gives in penſion to Cobham "to maintain him in priſon." See Sir Walter Ralegh's Prerogative of Parliaments in his Remains (laſt edit.) p. 249, &c.

[a] The author here quoted, ſeems to have been well acquainted with Sir Walter Ralegh's character, by this circumſtance; for there is ſtill in being a volume of Chymical and Medicinal Preparations, in Ralegh's own hand-writing, as will more particularly be obſerv'd a few pages farther.

[b] The author of Aulicus Coquinariæ thinks, he ſufficiently anſwers this paſſage; where he ſays, p. 97, "the "queen was never cur'd of her diſeaſe, but by death, "that ends all maladies." Now the diſeaſe, which this queen Anne died of, was a dropſy, but not till after Sir Walter Ralegh's death, and above fifteen year after this his impriſonment; whereas the diſeaſe, from which Ralegh recover'd her, was a fever, as Dr. Welwood informs us in his Notes on Wilſon's Hiſtory of king James. In the ſame place he ſays, it was ſome time before the illneſs of prince Henry; and Camden, in his Annals of king James, telling us, when Sir Julius Cæſar was made a privy-counſellor, we may conclude this cure was perform'd between the years 1607 and 1612.

[c] Thus much is confirm'd by another writer, who obſerves, "that Ralegh and Cobham being priſoners, upon "the ſuit of queen Anne (who was thereunto preſſed by "Sir Walter Ralegh) Cobham was re-examin'd before "ſome of the lords of the council at the Tower, and did "clear Sir Walter Ralegh from all treaſons whatſoever." Obſervations upon ſome perſons and paſſages in the Compleat Hiſtory of Mary queen of Scotland, and her ſon James, 4to. 1656, p. 12.

[d] An author before cited, has attempted to diſprove this particular thus: "How could Wade tamper with "Cobham to write his name to a blank, to which Wade "framed the accuſation againſt Ralegh; when it appears, "Cobham never ſigned at all to his examinations?" Aulic. Coquin. p. 190. But it is plain this trick of Wade's, if ſuch he committed, could not be meant of Cobham's examinations, for they were taken at Richmond and at London; but the queſtion put here was, Whether Cobham had not, under his hand, accuſed Sir Walter Ralegh at Wincheſter? which could relate only to this letter of accuſation before quoted, which was ſubſcrib'd with Cobham's name, and pretended to be written by him the night before Ralegh's trial there.

[f] He tells us, that, "as lord Grey died pitied, Cobham "died ſcorn'd, and his death as baſe; for he died louſy "for want of apparel and linnen; and had ſtarv'd, had "not a trencher-ſcraper, ſome time his ſervant in court, "relieved him with ſcraps, in whoſe houſe he died, be-"ing ſo poor a houſe, as he was forced to creep up a "ladder into a little hole to his chamber; which was a "ſtrange judgment, and unprecedented for a man of "ſeven thouſand pounds per annum, and of a perſonal "eſtate of thirty thouſand pounds; of all which the "king was ſo cheated (or of what ſhould have eſcheated to "him) that he could not give him any maintenance, as "in all caſes the king does, unleſs out of his own re-"venue of the crown; which was the occaſion of this "lord's want (his wife being very rich, and would not "give him the crumbs that fell from her table) and this "was a juſt judgment of God on him." Thus Weldon, p. 37, &c. Oſborne alſo, much to the ſame ſenſe, tells us, from the authority of William earl of Pembroke, and from whom we learn, that Cobham ſurvived not Sir Walter Ralegh above two or three months. [a]

BUT to return to more early paſſages in Ralegh's impriſonment, and to conſider his ſtate, as it appears at his entrance therein, we may very eaſily believe, he was at firſt in very great trouble to be ſo ſuddenly, and in ſuch a manner, depriv'd of power, fortune, liberty and reputation; but find nothing to confirm the extraordinary dejection one writer, who has been before ſpoken of, deſcribes him under; where he ſays, "In the publick joy and jubilee of the "whole realm, when favour, peace and pardon were offer'd even to offenders; he, who in "wit, in wealth, in courage, was inferior to few, fell ſuddenly (he cannot tell how) into "ſuch a downfall of deſpair, that his greateſt enemies would not have wiſhed him ſo much "harm, as he would have done himſelf;" [b] for we have ſeen he had enemies, who would have done him the injury that could not be exceeded, had not the king, in ſome degree of juſtice, rather than mercy to him, interpos'd, and ſecured him, as well from being quite deſtroyed by, as taking revenge on them: beſides, that letter to his wife before-mention'd, when his fate appeared neareſt and moſt unavoidable to him, demonſtrates the firmneſs and fortitude of a man, who could receive death as an acquaintance, rather that a ſtranger, or one, who, having ſo often gone to face him among the foes to his country abroad, could, with equal ſteadineſs and compoſure of mind, meet him from thoſe at home. Indeed, the affairs of a perſon, who had ſuch various and extenſive dealings or commerce with mankind, could not but be ſomewhat perplex'd and embarraſs'd, upon a fall ſo ſudden and precipitous; therefore, to find him employing agents for collecting in debts, and ſatisfying creditors, is to be expected. Thus, in one of his letters to Sir Michael Hext, he deſires him to ſpare John Shellbury for a little time, he being bound for him in a ſum of fifteen hundred pounds; and, if he was reſtrained, ſo that he could not recover the wine-arrearages, which (as we find from Ralegh's letter before to his wife) would clear all his debts, they muſt remain unpaid. The date endors'd upon this letter, probably by Sir Michael himſelf, is November 12, 1604. [c] In the middle of February following, we find a grant made by the king, to that John Shellbury and another perſon, to this effect: "That Sir Walter Ralegh, late of Sherborne, &c. being at"tainted of high treaſon, whereby all his goods and chattels, real and perſonal, moveable and "immoveable; debts, duties, ſums of money, bonds, &c. are forfeited. His majeſty therefore, "in conſideration that the ſaid debts, which Sir Walter Ralegh did truly owe before the ſaid "attainder and conviction, may be juſtly and truly paid; as alſo for the help and maintenance "of dame Elizabeth his wife, his child and family; and for other conſiderations, grants to "John Shellbury and Robert Smith of London, gentlemen, all the ſaid goods, &c."

THUS we ſee a great diſtinction made already between him and Cobham, and ſhall find more favour extending towards him in a little while. 'Tis ſaid to be much owing to the earneſt and unwearied interceſſions of his lady at court, who, that ſhe might be more ſerviceable to him, ſoon after he was committed to the Tower, petition'd the king, that ſhe might be a priſoner with her huſband, or live with him there in his confinement; and her requeſt was granted. Here, manifeſtly after the grant aforeſaid to Ralegh's truſtees, becauſe that mentions but one of his ſons, ſhe was deliver'd of the other, and he was chriſten'd Carew, who was yet born, as authors compute, within the year above-mention'd. To this ſatisfaction, Ralegh had others afterwards, which greatly alleviated the loſs of his liberty; ſo that his reſtraint, which was intended as a mortification, his prudence in time ſo converted, that it proved only a retirement, or the quiet enjoyment of a domeſtick life; and he felt certain comforts ariſe from the conſtant company of his little family, which, in the pomp of courts, the pride of conqueſts, the glory of diſcoveries, and the ſweetneſs of freedom itſelf, he had never taſted. But this tranquillity appears not to have ſuddenly arriv'd, being for a while diveſted of all his eſtate; and, having ſome contentions at law with thoſe who were conſiderably indebted to him, and could not otherwiſe be brought to account; one inſtance whereof we have in Wil- liam Sanderſon the elder, " who was of kin to Ralegh;[a] and (as we are told) in the time of his " proſperity and greatneſs, was his ſervant, intruſted with receiving great ſums of money for " him out of his office of wines, and his other places, by which he became in arrear to Ra- " legh in divers great ſums; which, after his troubles, he ſent for to Sanderſon, who was ſo far " from paying them, that he pretended Ralegh ſhould owe him two thouſand pounds: where- " upon Sir Walter, in great anger, commenced a ſuit againſt Sanderſon, which was managed " by his ſervant and ſollicitor John Shellbury; and Sanderſon, being overthrown, and found in " arrear to Ralegh in very great ſums, was caſt into priſon, where he died a beggar. Hence " ſprung all the ſpleen and malice of William Sanderſon the younger (in his hiſtory of king " James's reign) towards Sir Walter Ralegh," as the author of the pamphlet whence this paſ- ſage is extracted, and which was written many years after Ralegh's death, to detect the errors and falſities in that hiſtory, continues.[b] Now this expoſure both of that author's father and his own hiſtory, ſo enraged the ſon, that he forthwith publiſh'd an anſwer to the ſaid pamphlet, in which he not only endeavours to ſupport what he had written of Sir Walter Ralegh in his hiſtory, tho' with no authorities or ſatisfactory reaſons, but falls moſt foully upon Carew Ra- legh, as if he was the author of the pamphlet aforeſaid againſt his hiſtory; and that, with ſuch womaniſh ſpleen and ſlander as might have betray'd, had not himſelf own'd, that his wife had a hand in writing it. But of the paſſage here laſt quoted, tho' he contradicts ſeveral particulars, he does not deny the main point; which is, that Sir Walter Ralegh, now after his reprieve, did commence ſuits by Shellbury againſt his father, which might naturally ſharpen the ſon's pen, and warp his impartiality, when he was repreſenting him in his hiſtory, and the rather if Ralegh was ſuch a debtor beſides to his father, as he deſcribes him.[c] But, who- ever was the author of thoſe obſervations on the ſaid hiſtory, he has not more unfavourably treated it, than others who examined it afterwards.[d]

His younger ſon born.

"that Cobham died in a room aſcended by a ladder, at "a poor woman's houſe in the Minories, formerly his "laundreſs, rather of hunger, than of any more natu"ral diſeaſe. Thus miſerable was his fate, in meeting "with a prince ſo inconſiderately profuſe to ſtrangers, "that he forgot the owner, not leaving him wherewithal "to buy bread: an impiety not found among infidels, "who ever deem'd it leſs injuſtice to take away life, than "the means to maintain it.

When Ralegh had got over theſe troubleſome conteſts, all things appear'd, for a while, about him as ſerene, as in ſuch a gloomy ſtate could be hoped for; and he, who lately was upon the very brink of diſſolution, had all his offices, lands and goods, ſeiz'd upon, and was himſelf committed a cloſe priſoner, had not only his life reprieved, and his confinement ſweetned with ſome degrees of latitude, but even his eſtate alſo reſtor'd to him. For theſe lands (as ſhould have been before obſerv'd, had Carew Ralegh's caſe, whereof I had then but an imperfect extract, been, as it is now at hand) were actually made over by Sir Wal- ter Ralegh to his ſon, both inheritance and fee, before queen Elizabeth died, as formerly was alſo the leaſe for years;[e] ſo that, as he obſerves again in another place, " being entail'd on " Sir Walter's heirs, he could not forfeit them, but during his own life; and the king, finding " in himſelf the iniquity of Sir Walter's condemnation, gave him all what he had forfeited " again."[f] Herewith agrees likewiſe Sir John Harrington, who not only tells us by whoſe

His eſtate reſtor'd him.

[a] For the ſaid William Sanderſon the elder, who was much engag'd among the merchant-adventurers in queen Elizabeth's reign, and one of her commiſſioners for the Spaniſh prize-goods; alſo of note for the great globes, which, by his encouragement, were brought to perfection; married, about the year 1571, Margaret Snedale or Snow- dale, the daughter of Sir Walter Ralegh's ſiſter Mary, by her huſband Hugh Snedale, a commander in the queen's royal navy, as we gather from a pamphlet written by their ſon William Sanderſon, more particularly mention'd a little lower.

[c] See an Anſwer to a ſcurrilous pamphlet, entitled, Obſervations upon a compleat Hiſtory, &c. of Mary queen of Scotland, and her ſon king James, &c. by William Sanderſon, Eſq; 4to. 1656.

[d] The character he gives of Sanderſon's ſaid Hiſtory of king James, is as follows: " His whole Hiſtory is a " Rhapſody of notes and ſcatter'd papers from other men, " collected without order or method; exceedingly defec- " tive both in time, place and nominations; and written " in ſo unſeemly and disjointed a ſtyle, that you may " eaſily perceive he has taken up other mens words with- " out underſtanding their matter; and unleſs it be where " he rails on perſons of honour (which he does plainly, " and often, tho' ſometimes very falſely) his language " is dark, harſh and unintelligible." Dr. Heylin thought this character ſo juſt, that he has recited it in his Survey of Sanderſon's Hiſtory of Charles I, annexed to his advertiſements on the ſaid author's Hiſtory of the queen of Scots and king James, in his Examen Hiſtoricum before-mentioned; and farther confirms it with this character of his own: " Sanderſon's method is intricate and perplex'd, " backwards and forwards, without care of time or or- " der; telling the ſame thing over and over, and many " times diſagreeing in one place, from that which was " affirm'd in another: his language rough and unpoliſh'd " in moſt parts of the book, and in ſome parts ungram- " matical; ſo that no ſenſe can be pick'd out of it, but " by circumſtances, and in the way of conjecture only." A little further he alſo gives it as the opinion of a judi- cious friend, " That Sanderſon writes nothing like an " hiſtorian, either for ſtyle or compoſure: his ſentences " many times nonſenſe, and his digreſſions tedious and " impertinent."

And Dr. Welwood, in his notes on Wilſon's hiſtory of king James, ſays, nothing could inhance the value of it more than " a moſt wretched one publiſh'd by one Wil- " liam Sanderſon; who pretends, in ſeveral places, to " ſome ſecret memoirs or diſcourſes with great men, to " make good the paſſages of his hiſtory. But the truth " is, the whole is nothing elſe but an ill-compil'd collec- " tion out of other authors; wherein he, for the moſt " part, miſtakes or perverts their meaning. In curſorily " reading over this hiſtory, I have ſometimes taken no- " tice of above four or five groſs errors, either in names, " things or chronology, in one ſingle page."

mediation Ralegh recover'd his ſaid eſtate, and his enlargement in priſon, but how laudably he employ'd himſelf there at the time of this author's writing, which might be about the year 1607; where he ſays, "God put it into the king's mind, againſt man's expectation, to ſave "his life; and ſince, by the ſuit of his faithful wife, both to preſerve his eſtate, and to eaſe "his reſtraint, in ſuch ſort as many, who are at liberty, taſte not greater comforts than he doth "in priſon; being not barr'd of thoſe companions, meaning books, that he may, and per- "haps does, take more true comfort in them, than ever he took of his courtly companions in "his chiefeſt bravery."[a]

But this proſpect was ſoon overcaſt; for there was a young Scotchman, named Robert Car, who, ſoon after the ſaid reſtitution, ſprang up in great favour at court; and, having no fortune of his own, it was contrived by thoſe who had gaped in vain for Ralegh's eſtate themſelves, to lay the foundation of this favourite's future greatneſs upon his ruin: for, being thus fruſtrated of the effects of Sir Walter's attainder, they pretended to find a flaw in his laſt conveyance of the fee and inheritance of Sherborne to his ſon; and to this purpoſe an information was exhibited in the Exchequer by the attorney-general Hobart, to which Ralegh put in his anſwer; and therein the ſaid grant or conveyance was ſet forth to be made over, as above: yet, for want of a ſingle word (which was found notwithſtanding in the paper-book, and was only the overſight of the clerk) they pronounced the conveyance invalid, and Sherborne abſolutely forfeited to the crown; a judgment to be foreſeen without witchcraft; ſince his chief judge was his greateſt enemy, and the caſe argued between a friendleſs priſoner and the king of England.[b]

And taken away again.

Then was Sherborne given to this Car, afterwards earl of Somerſet. The lady Ralegh and her children earneſtly petition'd the king for compaſſion; but could now obtain no other anſwer from him, than that he mun have the land, he mun have it for Car. And ſhe, a woman of high ſpirit, on her knees, prayed to God, that he would puniſh thoſe who had thus wrongfully expoſed her and her children to ruin.[c] We have an elegant letter of Ralegh's extant, to Car himſelf, upon this occaſion; but, having been corruptly printed, as I have elſewhere obſerv'd,[d] it may appear from ſeveral ancient manuſcript copies more correct, as follows: "After ſome great "loſſes, and many years ſorrows, of both which I have cauſe to fear I was miſtaken in the "end; it is come to my knowledge, that yourſelf, whom I know not but by an honourable "fame, has been perſuaded to give me and mine our laſt fatal blow, by obtaining from his "majeſty the inheritance of my children and nephews, loſt in the law for want of a word. "This done, there remains nothing with me but the name of life, deſpoiled of all elſe but "the title and ſorrow thereof. His majeſty, whom I never offended (for I ever held it un- "natural and unmanly to hate goodneſs) ſtay'd me at the grave's brink; not, as I hope, that "he thought me worthy of many deaths, and to behold all mine caſt out of the world with "myſelf; but as a king, who, judging the poor in truth, has received a promiſe from God, "that his throne ſhall be eſtabliſh'd for ever. And for yourſelf, Sir, ſeeing your fair day is but "now in the dawn, and mine drawn to the evening, your own virtues and the king's grace "aſſuring you of many favours and much honour, I beſeech you not to begin your firſt build- "ing upon the ruins of the innocent; and that their ſorrows, with mine, may not attend your "firſt plantation. I have been ever bound to your nation, as well for many other graces, as "for their true report of my trial to his majeſty, againſt whom had I been found malignant, "the hearing of my cauſe would not have changed enemies into friends, malice into compaſſion, "and the minds of the greateſt number preſent into the commiſeration of my ſtate. It is not "the nature of foul treaſon to beget ſuch fair paſſions; neither could it agree with the duty "and love of faithful ſubjects, eſpecially of your nation, to bewail his overthrow, who had "conſpir'd againſt their moſt liberal and natural lord. I therefore truſt, Sir, that you will "not be the firſt that ſhall kill us outright, cut down the tree with the fruit, and undergo "their curſe, who enter the field of the fatherleſs; which, if it pleaſe you to know the truth, "is far leſs fruitful in value than in fame: but that ſo worthy a gentleman as yourſelf will "rather bind us to your ſervice, being, Sir, gentlemen, not baſe in birth or alliance, who "have intereſt therein; and myſelf, with my utmoſt thankfulneſs, will ever remain ready to

This letter, in one or two old copies, is dated December 1608.[a] But this ſo little prevailed upon Car, or any other applications Ralegh might make to the king, with his majeſty himſelf; that beſides Sherborne, and the manors belonging to it, thoſe other lands which Ralegh himſelf had purchaſed, call'd, Pinford and Primeſly, Barton, and the manors appertaining alſo thereunto, forfeited with the reſt by his attainder, were alſo granted the following year 1609, or the ſeventh of his majeſty's reign, to the ſaid favourite.[b]

How much reſpected by the prince of Wales.

BUT now, or not long after, Ralegh was grown into high eſteem with that great hope and heir of theſe kingdoms, prince Henry Frederick, the king's eldeſt ſon, who, being ſatisfied of his loyalty, and well inform'd of his great qualifications and experience in civil and military affairs, with his hazardous ſervices for the honour and defence of his country, no leſs than his many publick-ſpirited adventures, both to enlarge and enrich it, teſtified not his own merits more in any one particular, than in diſtinguiſhing thoſe of Sir Walter Ralegh; and, notwithſtanding the many little envious detractions of ſome undermining courtiers about him, did both encourage his epiſtolary addreſſes to him from the Tower, and ſend for his counſel or opinion upon ſeveral emergent occaſions. It was, perhaps, one of the brighteſt rays in the ſhining orb of this rare prince's actions; that he never left invading the king with the moſt perſuaſive ſolicitations, that he would beſtow Sherborne upon him, with full deſign to return it to its juſt owner, till his majeſty at laſt granted his requeſt: but by what cruel fate Ralegh's hopes were eclipſed again, and indeed thoſe of the whole kingdom, we ſhall ſuddenly hear.

IN the mean time, we muſt here endeavour to give ſuch light of that intercourſe which paſſed between the ſaid prince Henry and Sir Walter Ralegh, as thoſe letters and diſcourſes, which he addreſſed to his highneſs, and are extant, will afford; and firſt, when he found how commendably the prince was inclined to the ſtudies of navigation; how much delighted he was with a view of the fleet at Chatham; how inquiſitive, or deſirous to inform himſelf, by conſultation with the moſt experienced commanders, in the knowledge of building ſhips moſt artfully, fitting them out moſt commodiouſly, ſailing them moſt dexterouſly, and fighting with them moſt ſucceſsfully, in order to execute thoſe great deſigns he had upon the Weſt-Indies and Spain itſelf, whenever the king thereof ſhould give cauſe of publick hoſtility, as one of his own ſervants acquaints us, and would have done more diſtinctly, had he not been manacled in a courtly maxim ſo diſcrepant with all perſonal narrative; That to publiſh particulars, agrees not with rules of ſtate:[c] Ralegh compoſed and communicated to his highneſs ſeveral tractates upon theſe ſubjects. Such was his letter touching the model of a ſhip, which the prince intended to build;[d] and ſuch his diſcourſe of a maritimal voyage, with the paſſages and incidents therein,[e] which he ſeconded with ſome neceſſary obſervations on the royal navy and ſea ſervice,[f] alſo dedicated to his highneſs; and wherein he appears to have been a moſt worthy and earneſt counſellor of the prince, to a due regard and regulation thereof. For, ſays Ralegh to him, in anſwer to any objection that might be made to the maintenance of ſo great a fleet, in the perfection and readineſs which he recommends, now in times of peace: "Tho' "the ſword is put into the ſheath, we muſt not ſuffer it to ruſt, or ſtick ſo faſt, that we ſhall "not be able to draw it readily when need requires;" and, a little further, "we may be aſſur'd, "that if thoſe powerful means, whereby we reduced our enemies to the courteſy of ſeeking "peace of us, were neglected, ſo as we could not again, upon occaſion, readily aſſume the uſe "and benefit of them, as we have done; thoſe proud maſtering ſpirits, finding us at ſuch "advantage, would be more willing to ſhake us by the ears as enemies, than to take us by the "hands as friends. Therefore, far be it from our hearts to truſt more to that friendſhip of "ſtrangers, which is but diſſembled upon policy and neceſſity, than to the ſtrength of our "own forces, which has been experienced with ſo happy ſucceſs. I confeſs, that peace is a "bleſſing of God, and bleſſed are the peace-makers; therefore doubtleſs bleſſed are thoſe means "whereby peace is gain'd and maintain'd. For well we know, that God works all things "here among us, mediately and by a ſecondary means; the which means, of our defence and "ſafety, being ſhipping and ſea-forces, are to be eſteemed as his gifts; and then only available "and beneficial, when he withal vouchſafes his grace to uſe them aright."[g] To this end,

His advice to the prince about the Royal Navy.

Ralegh alſo wrote another diſcourſe for the ſaid prince, Of the art of war by ſea:[a] But the untimely death of his highneſs, as we ſhall too ſoon find, deprived both him and poſterity of the advantages which a ſubject ſo uſeful and uncommon, from an author ſo able and experienc'd, did promiſe.

THERE is nothing in theſe diſcourſes, or any other I have met with, which ſhew Ralegh any ways concerned in writing thoſe propoſitions or arguments for foreign wars, which were delivered to prince Henry by ſome of his military ſervants, and which were afterwards abſtractedly publiſh'd, together with an anſwer at large, written, very conformable to the taſte of king James, by the learned Sir Robert Cotton;[b] tho', to the firſt edition of this treatiſe, the bookſellers, having prefixed Sir Walter Ralegh's picture, have thereby miſled ſome writers of his life, careleſly to inſert this book into the catalogue of his writings.[c] 'Tis true, Ralegh has obliquely and ſubordinately touch'd this branch of the ſubject in ſome of his diſcourſes upon war, but in other arguments than are here anſwer'd, nay after this anſwer was written; nor are they addreſſed to the prince, but indeed written alſo after his death.[d] In ſome places, he has given the greateſt diſcouragements to a military life, from knowing, how many are deluded to be the executioners of other men's ambition, and to lay down their lives for what they ſhould not venture them;[e] yet withal, the greater diſproportion of honour and reward which attends that profeſſion, than others of leſs perſonal hardſhip and danger, as was before partly obſerved.[f] In other places, he has written againſt wanton and cauſeleſs invaſions, for the mere ſake of brutiſh and vain-glorious victory; againſt waging war with our enemies, till we beat the art of it into them; till cowards are learnt to be couragious, and defenders become aſſailants: yet has elſewhere, in a very ingenious ſimilitude, ſhewn, that martial policy is one of the principal ſupports of government.[g] However, when a prince has thereby got authority, or the ſharpeſt means in his power, he would have the mildeſt uſe; and the one acquired in full ſtrength, only that the other may be exerciſed with perfect ſafety: for he ever preferr'd reaſon and love as ſtronger chains of government than conſtraint or violence,[h] and thought that royal dealings was ever ſureſt of meeting with royal ſucceſs.[i] Such were the principles Sir Walter Ralegh infus'd not only into the prince of Wales, but all other readers throughout his writings; and agreeable hereto is the tenor of that letter he wrote to the ſaid prince, Auguſt the 12th 1611, concerning the moſt eligible power in an Engliſh ſoveraign, where he has, with the ſpirit of a true patriot, ſaid: "Let me not doubt but all plans, which do not carry in "them the mutual happineſs of prince and people, will appear as abſurd to your great under-"ſtanding, as diſagreeable to your noble nature."[k]

And concerning the beſt plan of government.

BUT now Ralegh's pen was engaged upon a different ſubject in the prince's ſervice, and by his command: for, "the firſt overtures of a marriage between this prince and the eldeſt "daughter of Spain being put off,"[l] the like motion was now made by the Savoyan ambaſſador, not only for a marriage between prince Henry and a daughter of the duke of Savoy, but for another, of his ſon Don Phillibert, prince of Piedmont, with princeſs Elizabeth, the daughter of England. Ralegh wrote two diſcourſes, upon this occaſion, in the year laſt mention'd; and that he particularly was requeſted by the prince to give his opinion of the ſaid

What deluded wretches then have "a great part of mankind been, who have either yielded "themſelves to be ſlain in cauſes, which, if truly known, "their hearts would abhor, or been the bloody executio-"ners of other men's ambition! offers, offers, appears in his introduction to the firſt of thoſe diſcourſes, inſcrib'd to ſome miniſter of ſtate about his highneſs; in which Ralegh has ſo notably diſcover'd what a tool for "avarice "and ambition moſt of the Catholic princes in Europe had made of this ſacrament of matri- "mony;" and how notoriouſly "the Caſtilians, with thoſe of whom theſe princes are de- "ſcended, have gotten no leſs by the traffick of their marriages, than they have done by the "trade of their Indies;" that I wonder theſe excellent political diſcourſes were never made publick, for the more eaſy advertiſement of our ſucceeding princes upon this topick. The ſecond of them, upon the match for prince Henry, is treated under eight heads; and, in the fourth page of it, Ralegh has theſe words: "There is a kind of noble and royal deceiving in "marriages between great kings and princes; yea it is, of all others, the faireſt and moſt un- "ſuſpected kind of betraying: it has been as ordinary among them to adventure or caſt away "a daughter to bring ſome purpoſe to paſs, as at other times, for ſaving of charges, to make "them nuns." A little farther, having repreſented the duke of Savoy ſo tied to the ſee of Rome, both by religion and benefit, that he could no more be ſeparated and ſubſiſt, than if his ſoul was divided from his body, he goes on thus, more directly, concerning the marriage: "What "then remains of profit to our prince by this alliance? A ſum of money, and a beautiful lady. "For beauty (ſays he) it was never more cheap in any age; and it is ever better loved in "the hope, than when it is had: for the million of crowns offered, which makes but two of "our ſubſidies, I ſpeak it confidently; when thoſe dukes, lords, and great ladies, who will "attend the princeſs in her paſſage hither, ſhall be all preſented with gifts according to their "degrees and the king's honour; when the preparations, triumphs and feaſtings are paid for, "there will nothing remain but a great encreaſe of charge, and, perchance, a great deal of me- "lancholy." And a little further, Ralegh comes cloſer ſtill, to the prince himſelf, in theſe "words: "Now, if by theſe diſlikes of the former alliances, you make judgment that it "is my deſire that the prince ſhould not marry at all; I ſay, my deſire is not, that the prince "ſhould not marry at all, but not as yet; and I am exceeding ſorry that the prince has not "the ſame deſire. For ſeeing his majeſty is yet but young, and by God's favour like to live "many years; and that his highneſs, if he ſhould now marry, may have many children born "to him, before he be thirty years old; and, ſeeing all his children ſhall be princes, and "muſt be provided for as princes, I think it will much perplex him to find himſelf ſo invi- "ron'd, till his majeſty has ſomewhat repaired his eſtate, and provided beautiful gardens to "plant theſe olive branches in. While the prince is unmarried, all the eyes of Chriſtendom "are upon him; for, with what king ſoever he ſhall be ballanc'd, he will caſt the ſcale; but, "to have him weighed with a little prince, I ſhould be ſorry, and he himſelf will be as ſorry "after. All the princes in Chriſtendom woo'd Charles, duke of Burgundy, while his daughter "was unmarried; and while our prince is free (our enemies not knowing upon what ground "to build their practices) his majeſty's ſafety is in the mean while infinitely aſſured; but, the "prince once diſpoſed of, they will preſently muſter our forces, meaſure our fortunes, ſound "us to the bottom, and make their approaches accordingly: they will then ſay, we have "ſeen the utmoſt of the Prince of Wales!" Then having obſerv'd, that "ſince there is none but "a Catholic lady for us, let us have a king on our ſide (ſays he) to boot:" ſo, in conſideration of the many motives to enmity between France and Spain, which he enumerates; as alſo the many obligations which France then lay under, of gratitude to the crown of England, and the advantage of retaining the Netherlands, he propoſes the daughter of the French king. On the other ſide, that it would be a needleſs hazard both to neglect this love and union, and ſuſtain withal the hatred of the archduke, the pope, and the king of Spain together; however diſ- united, they were not to be feared: "For then, if they ſhould combine againſt us, from whom "ſhould we hope for help? If it be from Savoy or Florence, God help us! Our friends in- "habit beyond the mountains, our enemies at hand! We leave thoſe that are ſtrongeſt and "neareſt us, for thoſe who are weakeſt and furtheſt off! We leave thoſe that can help us, or "harm us, for thoſe that can do neither! Thoſe we leave who depend on themſelves, to "wit, the French, for thoſe who depend on others, to wit, the Savoyans and Florentines!" Thus ends Sir Walter Ralegh's diſcourſe upon the marriage propoſed for prince Henry.

His arguments againſt the match propoſed for his highneſs.

In his other diſcourſe, on the match that was offered for the ingenious and accompliſh'd lady Elizabeth, that prince's ſiſter, having copiouſly exemplified, as we have obſerv'd, what mercenary ſacrifices had been made, by crown'd heads, of their children, in this grand market of matrimony; and anſwer'd the objection he foreſaw ſome eſpanioliz'd courtiers might make, that ſeeing the kings of France, and eſpecially of Spain, had ſo often match'd themſelves with the dukes of Savoy, Why ſhould not the king of England alſo accept of their alliance? He proceeds to examine what encreaſe of honour and dignity, or what great comfort or contentment this excellent young princeſs could expect or hope for by this match? " For the firſt, to wit, " honour and dignity (ſays he) as ſhe is born the eldeſt, and now only daughter of one of the " mightieſt kings of Chriſtendom, ſo is ſhe thereby of higher place and ſtate, than the wife " of a duke of Savoy. Beſides, in her birth and blood, both of father and mother, deſcended " of ſuch royal races, as Savoy cannot add any greater grace or glory to; and by nature and " education endow'd with ſuch princely perfections, both of body and mind, as may well de- " ſerve to be reputed a worthy ſpouſe for the greateſt monarch of Chriſtendom, eſpecially con- " ſidering the poſſibilities of a daughter of England, whereof we have had many precedents; " and, at this time, is happily manifeſted in the king's majeſty, our ſoveraign, being deſcended of " a daughter of England; whereby the whole iſland, formerly divided, is again now made " one GREAT-BRITAIN, to the mutual ſtrength of either. Now to confer the poſſibility of " ſuch a fortune, upon a poor popiſh duke of Savoy, that can return no recompence of benefit " to this ſtate, were greatly for his glory, tho' little for the advancement of this noble prin- " ceſs, and leſs for the ſafety of this kingdom, conſidering the dangers that it may draw upon " our worthy magnanimous prince and the noble duke of York, if the ambition of this match " ſhould tickle the Savoyan to look after poſſibilities, wherein there would want neither means, " perſuaſions nor pardons from Rome, to practiſe any villany in that behalf, whereby to bene- " fit or ſtrengthen an appendix of Spain, and ſo devoted a ſon to the Romiſh ſee. For the " ſecond, namely the comfort and contentment of this worthy young lady by this match, as there " is little in appearance preſently, ſo there is leſs to be hoped for in the future. For, as firſt, " ſhe muſt be removed far from her neareſt blood, both by father and mother, into a country " far eſtranged from our nation, as any part of Chriſtendom, and as far differing from us in " religion, as in climate. And what true correſpondence, or matrimonial affection, there can " be maintain'd between thoſe perſons, whoſe minds are different, and oppoſite in the religious " points of their Chriſtian faith, is greatly to be doubted. Moreover it is greatly to be feared, " with what ſafety and ſecurity ſhe can long live free from ſecret practices and treacheries, " in a country ſo near the pope's juriſdiction, inviron'd with the plots of the Jeſuits, who, we " ſee, do daily traffick the lives and fortunes of all princes who are not wholly devoted to the " Romiſh obedience; and therefore how they will entertain or tolerate the race of our king, " were too great an error and preſumption to truſt to: ſo as when the worthy lady, hereafter " by her children or otherwiſe, has furniſh'd their deſire, and fully ſerved their turn, ſhe ſhall " be then either forced to wound her conſcience, by forſaking her faith, or elſe to undergo " the ſcorns and danger which ſhall be daily caſt upon her and her family, for the exerciſe of " her religion. And this alſo we may be well aſſured of, that, if ſhe ſhall have any iſſue by " the prince of Piedmont, they muſt all be bred and brought up contrary to her conſcience, " which can be no ſmall grief to a virtuous and natural mother, and as little comfort to our " juſt religious king, their grandfather. Laſtly, the very binding cauſe of amity between all " kings, princes and ſtates, is their trade and intercourſe of their ſubjects. Now there is not " any prince or ſtate of Europe, the inland countries of Hungary and Tranſilvania excepted, " but the Engliſh have trade withal; yea even with the Turk, Barbarian, Perſian and Indians; " only with the ſubjects of Savoy, I do not know that we have any medling or interchange at " all: for the duke has no port, his ditch of Villa-Franca excepted, which is only capable " of a few gallies, either to furniſh ſhips from, or to receive them, being ſtrangers. And " therefore for his majeſty of England to match his eldeſt and only daughter with a prince, " who has his dependance on other kings; a prince jeſuited, who can neither head us in time " of war, nor trade with us in time of peace; a prince, by the ſituation of his country, every " way unprofitable to us; and that, no leſs perilous for his majeſty's daughter to live in: I re- " ſolve myſelf, that he is of too excellent a judgment ever to accept of it, and his honourable " council too wiſe and provident to adviſe the proſecution thereof. Now, if his highneſs ſhould " be pleaſed to aſk my opinion, with what Chriſtian prince he ſhould match his ſiſter, were it " in his own power and choice to make election, I humbly deſire to be excuſed herein; for, " would it become me to preſume ſo far? It is true, I have heard it, that ſome overtures have " been made for the prince Palatine of the Rhine; certainly he is as well born as the duke of " Savoy, and as free a prince as he is. The nation is faithful; he is of our religion, and by " him we ſhall greatly faſten unto us the Netherlands: and, for the little judgment which God " has given me, I do prize the alliance of the Palatine of the RHINE, and of the Houſe of

" NASSAU,

"NASSAU, more than I do the alliance of ten dukes of Savoy." And thus ends his diſcourſe on the marriage of princeſs Elizabeth.[a]

WHAT follow'd was, that about a twelve-month after the writing of thoſe Diſcourſes, the ſaid princeſs was married to Frederick, elector palatine of the Rhine,[b] afterwards king of Bohemia; a match which might have well anſwer'd all the advantages expected from it, at leaſt one that had never been attended with ſuch a ſeries of calamities, were king James to have been moved, if not through honour and power, as a ſoveraign, yet through nature and affection, as a father, to have granted them a ſeaſonable ſupply againſt their enemies. Inſtead of which, his indulging, beyond all apprehenſion of poſſibility, at leaſt all production of precedent, a bleſſed peaceable temper, as his flatterers called it, to the ſitting down a quiet ſpectator of his childrens overthrow, and their fortunes, occaſion'd, not only all the lamentable wars which ſucceeded throughout Germany, to the utter ruin of his ſaid ſon-in-law, and all the princes who aſſiſted him; but alſo thoſe of his ſucceſſor at home, throughout his own dominions: For, daring not to draw his ſword, through fear of offending the Spaniard, he ſat muſing at home, one while, how to raiſe money by privy-ſeals, benevolences, crown-lands and woods, either to cram his inſatiable favourites, or elſe to fit out more prodigal and frivolous embaſſies, than would, by arms, have ſettled his children unmoveably in their throne; and, at other times, how to improve his ſoveraignty; or pick quarrels with his parliaments, and entail them to his heirs-general.[c]

As for the prince of Wales, he is ſaid to have firſt encourag'd the prince Elector to attempt his ſiſter; deſiring more to head an army in Germany, than he durſt make ſhew of, and would, no doubt, have been bravely follow'd:[d] but alas! that fate, which ſo often ſuffers the unworthy to flouriſh, deprived this kingdom of prince Henry in leſs than a month after the arrival of the ſaid Elector. Some have inſinuated, as if the Spaniards, becauſe his highneſs approved Ralegh's Diſcourſe touching a war with Spain, had a hand in his untimely end; alledging, that, if Philip the ſecond cut off his own hopeful ſon Charles, for but pitying the people of Flanders, it can be no wonder he (or his ſon) ſhould promote the deſtruction of a ſtranger, who did ſo far applaud the advice of Ralegh, as to ſay, No king, but his father, would keep ſuch a bird in a cage.[e] But, from more inteſtine and unnatural ſources, his ſudden death is ſurmiſed by others to have ſprung; the diſeaſe being ſo violent, that the combat of nature againſt it, in the ſtrength of youth (he being almoſt nineteen years of age) laſted but few days. Here it is ſomewhat remarkable, that after Sir Theodore Mayerne, with Dr. Butler, Hamond, and other moſt eminent phyſicians, had uſed the utmoſt of their ſkill in vain, and had the leaſt hopes imaginable left of the prince's recovery, that theſe ſhould be at laſt center'd in ſome relief that might be had from Sir Walter Ralegh, and that a cordial from him (a ſtate-priſoner) ſhould be ſent for, and, with conſent or approbation, adminiſter'd, when all other means had failed, and were given over, as we may gather from Sir William Cornwallis,[f] and other hiſtorians of thoſe times. As to the effect, tho' it came too late, ſo that it might rather prolong pain than life for a few hours, and truly muſt have been a kind of miracle to have reſtored one ſo far exhauſted, and on the point of expiring, for he died the ſame evening, being the 6th of November 1612: Yet, to obſervant readers, it is enough to manifeſt, firſt, what high reputation Sir Walter Ralegh's medicinal knowledge, through this Cordial, had now gained (and it afterwards encreaſed[g]) among the moſt ſkilful of the faculty; and ſecondly, the

His great Cordial ſent for to the prince, at the point of death.

[g] Inſomuch, that there has been a diſtinct volume written upon this Cordial; whereby I find it is not to be taken for that which is called Sir Walter Ralegh's cordial, in a book entitled, as I remember, The Lady's Cloſet open'd; for that is only a ſimple ſtrawberry-water. But this here meant, was his GREAT CORDIAL, as I find Ralegh, in one of his manuſcripts, has ſtyl'd it himſelf. This Cordial roſe into ſuch high repute, for its ſoveraign virtues, in the reign of king CHARLES II, and was ſo much recommended to and admir'd by him, that he commanded NICHOLAS le FEBVRE, the royal profeſſor in chymiſtry, and apothecary in ordinary to his majeſty's houſhold, to prepare a quantity of this precious remedy after the exacteſt manner, which the ſaid chymiſt not only did, but compoſed in French alſo, under his majeſty's auſpices and command, a Treatiſe entitled, Diſcours ſur le GRAND CORDIAL de Sir WALTER RALEGH, which he dedicates to the ſaid king: and this was at the ſame time tranſlated into Engliſh by PETER BELON, ſtudent in chymiſtry. For they were both licenſed on the 23d of April 1664; tho' the tranſlation appears to have been printed firſt, becauſe it is dated that year; and the original the unſteady and incoherent opinions which were entertain'd of one and the ſame man's loyalty; that he, who was accuſed at his trial of a plot to extirpate the royal family, ſhould yet be ſo far relied on to ſave it, as to have the lives firſt of queen Anne, as was before related, and now of prince Henry, truſted to his experiments. But, in a modern author, we have ſome further circumſtances of this paſſage, which I have not elſewhere met with. For, having ſpoken of the particular eſteem which prince Henry had contracted for Sir Walter Ralegh, the conſtant correſpondence he kept with him by letters and meſſages, and of the ſollicitations he had ſo repeatedly made to the king for his liberty, as what might contribute towards his majeſty's perſonal prejudice againſt Ralegh, he adds: "When the prince fell into his laſt "illneſs, the queen ſent to Sir Walter Ralegh for ſome of his cordial, which ſhe herſelf had "taken in a fever ſome time before, with remarkable ſucceſs. Ralegh ſent it, together with "a letter to the queen, wherein he expreſs'd a tender concern for the prince; and, boaſting "of his medicine, ſtumbled unluckily upon an expreſſion to this purpoſe, That it would cer-"tainly cure him, or any other, of a fever, except in caſe of poiſon. The prince dying, tho' "he took it; the queen, in the agony of her grief, ſhewed Ralegh's letter, and laid ſo much "weight on the expreſſion about poiſon, that to her dying day ſhe could never be diſſuaded "from the opinion, that her beloved ſon had foul play done him." [a] If this was true, there might be a ſtreſs too confidently laid on this medicine, in ſuppoſing that nothing but poiſon could reſiſt the power of it, and perhaps ſome inadvertency in ſtarting ſuch a ſuſpicion in a fond mother, which (in the ſaid modern writer's opinion) there might poſſibly be no ground for, and might, in the conſequence, prove fatal to Ralegh himſelf; tho' the ſame author alſo knew, Ralegh was not the only man who ſtarted that ſuſpicion; for he knew what the prince's domeſtic chaplain preach'd at St. James's on the diſſolution of his highneſs's family; and he knew what the lord chief juſtice Coke not long after ſaid in open court about the poiſoning of the year after: The French is in 12°, the Engliſh in 8vo. After the dedication, follows this introduction of the Recipe: ——— Eximium Cordiale Regium multis rebus neceſſariis auctum, ſecundum conſilium & approbationem illuſtriſſimorum virorum, D. Valentine, Paracelſus, and others; but finds none more worthy, in this particular, than Sir Walter Ralegh, becauſe he has not only ſelected moſt judiciouſly whatever is moſt choice and ſoveraign in the animal, vegetable, and mineral world; but has alſo manifeſted ſo much art and experience in the preparation of this great and admirable CORDIAL, as will, of itſelf, render him immortal: wherefore he ſays, he could not reſtrain the applauſes owing to his honour and glory, which he has more than merited by that noble labour and profound ſtudy, that acquired him the ſublime knowledge he had in the virtues and qualities of all thoſe ingredients, which unite to the compoſition of this incomparable remedy. So he proceeds to explain, firſt the virtues of every individual drug, which, together, cauſe thoſe rare effects this CORDIAL daily produces (ſays he) as well towards the heathful, as the ſick. Secondly, He ſpecifies how art helps nature in the harmonious and exquiſite method of the preparation. Thirdly, Diſtinguiſhes the efficacy of it in maritime or iſlandic and northerly countries. Laſtly, What a preſervative it is, as well as reſtorative; and concludes with the expoſition of the doſe, the quantity, time and method of uſing it. Thus much concerning this Diſcourſe on Sir WALTER RALEGH's great CORDIAL, of which the following particulars may be here farther obſerved: That the author le Febvre acknowledging, he had inſerted two ingredients, by the counſel and approbation of the aboveſaid Sir Kenelm Digby and Sir Alexander Fraiſer, which were not mention'd in the firſt preſcription, and which I have marked above in a different character, being the fleſh, heart, and liver of vipers, and the mineral unicorn which ſome would have to be the white loadſtone; it may induce the curious to enquire whether more liberties have not been taken with Sir Walter Ralegh's own genuine RECIPE. To this end, ſhould be conſulted the Engliſh copy thereof, in Sir Kenelm Digby's Collection of Receipts, printed a few years after le Febvre's book. Alſo Sir Walter Ralegh's book of Chymical Receipts, an original MS. in Sir Hans Sloane's library, marked B. 387. In which book (all written with Ralegh's own hand) there are, p. 63. b. theſe words, Our Great Cordial, and underneath, ſeveral ingredients ſet down, tho' not near the number above cited; but ſcor'd out again with a pen, tho' not illegibly. The next leaf is torn out, where 'tis ſuppoſed Ralegh had writ it more compleatly; and that, from this leaf, le Febvre's copy was taken. Laſtly, There is a receipt of this cordial remaining with a lady, who is a deſcendant from Sir Walter Ralegh; but, whether agreeing with thoſe in print, I have not, at this juncture, the leiſure for making a requeſt to be ſatisfied.

Sir

Sir Thomas Overbury: that it was to prevent the diſcovery of another crime of the ſame nature, committed upon one of the higheſt rank, whom he termed a ſweet prince;[a] and indeed ſeveral hiſtories of theſe times make no ſecret of it, where they ſhew the bickerings between prince Henry and the aforeſaid favourite Car, in regard to the counteſs of Eſſex, not to mention other motives. However, the phyſicians about the prince gave it under their hands, which was ſpread abroad in ſeveral copies, that he died of a ſtrong malignant fever, after they had anatomiz'd him to amuſe the world (ſays another writer) and clear the ſuſpicion of poiſon, as if no venoms could produce the like effects; while the king, to diſpel the clouds and monitors of ſorrow, commanded that no man ſhould appear at court in mourning.[b]

WHATEVER was the cauſe of this excellent prince's death, Ralegh had no common ſhare in the loſs of him; his highneſs having, but a few months before he died, obtained Sherborne, with intention to return it him, as is already obſerv'd; and we are further inform'd, that king James, to ſatisfy his favourite Car, who was now viſcount Rocheſter, gave him, inſtead thereof, twenty-five thouſand pounds in money: ſo far was the crown from gaining by this purchaſe.[c] But now, after the prince's death, this Rocheſter got Sherborne of the king again; however (as ſome kind of compoſition or amends) his majeſty, we are told by Ralegh himſelf, alſo gave his wife and ſon eight thouſand pounds for the ſaid eſtate.[d] But how it thrived with Rocheſter, is evident enough in the Hiſtories of thoſe Times; where it appears, that in little more than three years from this prince's death, the ſaid favourite, by the title of earl of Somerſet, was arraign'd and condemn'd for that black and ſhameful buſineſs of poiſoning Sir Thomas Overbury; whereby he not only loſt Sherborne, but all thoſe other poſſeſſions which the king had ſo laviſhly heaped upon him; for what merits or ſervices, may better appear in thoſe Hiſtories, than it is needful they ſhould do here. As to Sherborne, on whom it was next beſtowed, and upon what conſideration, with the attempts made after Ralegh's death by his ſon Carew to recover it; ſince the accounts thereof would carry us too far beyond the period in theſe ſheets propoſed, and indeed do more properly relate to the ſtory of the ſon, than the father, I ſhall here refer to an abſtract thereof, in a brief memorial of the ſaid Carew Ralegh, at the bottom of the page;[e] for as to his elder brother Walter, whoſe right it had firſt been to have purſued

The king's gift for his eſtate.

[e] Carew Ralegh was born, as is before obſerv'd, in the Tower, in the latter end of 1604 (or beginning of the next year) being aged about thirteen years at his father's death, as he tells us himſelf: became a gentleman-commoner of Wadham college in Oxford in 1620, as Anthony Wood informs us; but indeed rather ſooner, becauſe Carew Ralegh's own words are, that, after having been five years at Oxford, he came to court, and, by the favour of William earl of Pembroke, his noble kinſman, hoped to obtain ſome redreſs in his misfortunes; but the king, not liking his countenance, ſaid, he appeared to him like his father's ghoſt: whereupon the earl adviſed him to travel, which he did till the death of king James, which happen'd about a year after. Then returning, and a parliament ſitting, he, according to the cuſtom of this land, petition'd to be reſtor'd in blood, that he might be enabled to inherit whatever lands might fall to him, as his father's heir, or any other way: but his petition having been twice read in the houſe of lords, king Charles ſent Sir James Fullerton (then of the bed-chamber) for Mr. Ralegh, who being brought into the king's chamber by that knight, his majeſty (after uſing him with great civility) told him plainly, that he had formerly promiſed Sir John Digby, now earl of Briſtol, to ſecure his title to Sherborne (it being confer'd on him 14 of Jac.) againſt the heirs of Sir Walter Ralegh; whereupon Digby had given him, being then prince, ten thouſand pounds; ſo that now he was bound to make good his promiſe, being king; and therefore, unleſs he would quit all his right and title to Sherborne, he neither could, nor would paſs his bill of reſtoration. Mr. Ralegh urged the juſtice of his cauſe; that he deſir'd only the liberty of a ſubject, and to be left to the law, which was never deny'd any freeman: but the king was poſitive, and ſo left him. After this, Sir James Fullerton uſed many arguments to perſuade ſubmiſſion, as the impoſſibility of conteſting with kingly power, and the many inconveniences of not being reſtor'd in blood: all which conſider'd, together with ſplendid promiſes of great preferment in court, and particular favours from the king, not improbable, wrought much in the mind of young Mr. Ralegh, who, being not full twenty years old (as he ſays himſelf) left friendleſs and fortuneleſs, it prevailed ſo far, that he ſubmitted to the king's will. Whereupon there was afterwards an act paſſed 3° Caroli for his reſtoration; and, together with it, a ſettlement of Sherborne to the earl of Briſtol; and, in ſhew of ſome kind of recompence, four hundred pounds a year penſion, during life, was granted to Mr. Ralegh after the death of his mother, who had that ſum paid during her life, in lieu of joynture. About a twelvemonth after this, Mr. Carew Ralegh married the lady Philippa, relict of Sir Anthony Aſhley, a rich young widow, by whom he had two ſons and three daughters, and was not long after, at leaſt before the year 1635, made one of the Gentlemen of the king's privy-chamber. Among the ingenious poems of Thomas Carew Eſq; (who was another of thoſe gentlemen) printed 8vo. 1640, p. 80. there is a compliment, To his couſin C. R. marrying the lady A. by which letters are to be underſtood this Mr. Ralegh, and that lady Aſhley. As for the kind token, which Anthony Wood ſays the king honour'd him with at his majeſty's leaving Hampton-court, and going into the Iſle of Wight anno 1647, it was no more than a picture of the lady Stanley, as I remember, which was Mr. Ralegh's own property; therefore the king, among the letters he left on the table, deſired, in one of them, the ſaid picture might be returned him, as may appear by thoſe letters which were then printed, or the extract of them in Heath's Chronicle. In the year 1650, and afterwards, ſeveral little tracts of his father's were publiſh'd and dedicated to him. In 1651, there was a committee for the ſale of delinquents eſtates; and about that time the earl of Digby being fled to France, Mr. Ralegh had a fair proſpect to recover his eſtate, therefore deliver'd his Caſe in to the ſaid committee; and it was order'd, "That this Caſe be reported "to the houſe with the opinion of this committtee; That "they conceive him a fit object of their mercy." He alſo, about the ſame time, drew up a brief Relation of Sir Walter Ralegh's troubles, and addreſs'd it to the parliament. But whether printed before his death I know not, (the edition here uſed being dated three years after) nor wherefore his caſe and petition were laid aſide. In 1656, came out the Obſervations on Sanderſon's hiſtory of king James, which this hiſtorian ſuppoſing to be writ by Carew Ralegh, publiſh'd an Anſwer to it the ſame year, with ſome ſcandalous and unworthy reflections therein upon him: But no one has given heed to them. He certainly made his court ſued whatever proſpect there was of retrieving the ſaid eſtate, he died before their father, as will be more particularly remembred towards the concluſion of this work.

But which of theſe two ſons was attended on in his adventures by Ben Johnſon, is not eaſy to diſtinguiſh from the words of an author, who writes, "That Johnſon's mother, having married "to her ſecond huſband a bricklayer, took her ſon from Weſtminſter ſchool (where he had "made a hopeful progreſs under the learned Camden) and made him work at her huſband's "trade: till being pitied by ſome generous gentlemen, Camden got him a better employment; "which was to attend or accompany a ſon of Sir Walter Ralegh in his adventures, whereby "gaining experience, he made his company acceptable among many." [a] Now if this happen'd before Ben Johnſon took to acting or writing of plays, as our ſaid author relates it did, then Sir Walter Ralegh's eldeſt ſon was ſcarce old enough to go to ſchool, much leſs upon adventures. Beſides, this ſon never made, that we can hear of, more than one adventure abroad, from which he never return'd; therefore he could not part with his attendant or companion Ben Johnſon in the manner our ſaid author intimates he did after their return. Then if we ſuppoſe it the other brother, Carew, he never made any adventures at all, nor ſtir'd out of England till ſix years after his father's death, and then only upon a ſhort tour for about a twelvemonth; which was near thirty years after Ben Johnſon became a dramatick poet or writer for the ſtage; and when he ſeems rather to have wrote himſelf into his penſion from the crown, or otherwiſe into ſuch eaſy circumſtances, as render it unlikely he ſhould attend even on Carew Ralegh in thoſe ſorrows and difficulties he was then under; and conſequently in the whole, that either one or other ſhould part with him not in cool blood, as our ſaid author thinks, after their return. Had the time of his going abroad with the younger or the elder brother been better adjuſted, that particular of their parting would need no regard; ſeeing by what trifles, what miſunderſtandings between themſelves, or miſrepreſentations by others, ſuch diviſions are made between perſons, who would, or might otherwiſe be moſt ſerviceable and beneficial to one another. If Ben Johnſon was of ſuch a ſurly and hypercritical diſpoſition, as ſome men's writings, and indeed ſome of his own, have repreſented him; as it makes ſuch parting the more plauſible, if there had ever been any ſuch meeting, ſo it is probable it would have diſtill'd with more acrimony from his pen, when he was giving a character of Ralegh as an author, than that he could find nothing to condemn either in his judgment or his ſtile. [b] But as for Ralegh's temper, to all who had dependance upon him (and they were very numerous in the time of his felicity) eſpecially towards thoſe of any liberal knowledge and education, it appears to have been of ſingular candor and benignity. There are examples, further than what have been beforemention'd, of his courteſy, ſuperior to that of many other great perſons in his time, towards ſuch men of parts as any ways relied on his patronage or protection; and publickly aſſerted by thoſe themſelves, who had taſted the benefits thereof. [c] He has alſo, under his own hand, recommended ſuch generous treatment, as moſt coercive, eſpecially to ſuch as live under the power or command of others; and exploded the auſtere, the imperious regimen, as what is liable to betray its practitioners no leſs into peril than diſdain; where he ſhews, how contemptibly the vain, with affected ſourneſs, counterfeit the gravity of the wiſe; becauſe the ſhadow of reverence, thereby obtain'd, has power to delude the eyes only of underlings; and how thus, the time, wherein, by uſing it well, men might attain to be ſuch as they ought, they uſually miſpend, in ſeeking to appear ſuch as they are not: yet withal, not only how deceivable, but dangerous a courſe this is; procuring, inſtead of the reſpect that was hoped for, more indignation than was fear'd [d]. Many other weighty counſels and uſeful precautions to this purpoſe, are diſperſed up and down his writings, both in print and manuſcript, which (for brevity) I forbare, here, to recite.

His great courteſy towards his dependants;

court to the commons of England, in hopes of getting Sherborne by their means. Hence Wood ſays, he cringed to men in power, and was made governor of the Iſle of Jerſey, by the favour of general Monk, in the latter end of January 1659, as Whitlock has recorded. At the reſtoration of king Charles II, his majeſty would have conſer'd ſome perſonal honour upon him, but he declined it in hopes of ſomething better; the king therefore knighted his eldeſt ſon Walter, who died ſoon after at Weſt-Horſely, in Surrey, his father's ſeat, which had, I think, been the earl of Dorſet's; for his will is dated from thence, as a friend who has ſeen it informs me. This was ſold after Mr. Ralegh's death to Sir Edward Nicholas, ſecretary to king Charles. He had another ſeat at Kenton-Park near Hampton-Court, which, I think, he ſold himſelf; and dying in 1666, was buried in the [illegible]mber, according to A. Wood, in his father's grave; who further ſays, he has ſeen ſome ſonnets of his compoſition, and certain ingenious Diſcourſes in MS. alſo a poem ſet to muſick by Mr. Henry Lawes. Sir Henry Wotton, in his letters, gives him the character of a gentleman of dextrous abilities, and he is by others mentioned with honour; but far, God wot (ſays Wood) was he from his father's parts, either as to the ſword or pen.

But

But here, as Ralegh has been occaſionally mention'd in the character of an Author, we are reminded, that it is high time he ſhould be conſider'd more particularly in that light; which cannot in any place more properly be done, than in this ſedentary part of his life, when moſt of his works were written. Here then we are arriv'd at that part of his ſtory, wherein he will appear, rather a collegian than a captive; a ſtudent in a library, than a priſoner in the Tower. On this occaſion, we cannot but reflect, how well ſuch productions, in ſuch a ſituation! Such ſpacious exerciſes of genius, in ſuch a contracted ſtate! will prove, that, Tho' the ſoul of man, by a fly, or a hair, may be ſeparated from the body, tyranny itſelf cannot confine it to the body; and, at the ſame time, how trifling a calamity confinement muſt be, to thoſe who have well employ'd their liberty. Some men, impatient under ſo many years reſtraint, would have pined obſcurely away with deſpair; and others, with rage, have made their bonds more galling: but Ralegh, as in many other diſaſters, ſo in this, has left us no common example of an heroick mind. In him we may obſerve, there is no levelling a ſublime ſpirit with the ſubalterns of Nature: preſs it on one part, it will ſtill riſe in another; and be like ſome hardy plants we may have ſeen, whoſe heads will ſhoot forth and flouriſh in the ſight of mankind, tho' their roots are cloſely fetter'd in walls of ſtone. Happy then are they, who in their youth have ſo fortified themſelves with knowledge, and attained to ſuch a reliſh of literature, that, whereſoever they are driven by the perſecutions of power, they can make the contemplation of wiſdom beguile the ſenſe of their ſufferings! Who out of the moſt prevailing examples in all ages, of patience and prudence in all exigences, can ſet themſelves leſſons of fortitude, and taſks of imitation! Who can, out of the misfortunes of others, extract conſolations for themſelves; or partake in their proſperity, and make it tributary to their own contentment! Such carry with them an infallible, an undeprivable ſolace; which can relieve them in poverty with ineſtimable treaſure, and manumiſe them in priſon with intellectual liberty: for the multitudes of anxieties which ſurpriſe illiterate and uncultivated minds, even in the midſt of the moſt ſplendid affluence or adulation, are inacceſſible to them, under the darkeſt clouds of indigence or reproach.

That Ralegh, in his greener years, did attain to ſuch a taſte of letters as all his ſucceeding avocations could never remove; and which proved not only an ornament to thoſe his earlier and happier days, but a relief in his age and afflictions, even ſo as to render him under his darker fortunes and condition more illuſtrious than he was in his brighteſt proſperity, may appear by a ſurvey of his writings from the juvenile productions of his pen, to the more numerous and mature offſprings of his preſent confinement. But in this ſurvey, we think not the ſimple chronological method will be either needful or acceptable; which tho' eaſieſt and readieſt for tranſcribing, would be moſt crude and disjointed in reading; and yet be incapable of admitting all into their true order, becauſe we have not the time that ſeveral of his pieces were written. Therefore, that we may carry on our diſcourſe with ſome coherence, we ſhall attempt at ſuch a digeſtion as, upon a little review, will naturally ariſe, or moſt conveniently, at leaſt in this place, lead us, as out of a flowry garden, into the high-road again of publick action: for I might, perhaps, recommend ſome variation, in this arrangement, of the ſame pieces if they were to be reviv'd in a uniform and methodical edition of Sir Walter Ralegh's Works; ſo that the junior efforts of his muſe, or more extemporary products of his epiſtolary correſpondence might not, as here for diſpatch, lead up the reſt. His Writings.

Now as for theſe productions of his muſe, ſince ſeveral of them are mention'd in the former part of theſe ſheets, they need be here only recapitulated; as his poem on Gaſcoign's Steele-Glaſs; The Excuſe, The Silent Lover, the Anſwer to Marloe's Paſtoral; with his poem of Cynthia, and two more on Spencer's Fairy Queen. Since the time that theſe ſeven were before ſpoken of, I have met with four other ſuch like poetical pieces, which ſeem alſo to have been compos'd by the ſame hand, from thoſe elegant taulologies or retornellos wherein his ſonnets and madrigals are uſually ſo correſpondent with one another. [a] Theſe were all written long before this his impriſonment, as were probably ſome alſo in the Aſhmolean library; namely, Erroris Reſponſio, and Poetical.

[a] Three of theſe pieces are to be found in an old Collection of ſeveral ingenious Poems and Songs by the Wits of the Age: printed in 8*vo.* 1660, and annexed to a comical ſpeech in proſe, call'd Le Prince d'Amour, printed the ſame year; which, by the latter part thereof, entitled Noctes Templariæ; or, A brief Chronicle of the dark Reign of the bright Prince of burning Love, appears, in a volume of the Harleyan MSS. 90. C. 7. fol. 556, to have been written by Sir Benjamin Rudyerd. The poems publiſh'd with this ſpeech are improperly ſaid, in the title, to be written by the wits of the age in regard to the time they were publiſh'd: for, as the publiſher owns, in his dedication to the honourable ſociety of the Middle-Temple, the wit in this collection was born long before our unhappy inteſtine diviſions, and as much in the poems themſelves is evident; there being among them ſeveral written in the time of king James and queen Elizabeth; and one, or more, as old as king Henry VIII. Among the reſt, one we have page 131 entitled, The Lover's Maze, a poem of four ſtanzas, beginning thus: Her Face, her Tongue, her Wit, &c. 'Tis all compos'd of monoſyllables, and with that ingenious intricacy or tranſpoſure which happily anſwers and his Anſwer to the Lie, &c. Beſides, we find there is a ſatirical elegy on the death of the treaſurer Cecyll, earl of Salisbury, written within this period, likewiſe aſcrib'd to him; [a] and we have ſtill three pieces more of his poetry written afterwards, and but a ſhort time before his own death. Theſe are of a ſolemn nature; as his Pilgrim, his Epigram in Alluſion to the Snuff of a Candle; laſtly, a divine ſtanza, which is call'd his Epitaph. [b]

Epiſtolary. Next we might ſpeak of thoſe ſhorter pieces alſo in proſe, his Letters; and theſe, being written in all parts of his life, cannot perhaps be improperly enumerated in this. I have ſeen of them in print and manuſcript to the number of twenty-eight: Fourteen or fifteen of them have already been made uſe of in the foregoing ſheets; and the reſt, as they likewiſe are of perſonal import, will be ſerviceable in the remainder, ſo they need not be more particularly diſtinguiſh'd in this place.

But thoſe more continued compoſitions which were the reſult of experience and occaſion in his ſeveral publick profeſſions or engagements of life, will, perhaps, firſt demand our obſervation; ſuch as relate to his character as a warrior, a ſailor, a diſcoverer of unknown countries, and a politician vers'd in the intereſt of nations and the arts of government. Among theſe, we

Military. may firſt mention his military diſcourſes; and theſe concern either a defence of England in particular, or contain general arguments and examples of the cauſes and reaſons of war among mankind. On the former ſubject, he ſeems to have drawn up ſeveral remonſtrances which are but ſparingly and ſlowly come to light. However, from what has before been obſerv'd, of his having had a principal hand in the determinations of the grand Council of War for putting the nation in arms when it was under immediate apprehenſions of the Spaniſh Invaſion, there is good reaſon to believe he was alſo the author of a treatiſe, containing Notes of Direction for ſuch Defence of the Kingdom: written three years before, when the ſaid enemies were beginning to ſhew their deſigns. To this treatiſe was alſo join'd a Direction for the beſt and moſt orderly Retreat of an Army, whether in Campaign or Straits. And theſe were then preſented in MS. to the privy council. Herein, one advice is, ſince frontier forces are unlikely to prevent an enemy from landing, that if they ſhould land, through the deficiency or abſence of our ſhipping (for this is the force Ralegh was ever for having firſt us'd againſt ſuch foreign invaſions) it were better by driving or clearing the country of proviſions, and temporizing, to endeavour at growing ſtronger, and rendering the enemy weaker, than to hazard all by a confuſed and diſorderly deſcent of the populace to oppoſe the firſt landing, as their cuſtom heretofore was. But this, chiefly, among the ſaid reaſons and poſitions, for preventing an invading enemy, was a little before the approach of the Spaniſh Armada oppugned by Thomas Digges, Eſq; muſter maſter-general of her majeſty's forces in the Low-Countries, in a Diſcourſe of the beſt Order for repulſing a foreign Force, &c. which he then exhibited in print. This produced an Anſwer, which, having been found in an old manuſcript copy among others of Sir Walter Ralegh's Diſcourſes, has lately been publiſhed; and which, by ſeveral circumſtances therein, agreeing with many in his life as well as with ſeveral orders in the aforeſaid council of war, ſeveral paſſages in his Hiſtory of the World, and his other writings, offers many reaſons to believe it was written by him. [c] But if we would ſee his opinion upon this ſubject in a more extenſive and univerſal manner, ſwers the title. This is follow'd in the next page with another, of three ſtanzas, entitled Farewel to the Court; beginning thus: Like truthleſs dreams, ſo are my Joys expir'd: this is again ſucceeded in the enſuing page by another of equal length, call'd, The Advice; with this beginning: Many deſire, but few or none deſerve; and all three ſubſcribed W. R. They are apparently, by the ſtile, written at the time that Sir Walter Ralegh was celebrated for ſuch kind of compoſitions, and from the ſubject, of the two laſt eſpecially, no leſs manifeſtly to me, written by himſelf; the one juſt before his firſt Guianian expedition, the other, to the lady that was his wife. Laſtly, the fourth poem above refer'd to, is lately printed in a miſcellany call'd, The London Magazine, for Aug. 1734.

[a] This Paſtoral Elegy on the earl of Salisbury, who died in May 1612, was firſt printed by F. Osborne in his Memoirs of king James, and it begins thus: Here lies Hoſſinol our Paſtor while e'er, &c. That author tells us, "It came from ſo ſmart a pen, in the king's ſenſe, that "he ſaid, He hop'd the author would die before him: who "he was (con inues he) God knows." The firſt perſon I have met with who aſcribes it to Sir Walter Ralegh is the author of his life, printed in 8*vo.* 1677 (and afterwards in folio) whom Anthony Wood calls John Shirley, the writer of ſeveral romances and ſuch like things. This writer in that life, page 179 ſays, that Ralegh for Cecyll's kindneſs, beſtow'd upon him that epitaph, "Which "I am, ſays he, upon very good grounds, aſſur'd to be "his."

[c] 'Tis entitled, A Military Diſcourſe: whether it be better for England to give an Invador preſent Battle, or to temporiſe and defer the ſame, &c. Now publiſh'd by Nathanael Booth, of Grays-Inn, Eſq; 8*vo.* 1734. containing 52 pages. The Author, in his introduction, tells us, "He "has thought good, firſt to ſet down the reaſons alledg'd "on both ſides, as he finds them collected by his antago-"niſt; and after a reply to his objections, refers himſelf "to the cenſure of the reader who is a ſoldier; not caring, "in this cauſe, for the diſallowance of any, who will "bring a pound of antique uſages and cuſtoms to weigh "down only an ounce of true reaſon and freſh experience." Then he ſets forth that Brief Diſcourſe of the beſt Orders for repulſing foreign Forces, &c. abovemention'd; which having been reprinted under the title of England's Defence, a Treatiſe againſt Invaſion, Folio 1680, and under the name of Thomas Digges, as I have found in the copious library of a learned acquaintance; it is therefore aſcribed to him above. That diſcourſe of Digges's which in this military diſcourſe begins at page 4, and ends page 13, is accompany'd in almoſt every article with our reſpondent's marginal notes, and attended at the end with a reply to the reaſons therein; the whole winding up with the chief points of his former treatiſe, collected into brief notes of direction, manner, it muſt be in his Diſcourſes of the original and fundamental cauſe of natural and neceſſary, arbitrary and cuſtomary, holy and civil wars; which tho' alſo publiſh'd ſeveral years after his death, have ſufficient marks of genuineneſs upon them. There are other writings of his beſides, which relate to this topick. But as war in them is treated of ſubordinately, and rather with reſpect to ſome national advantages wherewith it might have been maintain'd againſt our enemies as the poſture of affairs then was, or the perſonal behaviour of ſome particular men, ſo we may think it more proper to ſpeak of them under other diviſions.

Among theſe, that which admits of his Maritime Diſcourſes, may not perhaps be leaſt obſerva- Maritimal.
ble, being a ſubject ſo ſcarcely handled by men of ſuch learning and experience, yet of ſuch importance to a people in our ſituation. And under this head, that which ſhould here be perhaps firſt ſpoken of, tho' indeed one of the laſt pieces he wrote in this ſtate of durance is, his Diſcourſe of the Invention of Shipping, &c. [b] wherein he treats of the uſe, defects, and improvements direction, as is above obſerv'd, which he had preſented to ſome of the lords of the council in 1585; and which gave occaſion to Digges his ſaid Brief Diſcourſe in or near the year 1588, and that produced this Military Diſcourſe about or ſoon after 1590, including the ſame, and comprifing the whole of the controverſy. The Editor of this pamphlet, in his dedication to the Duke of Argyle, has theſe words to his Grace: "Having lately, among ſome "other valuable papers of Sir Walter Ralegh, found the "following diſſertation in manuſcript, I thought the "publication thereof was a debt due to my country, as "well as to the memory of that great man." And I have in the copy which the ſaid gentleman communicated for my peruſal, mark'd out near twenty paſſages and expreſſions, which ſo well agree with others in the life and writings of Sir Walter Ralegh, that I cannot think any other perſon to have been the author of thoſe notes and reply. Such among the reſt are his being in the wars of France and Flanders, particularly the battle of Moucountor, and that of Rimenant; his perfect knowledge of Dover haven, and other incidents mention'd before in his life: beſides his hiſtorical obſervations of other perſons; which, with ſeveral reaſons and arguments about landing of forces, and the unproportionable ſpeed of marching up an army to keep pace with the ſailing of a fleet, almoſt in the ſame words as we have before obſerved out of his Hiſtory of the World, and his other writings.

[a] So I find two diſcourſes of Sir Walter Ralegh's properly titled. The firſt is printed in his eſſays, 8*vo*. 1650, and has been reprinted in the Three Diſcourſes of Sir Walter Ralegh 8*vo*. 1702, beginning thus: "The ordinary theme "and argument of hiſtory is war; which may be defin'd "the exerciſe of violence under ſoveraign command, againſt "withſtanders force; authority and reſiſtance being the "eſſential parts thereof." But in this laſt edition, improperly divided, and the laſt diviſion entitled of Eccleſiaſtical power; whereas in the firſt edition, and the leaf F 2 b, which would have been page 40 had it been number'd, this new titled diviſion appears only a continuation of the Original Cauſe of War; tho' indeed, through the papal power and diſpenſations, by that diſtinction which is called holy war. This diviſion is alſo miſplaced in the ſaid laſt edition; for there is another diſcourſe of unnatural or civil war interfering. This, tho' never before printed, I have alſo reaſon to believe genuine from ſome paſſages in it that might be parallel'd with others in his Hiſtory of the World and elſewhere: but it ſhould be placed or printed laſt, becauſe the very firſt words of it are, "The laſt "kind of war we ſhall treat of is the unnatural, otherwiſe "called the inteſtine or civil war; and tho' it has the "ſame motives of ambition, avarice or revenge as the "arbitrary and cuſtomary war, yet is of a quite different "nature, and muſt be otherwiſe defin'd, &c."

[b] This appears in ſeveral parts to be a genuine piece of our author, but incorrectly printed; as moſt of his poſthumous works are, eſpecially in the proper names. 'Tis the firſt diſcourſe in a book call'd, Judicious and ſelect Eſſays and Obſervations of that renowned and learned Knight Sir Walter Ralegh; printed in 8*vo*. 1650 1667, and (this Diſcourſe of Shipping) reprinted again, among the Genuine Remains of Sir Walter Ralegh, at the end of an Abridgment of his Hiſtory of the World, 8*vo*. 1700. That book of Eſſays is dedicated, by the bookſeller, to the much honoured Carew Ralegh, Eſq; &c. And this firſt Diſcourſe therein conſiſts of 42 pages; yet ſeems an unfiniſh'd piece, and at the end, to our great regret, no more than the firſt chapter of a larger work. As the time when the Diſcourſe beforemention'd of the cauſes of war was written, may be gueſs'd from that paſſage in it mentioning the maritime controverſy between Selden and Grotius; ſo the time when this Diſcourſe of Shipping was compos'd, may be likewiſe infer'd from Sir Walter's reference page 39, to a pamphlet call'd The Trades Encreaſe, which I have ſeen and obſerv'd to be printed, 4*to*. 1615: unleſs there was a prior edition. Of both theſe Diſcourſes I have been oblig'd with two old manuſcript copies by Nathanael Booth, of Grays-Inn, Eſq; beforemention'd. They ſeem to have been corrected from the printed copies in ſome places, and indeed will not yield many conſiderable corrections of them in others. There may need no apology for the following extract from this laſt diſcourſe of our author's obſervations on the Improvement of Shipping in his own Time; ſince he is affirm'd to his immortal glory, to have had himſelf ſo great a ſhare in it.

"Whoſoever was the inventor, we find that every age "has added ſomewhat to ſhips, and to all things elſe. "And in my own time, the ſhape of our Engliſh ſhips "has been greatly better'd. It is not long ſince the "ſtriking of the top-maſt (a wonderful eaſe to great ſhips "both at ſea and harbour) has been deviſed, together "with the chain-pump, which takes up twice as much "water as the ordinary one did. We have lately added "the bonnet and the drabbler. To the courſes we have "deviſed ſtudding ſails, top-gallant ſails, ſprit ſails, top-ſails. The weighing of anchors by the capſton is alſo "new. We have fall'n into the conſideration of cables, "and thereby reſiſt the malice of the greateſt winds that "can blow; witneſs our ſmall Milbrook-men of Cornwall, "that ride it out at anchor half leas over between England "and Ireland, all the winter quarter: and witneſs the "Hollanders, who were wont to ride before Dunkirk with "the wind at north-weſt, making a lee-ſhore in all "weathers. For true it is, that the length of the cable "is the life of the ſhip in all extremeties; and the reaſon "is, becauſe it makes ſo many bendings and waves, as "the ſhip riding at that length, is not able to ſtretch it, "and nothing breaks that is not ſtretch'd. In extremity, "we carry our ordnance better than we were wont; be-"cauſe our nether-overloops are raiſed commonly from the "water between the lower part of the port and the ſea. "In king Henry VIII's time, and in his preſence at "Portſmouth, the Mary Roſe, by a little ſway of the ſhip "in caſting about, her ports being within ſixteen "inches of the water, was over-ſet and loſt, and in her "that worthy knight Sir George Carew, couſin-germain "to the lord Carew now living; and with him, beſides "many other gentlemen, the father of the late renowned "Sir Richard Grenvile. We have alſo raiſed our ſecond "decks, and given more vent thereby to their ordnance "lying on our nether-overloops. We have added croſs-pillars "in our Royal ſhips, to ſtrengthen them, which being "faſtned from the kelſon to the beams of the ſecond deck, "keep them from ſettling or giving way in all diſtreſſes. "We have given longer floors to our ſhips than in elder "times, and better bearing under water; whereby they "never fall into the ſea, after the head, and ſhake the "whole body or ſink ſtern nor ſtoop upon a wind, by "which the breaking looſe of our ordnance or diſuſe of "them, with many other diſcommodities are avoided. "And to ſay the truth, a miſerable ſhame and diſhonour "it were for our ſhip-wrights, if they did not exceed all "other in ſetting up of our Royal ſhips; the errors of "other nations being far more excuſable than ours: for "the kings of England have for many years been at the "charge to build and furniſh a navy of powerful ſhips for "their own defence, and for the wars only; whereas the "French, Spaniards, Portugals and Hollanders, till of late, "have had no proper fleet belonging to their princes or "ſtates." Thus far Sir Walter Ralegh, in his ſaid Diſcourſe of Shipping, p. 16, &c. And thus much of it may not be thought impertinent in his life, at leaſt in this ſubjunctive manner, ſince theſe improvements, or ſome of them

ments thereof; the ſtrength and deficiency of the ſea forces of England, France, Spain and Venice, with five cauſes of the riſe of the Hollanders: his encouragement of a mutual friendſhip between them and England, as alſo of the Newcaſtle trade. This might lead us more particularly to his excellent Obſervations and Notes concerning the royal Navy and Sea Service, [a] which he dedicated to the prince of Wales as is before mention'd; therefore all we need obſerve more of it in this place is, that herein he diſcourſes under diſtinct heads, of the officers of the navy, of ſome errors to be reformed in ſhip-building; and others, in harboring and manning the fleet; of ſurcharging them with great ordnance; the defects in ſheathing and calking; the abuſes in victualling; inconveniency of the cook-rooms; of muſtering and preſſing mariners; of arms and munition; and laſtly, of captains to ſerve in his majeſty's ſhips. With the ſecond head or chapter in this tract, agrees his letter to prince Henry before ſpoken of, concerning the model of a ſhip. [b] And in his introduction to the ſaid Obſervations, as was alſo ſaid, our author mentions a Diſcourſe of a maritimal voyage, with the paſſages and incidents therein, [c] which he had formerly written to that prince. This, if it is now in being, muſt, I think, remain ſtill in manuſcript; for no other knowledge of it have I elſewhere met with; therefore it has, I fear, endured the ſame fate with that other work, probably, more copious and conſiderable, and to which, as what might ſeem deſign'd to bring the others into practice, they may appear only preparatory. This work, tho' taken notice of by no other author who has written of him, is thus mention'd by himſelf. "Of the Art of War by Sea, I have written a treatiſe to the lord Henry, prince of "Wales. A ſubject, to my knowledge, never handled by any Man ancient or modern: but "God has ſpared me the labour of finiſhing it, by the loſs of that brave prince; of which, like "an eclipſe of the ſun, we ſhall find the effects hereafter. Impoſſible it is to equal words and "ſorrows: I will therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him: Curæ leves loquuntur; "ingentes ſtupent." [d] This may lead us up to ſuch of his diſcourſes as repreſent this art in execution, particularly thoſe two gallant naval actions wherein Sir Richard Grenvile loſt his life, and himſelf won a moſt ſignal victory, of which his own pen has preſerved the faithful memorials in his Report of the Truth of the Fight about the Iſles of Azores, [e] and his epiſtolary account of the Action at Cadiz; [f] both of them before abſtracted into this work. Nor did his care terminate in the beſt advice for the regulation and maintainance of our ſhipping, or in recording ſome of the moſt notable atchievements perform'd therewith, but extended to the choice and reparation of the moſt convenient harbours for their reception; and that not only by his ſpeeches in parliament, as we have already ſeen, but alſo by a memorial he preſented to queen Elizabeth touching the port of Dover in particular; declaring how honourable and profitable to her majeſty; how neceſſary and commodious for the realm, the rebuilding it would be; with the leaſt expenſive, and moſt perfect manner of performing the ſame. [g]

Geographical

But if we advance to his more extenſive purſuits and performances relating to that topick, they will lead us into a new Geography, into diſcoveries and deſcriptions of unknown countries, with the Voyages which himſelf and others under his charge and directions made to that purpoſe. And under this head would fall thoſe papers and diſcourſes of his, concerning the diſcovery, plantation, and ſettlement of Virginia, which were in the poſſeſſion of Sir Francis Walſingham, as was before obſerv'd; [h] but whether now recoverable I know not, nor what is become of his Trea- them ſeem to have a nearer relation to him, than, through his prudence, in the ſtate he now was, or perhaps the notoriety of his ſhare in theſe improvements, it was needful further to expreſs; for I have read in the Appendix to a Hiſtory of the Inventors of Arts and Sciences, printed 12*mo.* 1686. That we owe the ſerviceable model of our modern ſhip building to the inventions or directions of Sir Walter Ralegh. And to the ſame purpoſe of effectually employing this his ſuperior knowledge in naval architecture to the ſafeguard and ſtrength of the nation, we may preſume thoſe grants were made him by queen Elizabeth for felling of Timber; one whereof is extant, entitled a Warrant to Sir Walter Ralegh for two hundred Oaks, to be taken in Sir Francis Engleſfield's woods; and it is preſerved in the Aſhmolean Muſæum at Oxford.

[a] Printed 8*vo.* 1650, in the collection of Sir Walter Ralegh's Eſſays abovemention'd; conſiſting of 46 pages.

[b] Printed in Sir Walter Ralegh's Remains, 12*mo.* 1651, and the ſubſequent editions, containing between 3 and 4 pages.

[e] Of this Report of the Fight about the Azores, containing about two ſheets, ſee, in this narrative of Sir Walter Ralegh's life, the abſtract and references from fol. 60 to 63, alſo the note to the firſt reference in fol 47. And here further concerning the ſame, we may obſerve that it ſeems to have given matter for an heroick poem; which was, a few years after the ſaid Report, publiſhed: Entitled The moſt honourable Tragedy of Sir Richard Grenvile, Knt. 8*vo.* 1595, dedicated to the lord Monjoy by Jervis Markham. 'Tis compoſed in ſtanzas of eight verſes, and near ninety pages in length.

[f] This Relation of the Cadiz Action, contains near 7 pages, among the Remains at the end of an Abridgment of Sir Walter Ralegh's Hiſtory of the World, 8*vo.* 1700, was then firſt publiſh'd by Philip Ralegh, Eſq; and is apparently a genuine piece, as may be gather'd from thoſe other accounts interwoven and agreeing with it, where it is (moſtly) before inſerted, fol. 95.

[g] This Memorial touching Dover Port is alſo before refer'd to, fol. 143. It conſiſts of about two ſheets in the pamphlet there mention'd, call'd An Eſſay on Ways and Means to maintain the Honour and Safety of England, publiſhed by Sir H. Shears, 4*to.* 1701. The publiſher ſays, page 9, for the part aſcribed to Sir Walter Ralegh goes no further; that he found this part of the memorial, drawn up by Sir Walter Ralegh or Sir Dudley Digges, among the rubbiſh of old papers, while he ſerv'd in the office of ordnance. But I think it could not be writ by Sir Dudley Digges, becauſe the author directing himſelf to queen Elizabeth, ſpeaks familiarly of things he had ſeen in the Low Countries in her time, when Sir Dudley Digges had not left the univerſity.

tiſe of the Weſt Indies, which ſeems to have been a very comprehenſive work by the ſhort ſketch himſelf has given of its contents before quoted. [a] Better luck ſeems to have befal'n his writings upon Guiana; for we have at leaſt four of his diſcourſes on that country in being, tho' they, probably, are not all he writ thereon; as firſt, his Conſiderations on the Voyage for Guiana, which I never ſaw in print. [b] Secondly, his Diſcovery of the large, rich, and beautiful empire of Guiana, which he printed himſelf, and being, before, largely uſed and ſpoken of, the leſs need be ſaid of it here. [c] Thirdly, his Journal of his ſecond Voyage to Guiana. This remains ſtill in manuſcript, and perhaps ſhould do ſo; it being unfiniſh'd and full of chaſms, ſeeming to contain only notes and obſervations for his own memory, when he ſhould have leiſure at his return into England to digeſt and fill up the particulars in a continued diſcourſe: accordingly it ſeems to have ſupply'd him therewith, when he wrote his Apology for the ſaid Voyage. But as both theſe will be made uſe of in the ſubſequent part of our narrative, 'twill be then time enough to ſpeak more diſtinctly of them. And there alſo will be mention'd the four or five letters we have of his extant concerning the ſaid laſt expedition.

After his writings, becoming the character of an able commander both by land and ſea, if we look for him as an author in the civil or political capacity, we may find him there alſo no leſs eminent; we may behold him in this light no leſs qualified to govern nations, than in the other to conquer and defend them. Some of his compoſitions under this diſtribution, are of a general nature; as that call'd the Seat of Government, ſhewing it to be upheld by the two great pillars of civil juſtice and martial policy; and how this is fram'd out of the husbandmen, merchants and gentry of the realm. The firſt of theſe ranks or degrees he calls the fruit trees of the kingdom; or thoſe who gather the honey, yet hardly enjoy the wax: and as theſe feed, ſo the ſecond ſort enrich it; nouriſhing ſuch trades as have aſſiſted our kings with great ſums of money, and great fleets, upon occaſion; while the third ſort, our gentry, he calls the garriſons of good order throughout the realm; or means rather they have been, or ſhould be ſuch, more than they were in theſe latter times, to agree with a note he has elſewhere dropt upon them. [d] But this little eſſay appears, by one expreſſion towards the concluſion (mentioning ſomething to be hereafter prov'd, which is not) to be no more than a fragment. [e] The like we apprehend of his Obſervations concerning the Cauſes of the Magnificency and Opulency of Cities, from a word in the very firſt paragraph, referring to ſuch people as ſeem to have been before mentioned. [f] Tho' in the main this is a general diſcourſe, it bears ſome particular references to a rude and barbarous people; and might poſſibly be the reſult of ſuch conſiderations as muſt have engaged his mind, when thoſe propoſitions were on foot for founding the City of Ralegh in Virginia, as was before intimated. In this little eſſay, after having ſpoken of the means to civilize and reform ſuch a people, he proceeds, under diſtinct heads, to treat of the beſt ſituation of cities for ſafety and plenty; of the multitude of inhabitants, religion, academies, courts of juſtice, artificers, Political.

[b] The contents of this manuſcript may be conceived from the words wherewith it begins, which are as follows: "Touching the voyage for Guiana, it is to be conſider'd; "firſt, Whether it be to be undertaken? ſecondly, The "manner of ſubduing it; and laſtly, The means how to "ſubdue it, and annex it to the crown imperial of Eng- "land." It conſiſts of eight leaves in quarto, and is, I believe, a rarity; having no where met with it but among the magnificent collections of Sir Hans Sloane.

[c] After the extract from this treatiſe, of what more perſonally concerns Sir Walter Ralegh, before inſerted in this life, from fol. 77 to 88, follows a character of his ſaid diſcourſe upon the diſcovery of Guiana from ſeveral authors; which might ſtill be augmented from the further teſtimony of one of them, namely, Robert Harcourt of Stanton-Harcourt, Eſq; whoſe voyage to Guiana in 1608, having met with, in his own edition, printed 4to. 1613, among the collections of that learned and worthy gentleman Mr. George Sale, I find a preface prefixed thereto, omitted in Purchas's edition before uſed; in which captain Harcourt, having declared how effectually and faithfully Sir Walter Ralegh had publiſh'd what he then and there diſcover'd, recommends to the reader's peruſal "This excel- "lent diſcourſe, proceeding, ſays he, from ſo wiſe and "judicial an author; who, if ſome known fortunes (mean- "ing his engagements at Cadiz, in the Iſland voyage, "&c.) had not croſſed his firſt intendments, for the pro- "ſecuting that enterprize, had, in all likelihood, long "before this time, encreaſed the honour of our nation, by "the moſt famous and rich diſcovery and conqueſt that the "world could afford." Beſides the two editions in Engliſh, the firſt whereof publiſh'd by Ralegh, contains about 13 ſheets, and the other in Hakluyt, about 9, alſo one in Latin before mention'd, printed in 4to. at Noremberg with a map: there are accounts of two editions of Sir Walter Ralegh's voyage to Guiana in Dutch, one 4to. 1612, which muſt be this of his diſcovery, and the other in 1619. Edmund Howes, in his Addition to Stow's Annals, ſays, it has been tranſlated almoſt into all languages. But whether the exquiſite tranſlation into Latin, he ſays there is of it in one of Theodore de Bry's volumes of Modern Navigations, is the ſame with the Latin edition in 4to. before mention'd, or any ſuch there is among thoſe valuable volumes, I am not yet certain; tho' I remember much in one of them, printed at Frankfort, Fol. 1590, relating to the firſt Virginian voyages; whereby it appears, Sir Walter Ralegh was a great patron and encourager of the ſaid author, and which would have confirmed or embelliſhed ſome paſſages in that part of theſe ſheets which gives account thereof, had the intelligence, I have ſince been favour'd with by an honourable gentleman, arrived timely enough to have been admitted in its proper place.

[e] This Seat of Government was printed firſt, I think, in Ralegh's Remains, 12mo. 1651, and in the laſt or largeſt edition is not above 4 pages, beginning thus: They ſay that the goodlieſt Cedars, &c. as is in a note before quoted.

[f] Theſe Obſervations were printed at the ſame time, in the ſame collection, and contain about 11 pages: Beginning thus: That the only way to civilize and reform the ſavage and barbarous lives and corrupt manners of ſuch people, is, &c.

privileges, and triumphs; ſo concludes with thoſe three cauſes of confirming a city in her greatneſs, juſtice, peace and plenty. Of a more extenſive nature ſtill is that treatiſe we have of his, called Maxims of State; [a] being a methodical compendium of government in all or moſt of its forms and branches; with many of its chapters analytically digeſted for the ſake of brevity and perſpicuity. Herein having explain'd and defin'd the words government, policy, ſtate and the office of ſoveraignty, he proceeds to diſtinguiſh the ſeveral ſorts of monarchy, ariſtocracy, free ſtate, tyranny, oligarchy, and commonwealth. Then of the founding a ſtate, with its parts, and of preſerving it under thoſe ſeveral forms, by myſteries or ſophiſms, rules or actions. Laſtly, the converſion of ſtates, general and particular, by foreign invaſion, domeſtick ſedition, or alteration without violence. Thus ends this treatiſe; to which is join'd, as a kind of corollary for the better uſe of the book, two or three paſſages in the ſtory of David: from whence an inference is drawn, that old age is not always unfit for government; and alſo a defence of that prince for marrying Abiſhag: ſo cloſes with a portrait of political nobility, in the ſtory of Adonijah aſpiring to the kingdom; with obſervations of the marks to diſcern ſuch practices; and another of the political prince, in a farther example of the ſaid king David; who, tho' aged, deſerted, and rebell'd againſt by many of his nobles, ſtir'd up himſelf to publick action, and thereby ſhew'd his vigor and ſufficiency to manage the affairs of his kingdom. Herewith may be mention'd that larger treatiſe bordering upon theſe ſubjects, which is call'd The Arts of Empire, &c. [b] but handled in a different manner. It is divided into twenty-ſix chapters, defining publick weals, and differencies of ſoveraignty; more particularly the three kinds of monarchy, and how to perpetuate them. Alſo of councils and counſellors, officers, commiſſioners, magiſtrates and miniſters of ſtate. Of juſtice, treaſure and war. Of neighbouring princes. The character of an excellent prince. Art of ruling. Of princely authority, power and force. Of conſpiracy and treaſon, publick hatred, diffidence and diſſimulation. Of war, defenſive and invaſive, law of arms, ſoldiers and their diſcipline. Of generals and commanders, councils of war, directions tactic and ſtratagemic; with advice how to make an honourable peace. Of civil war; with the cauſes and remedies thereof. And the two laſt chapters contain a collection of political obſervations, and maxims of ſtate; or prudential grounds and polemical precepts concerning all ſtates and forms of policy, &c. confirm'd by ſelect narrations and hiſtorical parallels.

But if we deſcend to thoſe political writings of our author, which were occaſionally compos'd; and with more particular regard to the exigents of ſtate in his own time, through the virtues of a penetrating eye into the drifts of every neighbouring nation, and an undiſcourageable heart for the ſecurity and intereſt of his own; we ſhall find them ſtill more numerous. And theſe, as they moſt of them have a ſpecial regard to Spain, might proceed from the perfect knowledge he had of that kingdom and its tyrannical practices. One inſtance hereof we have in that diſcourſe of The Spaniards Cruelties to the Engliſh in Havanna; which is aſcrib'd to Sir Walter Ralegh, with other tracts, in a volume among the manuſcripts of a late perſon of honour. [c] His many other obſervations of this kind might well produce his Conſultation about the Peace with Spain, and our protecting the Netherlands, of which ſome account has been before given; [d] as alſo that other treatiſe, How War may be made with Spain and the Indies, mention'd in the ſame place. Directions for ſuch an enterprize may be eaſily preſumed to have been effectually enough given by

In the ſecond edition it was titled, The Arts of Empire, and Myſteries of State diſcabineted, &c. 8*vo*. Lond. 1692; containing 238 pages, and beginning with theſe words, A commonwealth is a certain ſoveraign government of many families, &c.

[c] See a Catalogue of the Library of a Perſon of Honour, &c. with near a thouſand choice manuſcripts relating to the ſtate of England and Ireland, 4*to*. without date, p. 10. This library was ſold, in the former part of the late queen's reign, by Chriſtopher Bateman, a noted bookſeller, who once told me to whom thoſe manuſcripts did belong; and if my memory fails not, they were a part of Henry earl of Clarendon's vaſt collections, yet a different part, I think, from that which is in the poſſeſſion of his grace the Duke of Chandos.

[d] See before in theſe ſheets, fol. 150, where there is a manuſcript of this Conſultation quoted; which in ſome places is more perfect than the printed copy, and is the property of the reverend and learned Mr. Harbin. It begins thus: May it pleaſe your majeſty: It belongs not to me to judge whether the king of Spain hath done wrong to the Netherlands, or the Netherlands have fail'd in allegiance towards the king, &c. 47 pages in the printed copy, publiſh'd by Philip Ralegh, as was before obſerv'd, 8*vo*. 1702. That manuſcript has, annexed to it, the Determinations of the Council of War in 1587, before mention'd fol. 39. A manuſcript alſo of the ſaid Conſultation, there was in the library of the earl of Angleſea; another in the Harleyan library; another in that of Dr. John Mort, late biſhop of Ely; another in Sir Hans Sloane's, &c. &c.

the ſame hand that was alſo author of The preſent State of Spain, with a moſt accurate Account of his Catholick Majeſty's Power and Riches: alſo the Names and Worth of the moſt conſiderable Perſons in that Kingdom: a manuſcript which I have not hitherto been ſo ſucceſsful as to meet with. [a] Yet take it to be a different performance from that alſo written by our author, and entitled, The preſent State of Things, as they now ſtand between the three Kingdoms, France, England, and Spain; whereof there is a copy in being. [b] Further, it was this intimate knowledge he had in the ſtate of all the European princes, which ſo well qualified him to give the approved advice he did in thoſe two Diſcourſes he wrote upon The Match propounded by the Savoyan, between the lady Elizabeth and the prince of Piedmont: And that between prince Henry of England, and a daughter of Savoy, of which we have ſeveral manuſcript copies, and, as I have heard, the original alſo extant. [c] The ſame knowledge likewiſe, enabled him ſo dexterouſly to eviſcerate the corrupt doctrines, and pernicious deſigns of the papiſts, in his Dialogue between a Jeſuite and a Recuſant; ſhewing how dangerous their Principles are to Chriſtian Princes. [d] Another excellent tract we have of his in this way of writing is, his Dialogue between a Counſellor of

[a] Anthony Wood tells us, this treatiſe, ſaid to have been written by our author Sir Walter, is a MS. going about from hand to hand; and before him, Shirley, in his Life of Sir Walter Ralegh, calls it an excellent manuſcript.

[b] In the Harleyan library, N°. 38, B, 3. 'Tis a tract of about three ſheets and a page in folio, copied, as appears, about the reign of king Charles I, and begins with theſe words, The three great kingdoms, France, England, and Spain, as they now ſtand, may be compar'd to the election of a king of Poland, where there are three factions, and in the end, two of them join'd together, are able to overcome the third.

[c] The firſt of theſe diſcourſes by Sir Walter Ralegh on the Marriage of the Princeſs Elizabeth begins thus: To obey the commandments of my lord the prince, I have ſent you my opinion of the match lately deſired by the duke of Savoy, &c. It makes about five ſheets and half a page in the MS. before me, which ſeems to have been a good old copy taken ſoon after this diſcourſe was firſt compoſed by our author; tho' four of the leaves towards the beginning are now much damag'd. Join'd to this, is the ſecond Diſcourſe, touching a Marriage between Prince Henry and a Daughter of Savoy; beginning with theſe words, There is no body that perſuades our prince to match with Savoy for any love to the perſon of the duke, nor, as I hope, for his religion, &c. and this, in the ſame hand, is about ſix ſheets in length. They were both originally written in the ninth year of king James's reign; or anno Dom. 1611, as was before obſerv'd; and this copy of theſe diſcourſes, was by the intereſt of a noble perſonage procured, for this uſe, from the collections of that worthy divine lately in theſe notes mention'd. There is a copy of this laſt Diſcourſe on the Prince's Marriage among the MS. collections of Sir Hans Sloane; mark'd in his library, B, 612; and another in the library of Trinity college in Dublin. In the Cottonian library alſo, there is a copy of this laſt diſcourſe, but I think not of the other. It was once a fair one, but ſcarcely ſo ancient as that above us'd, and by miſtake, the amanuenſis had aſcrib'd it to Sir A. Gorges; for this name is ſtruck out and Sir Walter Ralegh's inſerted in the ſame hand. By another miſtake, of the binder, there is but half of this tract to be found in one volume, the remainder being bound in that mark'd with the preceding number. See the ſaid volumes under the buſt of Vitellius, C, N°. 17 and 16. But the greateſt miſtake of all was, the ſuffering of women-ſervants to get up their linnen in rooms underneath thoſe where the Royal library, with this of Sir Robert Cotton, were lately kept at Aſhburnham-houſe, in Weſtminſter; for thereby, a mantle-tree taking fire, (which lay acroſs a ſtove-grate) on the 23d of October, 1731, it made ſuch deſtruction among the ſaid manuſcripts, that of nine hundred forty-eight volumes, whereof the Cottonian library conſiſted, ſeven hundred forty-ſix only eſcaped the flames; a hundred fourteen being quite loſt or intirely ſpoil'd, and ninety-eight damaged: ſo that this library now contains eight hundred forty-four volumes, intire and defective; as may be gather'd from Mr. Whiſton's Narrative of the ſaid Fire; printed in A Report from the Committee appointed to view the Cottonian Library, and the other publick Records of this Kingdom. Publiſhed by Order of the Houſe of Commons, Fol. 1732. Now among thoſe damaged volumes, were the two above mention'd, which contain this Diſcourſe of Sir Walter Ralegh's, and which I have obſerved to be ſo burnt all about the margins, even into the writing, that I queſtion if the ſenſe, eſpecially at the top of the leaves, can from thence be, every where, perfectly recover'd. The beſt is, that we may hope in the truth of an information I have received from a gentleman who has great intelligence, as well as great collections of ſuch like curioſities, that Sir Walter Ralegh's original MS. of one, or both theſe Diſcourſes, is preſerved in the noble family of the Paulets; tho' I have not yet had opportunity of requeſting a ſight, whereby to ſatisfy myſelf and others in the certainty thereof.

[d] This Dialogue (as has been before ſaid) was firſt publiſh'd by Philip Ralegh, Eſq; among the Genuine Remains, at the end of an Abridgment of his grand-father's Hiſtory of the World, 8*vo.* 1700, &c. where it makes 43 pages, and begins thus: My moſt reverend father, you are well returned into England, &c. The conference herein is held, plainly, by two real perſons, as may be gather'd from the hiſtorical particulars our author makes them deliver in ſome places of themſelves; and in many places there are obſervations, almoſt verbatim, the ſame with ſeveral in others of Ralegh's writings. As the defeat of the Hugonots at the battle of Moncounter: The deſtruction of ſeveral millions of people in Hiſpaniola: The Spaniards never performing any enterprize againſt our nation by ſea or land. Our driving away the invincible armada with ſquibs; arming all nations of Europe againſt ourſelves, by the tranſportation of our iron ordnance; and, not to inſtance any further, his argument proving that, he who commands the ſea may command the world, in the 60th page of theſe Genuine Remains, compared only with the 9th page of his Diſcourſe of Shipping in the ſame collection, may prove ſufficiently they were both written by one hand. The time when this Dialogue was written, might alſo be found in it; for it was, both after Sir George Somers's death, and the publication of Anticoton, a treatiſe againſt the Declaratory Letter, written to the queen regent of France, by Peter Coton, confeſſor to king Henry IV; in which letter he having apologiz'd for, or too gently and tardily reprov'd the king-killing doctrine of Mariana and other Jeſuites, the ſaid Anticoton was publiſh'd in French, and tranſlated into Engliſh 4*to.* 1611, to prove them the authors of that execrable parricide the foregoing year on the ſaid French king, by the bloody hand of Ravillac. Among the holy champions mention'd in this pamphlet, for the ſaid doctrine of regicide, I find Andreas Eudæmon Johannes Cydonius, as he wrote himſelf in his books: but he was a French Jeſuite, and his true name Jean l'Heureux. This father John publiſh'd in Latin, that ſame year the ſaid king of France was ſtab'd to death in his coach, an Apology for father Garnet, and the powder-plotters, 8*vo. Col. Agrip.* 1610. And this was anſwered by the learned Dr. Robert Abbot, three years after in his Antilogia. But as there is a part in the ſaid Apology, which touches upon Sir Walter Ralegh, he has taken care to anſwer that himſelf: for that Jeſuite writing himſelf of Cydon, a town in Crete, Ralegh takes occaſion, where he is giving the known character of the Cretans, not to except this Eudæmon Jack Andrew, as one of them, "Who, (continues our author) "in one of his late ſhameleſs libels, wherein he traduces "our king, religion, and country, with all the good "and worthy men of whom he could learn the names, "has, by inſerting my name, twice belied me, in calling "me a puritan, and one that has been dangerous to my "ſoveraign. It is an honour to be ill ſpoken of by ſo "diligent a ſupporter of treaſon, and architect of lies; "in regard whereof I may not deny him the commen-"dation of Creticiſm, no leſs voluminous, than he in "multiplicity of names, is beyond any Cretans, in elder "times; who were always liars, evil beaſts, and ſlow "bellies." Hiſtory of the World, lib. 5. cap. 5. ſect. 2.

State,

State, and a Juſtice of Peace, better known in the printed copies, by the title of his Prerogative of Parliaments; dedicated with a true and generous ſpirit of wiſdom and loyalty to king James.[a] Theſe two dialogues will give a perfect taſte of our author's manner in theſe his leſſer compoſitions, and are anſwerable to the character before deliver'd of his Conſultation about the Peace, abovemention'd. The laſt tract we have to ſpeak of under this partition, except perhaps a ſhort unprinted Diſcourſe of the Words Law and Right alſo aſcribed to him, and to be found in the Aſhmolean library, is entitled, Obſervations touching Trade and Commerce with the Hollander, and other Nations, as it was preſented to King James; wherein is prov'd, that our Sea and Land Commodities ſerve to enrich and ſtrengthen other Countries againſt our own. But as there are ſome reaſons to doubt whether Sir Walter Ralegh was the author of this treatiſe, I need ſay no more of it in this place; yet ſhall throw them into a corner of the page,[b] where they may leaſt interrupt the progreſſive view of his remaining writings.

Theſe

[a] This excellent Dialogue is, by ſome deſcribers of its title, from certain manuſcript copies that were in the libraries of Sir William Glynne, Bart. and the late biſhop More, ſaid to have been written by our author in 1610. But this I take to be an error that may be rectified by the very firſt ſpeech in the ſaid Dialogue, which is as follows. "Now Sir, what think you of Mr. St. John's "trial in the ſtar-chamber? I know that the bruit ran, "that he was hardly dealt withal, becauſe he was im-"priſon'd in the Tower; ſeeing his diſſuaſion from grant-"ing ā benevolence to the king was warranted by law." Whoever knows any thing of the parliamentary proceedings of theſe times can tell, that this Mr. Oliver St. John (afterwards lord Grandiſon, and lieutenant of Ireland) was fin'd in the ſtar-chamber 5000 l. in April, and made his ſubmiſſion in May 1615 for oppoſing that benevolence, moved in the foregoing ſeſſion of parliament, which was ſo abruptly diſſolv'd. This is enough to prove the ſaid Dialogue was not written before that year; and, as our author, in his dedication to the king, mentions himſelf to be ſtill under reſtraint, this will prove it was written in that year. The beginning of his addreſs to the ſaid king is as follows, according to the moſt correct copies I have ſeen of it. "Moſt gracious Soveraign, Thoſe who are "ſuppreſs'd and helpleſs, are commonly ſilent; wiſhing "that the common ill might, in all things, ſort with their "particular misfortunes: which diſpoſition, as it is un-"charitable in all men, ſo it would, in me, be more "dog-like, than man-like, to bite the ſtone that ſtruck "me, to wit, the borrow'd authority of my ſoveraign, "miſinform'd, ſeeing their arms and hands that flung it, "are, moſt of them, already rotten. For I muſt confeſs "it ever, that they are debts and not diſcontentments, "that your majeſty hath laid upon me; the debts and "obligations of a friendleſs adverſity far more payable in "all kinds than thoſe of the proſperous. All which, "nor the leaſt of them, tho' I cannot diſcharge, I may "yet endeavour it. And notwithſtanding my reſtraint "has retrenched all ways, as well the ways of labour "and peril, as of all other employments, yet has it left "with me my cogitations; than which I have nothing "elſe to offer on the altar of my love. Of thoſe, moſt "gracious ſoveraign, I have uſed ſome part in the fol-"lowing diſpute between a counſellor of ſtate and juſtice "of peace; the one diſſuading, the other perſuading the "calling of a parliament. In all which, ſince the Nor-"man conqueſt, at leaſt ſo many as hiſtories have "gathered, I have in ſome things, in the following "dialogue, preſented your majeſty with the contents and "ſucceſſes." Upon collating an old manuſcript of this Dialogue in the Harleyan library, with the common printed copies, the moſt material difference I obſerved was, that theſe in print ſometimes confound the arguments of the two ſpeakers together, or blend one with the other, by not regarding the proper diviſions of the colloquy. Whether the fault of an ignorant tranſcriber, or of a careleſs compoſitor at the preſs of the firſt edition, I cannot ſay, but we are pretty ſure it was not printed before the author's death. The earlieſt edition I have ſeen, ſeems to be the firſt (however Anthony Wood mentions one to have been printed ſeven years before it) for it runs thus: The Prerogative of Parliaments in England, proved in a Dialogue pro et contra between a Counſellor of State and a Juſtice of Peace. Written by the worthy, much lacked and lamented Sir Walter Ralegh, Knt. deceas'd: Dedicated to the King's Majeſty and to the Houſe of Parliament now aſſembled; preſerved, to be now happily, in theſe diſtracted Times, publiſhed: printed at Middelburge, 4to. 1628. I think it was alſo reprinted in the ſame ſize in 1642. In 1651 it was printed in 12*mo.* and remitted into the collection call'd his Remains; ſo has deſcended in the ſeveral editions thereof, and in the laſt makes about 4 ſheets and a quarter. If this piece, or any other of Sir Walter Ralegh's writing, were to need a character, we might refer to that ſhort, but ſhining one, which may ſerve for one and all, in biſhop Nicholſon's Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, where he ſays, "Sir Walter Ralegh has written, "as he uſed to do upon all other ſubjects, moſt *judicious*ly "and accutely upon the prerogatives of our parliaments;" ſo refers to Sir Henry Spelman's Gloſſary, p. 451. From the noble endeavours to reſtrain all violent courſes of adminiſtration, to heal the wounds of government, to cultivate a mutual harmony between prince and people, and detect the miſapplications of his revenue by a few greedy and deceitful courtiers, wherewith this and other like writings of our author abound; we may account for the readineſs which has been ſhewn ſo univerſally, even down to our times, of aſſuming the name of Sir Walter Ralegh when any character of a patriot, or perſon of a publick ſpirit was to be reviv'd or perſonated by our political writers for reforming erroneous meaſures in the ſtate, or recommending advantageous ones to it. To this purpoſe we meet with him, in Andrew Marvell's poems, in Tom Brown's Belgic Hero; and his name ſubſcrib'd to ſeveral Epiſtolary Eſſays in pamphlets, news-papers, and other like occaſional writings, that animadvert upon the occurrences of the times. Not that his real character is perhaps always juſtly maintain'd, or he made to eſpouſe the party he would really have ſided with; for his name has been uſed to patroniſe the principles of oppoſite parties, and we ſometimes meet with one rebuking the other, for making ſo free with ſuch an honourable ſhelter. Thus among ſome Poems on Affairs of State, collected from the daily, evening and weekly papers, &c. 8vo. 1733, there is one, page 9, To a Perſon who ſubſcribes his Writings with the Name of RALEGH. Wherein that part which concerns our ſubject is as follows.

Hear you, who, fearleſs of the brand of ſhame,
Subſcribe your treaſons with a Ralegh's name:
He roſe a bleſſing to Eliza's reign,
And ſpread her glory o'er the land and main;
O'er diſtant ſeas aſſerted England's ſway,
And ſought New Worlds beneath the burning day:
He toil'd unwearied for his Country's peace,
To make her honour and her wealth encreaſe;
All mercenary views his ſoul deſpis'd,
He bravely practis'd what he firſt adviſ'd.
When his great Miſtreſs from her throne retir'd,
With the ſame ardor which his youth inſpir'd,
His part he acted on the world's great ſtage,
Nor droop'd beneath the weight of cares or age;
To the laſt hour was his allegiance try'd:
Loyal he prov'd to him by whoſe commands he dy'd.
Such Ralegh was—— whoſe fame compar'd with thine,
Is ſuch as Milton's when compar'd with mine.

[b] Roger Coke, Eſq; in his Detection of the Court and State of England during the four laſt Reigns, printed 8vo. the third edition, 1697, ſpeaking of Ralegh page 83, fixes theſe Obſervations on Trade and Commerce upon him in theſe words: "While he was thus confined, he was "the firſt who made publick the growth by ſea of the "Dutch, and the riches they deriv'd from their fiſhing "upon the coaſts of England and Scotland, and the con-"ſequence which would neceſſarily follow, not only "to the loſs of the king's ſoveraignty of the Britiſh ſeas, "but to the trade and navigation of England otherwiſe.

"After

These we shall divide but into two parts, and then perhaps one of them may be best comprehended under the topic of Philosophy. This way seems to look, by its subject, that short Treatise of the Soul ascrib'd to Sir Walter Ralegh, whereof there is a copy preserved among the Ashmolean manuscripts. It was never publish'd, I think, and I have not yet seen it; therefore can say no more, at present, of it. But we have in print, another treatise which may be admitted under this head, being built on the doctrine of Pyrrho the Greek philosopher, entitled, Sir Walter Ralegh's Sceptick or Speculations. This doctrine, shewing how much may be said for and against the same things; such an ingenious exemplification of it as this little tract contains, may, if discreetly used, prevent many rash, dogmatical determinations, and inure us to a wary or prudent suspence of judgment: for the sceptick, as our author describes him, does neither affirm nor deny any position, but doubts of it, and opposes reasons against that which is affirm'd or deny'd, to justify his not consenting; because he may report how things appear, but whether they are so he knows not. This little tract, as it is here handled, relates chiefly to our senses;[a] but another we have, upon a more dignified topic, as concerning our manners, or virtues and vices; therefore what might be more particularly subdivided under the distinction of moral philosophy; and it is call'd, Instructions to his Son, and Posterity. A treatise well becoming an author, who had seen the world in so many climates, and life in so many changes. It is written in a perspicuous style, with forcible arguments, and on the most practical subjects. These are interspersed with several memorable admonitions, the fruits of his particular experience therefore may claim a part in his personal history; and being apt to rivet in the mind, may prove of constant use and service; as touching upon the most incidental engagements in life. Thus, in his first chapter upon the choice of friends, he says: "Tho' I persuade thee to associate "with thy betters, or at least with thy peers; yet remember always, that thou venture not "thy estate with any of those great ones who shall attempt unlawful things; for such men "labour for themselves, and not for thee; thou shall be sure to impart with them in the "danger, but not in the honour; and to venture a sure estate at present, in hopes of a better "in future, is mere madness: besides, great men forget such as have done them service when "they have obtained what they would, and will rather hate thee for saying, thou hast been a Philosophical.

"After that, one Tobias Gentleman set forth another "treatise of this nature, and how this fishery might be "carried on from the ports of England; and dedicated "it to the king. But the king, wholly giving himself "up to pleasure, neither minded one, nor regarded the "other." That Gentleman was a fisherman, or other like sea-faring man, and I have seen his treatise; but published long before this, I think; was, which that historian ascribes thus to Sir Walter Ralegh. The first edition of these Observations I could ever meet with in print, is in 12*mo*. 1653, and it was bound up with the second edition of Ralegh's Remains, 1656. Its anonymous publisher appears to be the bookseller; who had no other authority for appropriating it to Sir Walter Ralegh, but the opinion of a person who recommended it to him as a genuine piece of his writing. 'Tis true, our author has touch'd, after a different manner, upon the topick, in some of his tracts, and particularly at the end of his Discourse of Shipping; where he laments "That strangers "should be permitted to eat us out, by exporting and "importing both our own commodities, and those of fo-"reign nations." But I think no treatise of his will be found that descends so much into minute examples, calculations, &c. However, not to except at this, because a treatise upon trade may require observations suitable to the subject, it does not appear probable that the author of these Observations, whose project was, as he tells us, "To erect twenty busses in some sea-port town, so by "degrees to extend a thousand or two over the nation; "who was one that had traced this business, made his "endeavours known not only to the king, but his no-"blemen, merchants and others, who had made him "subscriptions to disburse large sums of mony for building "up this great and rich sea-city;" should be a prisoner all this while in the Tower of London. No, this projector, further proposing to constitute a state-merchant, for these purposes; and praying, in the conclusion, that the king would give him leave to nominate the commissioners for conferring upon, and making report thereof to his majesty, seems to have been some manufacturing or mercantile man, one ambitious of that office himself, and consequently none of Sir Walter Ralegh. But if from the subject whereon, we bend our consideration to the time when this tract was written, we shall find further objection against entitling our author to it. For the very first words of the dedication are, "According to my duty, I am "emboldened to put your majesty in mind, that, about "fourteen or fifteen years past, I presented you a book "of such extraordinary importance for honour and pro-"fit of your majesty and posterity, and doubting it has "been laid aside, &c. I am encouraged to present you "with one more, &c." Now if we allow the first book to have been presented in the very first year of the king's being in England, then this second must have been presented in 1617 or 1618, when Sir Walter Ralegh was out of England, or his thoughts far differently engag'd. But the greatest objection of all is, that there are several manuscripts of this treatise in the libraries of our nobility and gentry (more ancient than the earliest edition in print) which, as I have observ'd, do all entitle it to one John Keymer, possibly the merchant or vintner of that name, whom Ralegh many years before had licensed to retail wine in Cambridge, as is related in the foregoing part of this life. With one of these manuscripts (the most ancient I have seen) among the collections of the late Mr. Granger, there was another, written also in the same little neat old hand, ascribed to the same Keymer, and which I take to be that first mention'd in his dedication last quoted; and also to agree in its contents with John Keymer's Observations made upon the Dutch Fishery, about the year 1601. Demonstrating there is more wealth raised out of herrings and other fish in his majesty's seas and the neighbouring nations in one year, than the king of Spain hath from the Indies in four: And that there were twenty thousand ships and other vessels, and about four hundred thousand people then set on work by sea and land, and maintained only by fishing upon the coasts of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Printed 8*vo*. Lond. (from the orginal manuscript) for Sir Edward Ford, in the year 1664. Whoever has read these two pieces, will allow that one hand writ them.

[a] Of this Sceptick I remember not to have met with any copy in manuscript, nor any edition more ancient than that in the first collection of our author's Remains, 12*mo*. 1651: so has been reprinted in all the succeeding editions thereof. 'Tis about 12 pages in the last and largest edition.

" means of their advancement, than acknowledge it. I could give thee a thouſand examples; " I myſelf know it, and have taſted it in all the courſe of my life." From his next chapter, on the choice of a wife, we have before given extracts in this work. His third, againſt flatterers, ends with this reflection: " Thou may'ſt be ſure, that he, who in private will tell thee of " thy faults, is thy friend; for he adventures thy miſlike, and hazards thy hatred: few can " endure it, every man for the moſt part delighting in ſelf-praiſe; one of the moſt univerſal " follies which bewitches mankind." From the fourth chapter on private quarrels we have already given a taſte; and here, the chief caution he further urges to prevent the inconveniencies thereof, is ever to beware of unadviſed ſpeech. " He that cannot refrain from much ſpeaking, " ſays he, is like a city without walls." And a little further, " In all that ever I obſerved " in the courſe of worldly things, I ever found, that mens fortunes are oftner made by their " tongues than by their virtues, and more mens fortunes overthrown thereby alſo, than by their " vices." In the fifth chapter, among the rules recommended to preſerve an eſtate, the moſt preſſing is againſt ſuretiſhip; adviſing rather to give a part of what a man has, than live in continual apprehenſion of loſing both it and his friend. " If thou art bound, ſays he, for a ſtranger, thou art a " fool; if for a merchant, thou putteſt thy eſtate to learn to ſwim; if for a churchman, he has no " inheritance; if for a lawyer, he will find an evaſion by a ſyllable or a word to abuſe thee; if " for a poor man, thou muſt pay it thyſelf; if for a rich one, he needs it not: therefore from " ſuretiſhip as from a man-ſlayer or enchanter, bleſs thyſelf; for the beſt profit and return will " be this, that if thou force him for whom thou art bound, to pay it himſelf, he will become " thy enemy; if thou ſhalt uſe to pay it thyſelf, thou wilt be a beggar: and believe thy father " in this, and print it in thy thoughts; that whatever virtue thou haſt, be it never ſo manifold, " if thou be poor withal, thou and thy qualities ſhall be deſpiſed." In the ſixth chapter, upon ſervants, he has this advice: " If thou truſt any ſervant with thy purſe, be ſure thou take his " accompt e'er thou ſleep; for if thou put it off, thou wilt then, afterwards, for tedioufneſs " neglect it; I myſelf have thereby loſt more than I am worth. Whatever thy ſervant gains " thereby, he will never thank thee, but laugh thy ſimplicity to ſcorn; beſides, 'tis the way " to make thy ſervants thieves, who elſe would be honeſt." The ſeventh chapter is only a word or two againſt exceeding in the bravery of gay garments, " as what will ſoon wear out " of faſhion, when money in the purſe will always be in faſhion." The eighth is upon riches (and as it ſeems by the beginning, ſhould follow the fifth) Herein exhorting againſt the attainment of them by baſe or evil means, he charges his ſon, as, never to deſtroy any man for his wealth, ſo, by no means further to impoveriſh the poor; but above all things, to exerciſe compaſſion towards them, as the beſt way to proſperity and peace of mind. " Uſe, ſays he, " thy poor neighbours and tenants well; pine not them and their children, to add ſuperfluity " and needleſs expences to thyſelf. He that has pity on another man's ſorrow, ſhall be free " from it himſelf; he that delights in, and ſcorns the miſery of another, ſhall, one time or " other, fall into it himſelf." The ninth is againſt the inconveniencies of delighting in wine, as being the greateſt enemy to health, truſt, honour and preferment; and the laſt chapter begins thus: " Now for the world, I know it too well, to perſuade thee to dive into the practices " thereof; rather ſtand upon thy own guard againſt all that tempt thee thereunto, or may " practiſe upon thee in thy conſcience, thy reputation, or thy purſe; reſolve that no man is wiſe " or ſafe, but he that is honeſt." So concludes with adviſing him to make God his director in all his actions.

With theſe Inſtructions to his Son, which have, I think, been oftner printed [a] than moſt other of our author's leſſer pieces; there is uſually join'd, in all the editions I have ſeen, The dutiful Advice of a loving Son to his aged Father. 'Tis a religious and rhetorical exhortation to prepare for his latter end; written in a general manner, but how probably by our author, or by either of his ſons, it is left to the critical and diſcerning reader. [b] All the works I have met with [a] Four editions of this tract, call'd, Inſtructions to his Son, were publiſh'd before the firſt collection was made of Ralegh's Remains. The earlieſt edition of it I have met with, was printed 12*mo*. 1632, in a larger character than we have it in the modern editions. The fifth edition (ſaid in the title to be) corrected and enlarged according to the author's own copy, is printed in the ſaid collection of his Remains, 12*mo*. 1651, and has been reprinted five or ſix times at leaſt ſince with thoſe Remains, that is, in 1656, 1660, 1664, 1675, 1679, &c. and 1726. It fills, in this laſt edition (which has a letter or two of our author's more than the others) about 20 pages. And begins thus: There is nothing more becoming any wiſe man than to make choice of friends, for by them thou ſhalt be judged what thou art. We are informed there is a MS. of Sir Walter Ralegh to his ſon, which I take to be theſe Inſtructions, in the library at Grays-Inn. Vid. Catalogi librorum manuſcriptorum Angliæ et Hiberniæ. Fol. Oxon. 1697. tom. 2. part 1. page 255.

[b] This Dutiful Advice of a loving Son to his aged Father was printed alſo in 1632, with thoſe Inſtructions, and with them admitted into Ralegh's Remains, 12*mo*. 1651. From which time it has been reprinted in the ſucceeding editions thereof, and makes about a dozen pages. Beginning thus: Sir, I humbly beſeech you, both in reſpect to the honour of God, &c.

further aſcribed to Sir Walter Ralegh, bearing any affinity with this claſs, are two manuſcripts, which might be diſtinguiſhed under the branch of Natural Philoſophy. The firſt is his treatiſe Of Mines, and the Trial of Minerals; a ſubject on which he very probably might write, both from his own obſervations in the Weſt Indies, and thoſe engagements he might alſo have in his native county of Devon, with his brother Sir Adrian Gilbert, who firſt, in queen Elizabeth's reign, begun to work the long-neglected mines in Comb-Martin (whence king Edward III. had ſupply'd his wars againſt France) and was followed by Sir Beavis Bulmer, who from thoſe mines recover'd a great quantity of ſilver, out of which, he cauſed two maſſy goblets to be made; one whereof was preſented to the earl of Bath; and the other, weighing one hundred thirty-ſeven ounces, to the lord mayor of London in the 35th of the queen's reign. [a] So that what Cicero ſays to his friend of this iſland, that it yielded not a drachm of that metal, was falſe in Ralegh's time, and what he could not be ſure was true in his own. [b] But whether the ſaid treatiſe is ſo particular as to mention any thing of this I know not, having never ſeen it. [c] The ſecond manuſcript is Sir Walter Ralegh's Collection of Chymical and Medicinal Receipts for fixing Mercury, preparing Antimony, and for the Cure of ſeveral diſeaſes. [d] His application to ſtudies of this kind, may perhaps be ſomewhat accountable from the patronage, which, as in a note before cited, it appears he had ſhewn to John Heſter, the famous chymiſt, with the converſation there might probably paſs between them, and the knowledge he had learn'd from the Guianians of curing all manner of poiſons, &c. 'Tis apparent, that he beſtow'd ſome portion of his time upon the uſe of lembicks and crucibles while he was in the Tower, and ſeems to have had a kind of laboratory there for his ſaid operations. A view of him in this light will explain the expreſſion in a character of him given by Dr. Joſeph Hall, the venerable biſhop of Norwich (whom Sir H. Wotton calls the Engliſh Seneca) where he ſpeaks (among other things, which will be hereafter obſerv'd) of Sir Walter Ralegh's philoſophical experiments in the Tower. And other authors might be produced, who, in their character of him, alſo refer to his profound knowledge in the myſteries of nature, or his inveſtigations thereof, through the animal, vegetable, and mineral world, for the benefit of his countrymen, notwithſtanding ſome memorable attempts to advance their proſperity in the political world, had met with much diſcouragement: as if, tho' he could not abſolutely recover them from ſome indiſpoſitions or corruptions of the mind, he was hereby reſolv'd to try how ſerviceable and ſucceſsful he could be againſt the maladies of their body.

How elaborately ſoever many of theſe pieces are allowed by others to have been written, our author look'd upon them but as little excurſions, or ſallies, as he calls them, from his grand labour, I mean that Ocean of Hiſtory, wherein he has out-done all that went before him, and given ſuch lights to futurity as muſt ever be grateful. A voyage, which, " If begun even in " the dawn of his day, when the light of knowledge firſt broke out upon his younger years, " and before any wound received, either from fortune or time, he might yet well have doubted " (as he obſerves himſelf) that the darkneſs of age and death would have overtaken him long " before the performance." [e] But being undertaken, as it was, in the evening of a tempeſtuous life, a life ſo far run out in travels and conſiderations of ſuch oppoſite nature; for one under the ſoul-piercing privations of honour, fortune, freedom! One buried alive! to attempt ſuch a univerſal revival of the dead! And, while his body, under all thoſe preſſures, was ſo long incarcerated, for his brain to be deliver'd of that Minerva, as one calls it, [f] his HISTORY OF THE WORLD! is an example, that might puzzle ſuch an Hiſtorian even as Ralegh himſelf to parallel. For, beginning at the creation, he has given us the flower of recorded ſtory down to the end of the ſecond Macedonian war. Thus having reviewed the three firſt monarchies of the world, he leaves Rome in the fourth, triumphant, about a century and a half before the birth of Chriſt, comprehending a period of near four thouſand years. This work was divided by our author into five books, who annexed to it a very copious and uſeful chronological table; and it was, Hiſtorical.

[c] Anthony Wood aſcribes it to our author: but he ſeems alſo not to have ſeen it.

[d] This Collection of Chymical and Medicinal Receipts— as was before noted, is an original, in the library of Sir Hans Sloane. It contains about 70 leaves in 4to. and in the 63d leaf, as was alſo obſerv'd, Sir Walter Ralegh has written Our Great Cordial, with a line under it, which he uſually drew under his own name. The liſt of ingredients which follows, may, I think, be diſcerned through the ſcratches made by ſome hand or other to obliterate it: and may, perhaps, be the moſt genuine Recipe of that Great Cordial, extant in the world, notwithſtanding it is ſuppoſed our author had written it more completely in the enſuing leaf which is torn out. For as to the Recipe in le Febvre's Diſcourſe upon this Cordial, I have, upon a more diligent examination of that diſcourſe, found, that he acknowledges at leaſt a dozen more additions to Sir Walter's Recipe than is before taken notice of.

with the further decorations of maps, tables of geneaology, &c. publiſh'd in the month of April, juſt before the meeting of the parliament, [a] in a large volume folio, 1614. The approbation it has met with ſince the author's death has been ſo univerſal, that if they are different editions of the book to which we may ſee different dates printed, we may venture to ſay, no work, of any author in England, has been ſo often reprinted that is of equal ſize and antiquity. [b] The ſeveral characters and commendations which have been beſtow'd on this hiſtory as well by miſcellaneous writers, who have frequently quoted it with great deference and reſpect, as by hiſtorians and criticks who have cloſely traced and throughly examin'd it; and as well in verſe, as proſe; would be too numerous to be here inſerted, could they be recover'd. To provide therefore as well againſt the ignorance as the ſatiety of thoſe readers who have not met with them, a few are preſented in the annotation here directed to. [c] He took no ordinary care to deſerve

[b] Beſides this firſt edition in 1614, printed by W. Stansby for W. Burre, I have ſeen copies by the ſame printer bearing date 1617. This edition, I think, has the picture of our author, grav'd by S. Paſs, and the frontiſpiece by Ren. Elſtrack. Another is dated 1628; and perhaps there is one between thoſe. Another in 1634; another 1652; another in 1656, printed by Robert White, &c. another in 1661, printed for Robert White, &c. Anthony Wood mentions one in 1666, in which edition, or perhaps in one or two before it, it was firſt printed in double columns. Another (now before me) printed for George Dawes 1671; another in 1678; and another in 1687. After which, there was none, I think, till this laſt 1735.

[c] This may not perhaps be better introduced than in the reflection of biſhop Hall, lately abovemention'd, who, in his ingenious book of Conſolations, has theſe words, "A wiſe man, as Laurentius the preſbyter obſerved well, "does much in ſolitude. So may'ſt thou employ the "hours of thy cloſe retiredneſs, and bleſs God for ſo "happy an opportunity. How memorable an inſtance "has our age afforded us of an eminent perſon to whoſe "impriſonment we are all obliged, beſides many philoſo-"phical experiments, for that noble HISTORY of the "WORLD now in our hands? The Court had his "youthful and freer years, and the Tower his latter age; "the Tower reformed the Courtier in him, and produced "thoſe worthy monuments of art and induſtry, which we "ſhould have in vain expected from his freedom and "jollity. It is obſerved, that ſhining wood, when it is "kept within doors, loſes its light: it is otherwiſe with "this, and many other active wits, which had never "ſhin'd ſo much, if not for cloſeneſs." Thus in a treatiſe call'd, Balm of Gilead; or, Comforts for the Diſtreſs'd, both moral and divine, by Dr. Joſeph Hall, biſhop of Norwich, 12*mo.* 1652; afterwards reprinted under the title of The Art of Patience, &c. 8*vo.* 1684, and by a baſe plagiariſm, aſcribed to the author of The whole Duty of Man, who wanted not the reputation of this book; tho' he, from whom it is ſtol'n, had enough to ſpare. In the Familiar Letters of James Howel, Eſq; ſpeaking of this rare and renowned knight, he ſays, "His fame "ſhall contend in longævity with this iſland itſelf, yea "with that great World which he Hiſtoriſes ſo gallantly." In another well-known book of his, call'd Dodona's Grove; or, The Vocal Foreſt, diſcourſing of Ralegh, and deſcribing him to have been, "A cavalier of a ſpacious "underſtanding and of no vulgar reach in policy; ſcienti-"fical, and full of abſtruſe notions;" he adds, "That "tho' his body was under reſtraint, and coffin'd up ſo "many years, yet he never travers'd more countries than "then; for his brain ran over all the World, as appears "by that famous Monument he tranſmitted to poſterity and "hung up in the Temple of Fame, while he was as it "were buried alive." But in the Life of the lord Staffford, written by Anthony Stafford, Eſq; 4*to.* 1640, this author goes ſo far as to ſay, That if Sir Walter Ralegh's Hiſtory of the World had been written in the Indian tongue, we ſhould not have ſcrupled or avoided the pains of learning that language, only to read it. If we conſult what character the hiſtorians give it, we may find many of them who never name it without ſome epithet or ſentence in its praiſe. Thus Dr. Heylin in one place calls it an excellent hiſtory; in another, the firſt or chief of hiſtories. And thus in the preface of Dr. William Howel's Univerſal Hiſtory, who muſt have had continual occaſions of inſpecting our author's, 'tis ſaid, That Sir Walter Ralegh is never to be mention'd without honour. Shirley, in his Life of our author, gives it as his judgment of his Hiſtory, "That for the exactneſs of its chronology, "curiouſneſs of its contexture, and learning of all ſorts, "it ſeems to be the work of an age." And a little further, "That a man, who had been the greateſt part "of his life taken up in action, ſhould write ſo judiciouſly, "ſo critically, of times and actions, is as great a wonder "as the book itſelf; and it ſtill remains in doubt, whether the age he liv'd in was more oblig'd to his pen or "his ſword, the one being buſy in conquering the new, "the other in ſo bravely deſcribing the old world." And Mr. Echard, in the preface of his Roman Hiſtory, admires that part of Ralegh's Hiſtory which treats of the Roman ſtory, "Eſpecially the laſt hundred years, which, ſays "he, are written with very much ſpirit and judgment, "and all of it with as much ſkill and clearneſs: yet that "all before the firſt Punick war is not proportionably "copious to the reſt." But how duely it was conſider'd by this particular hiſtorian, whether that was not a judicious diſproportion in our general hiſtorian, may be left to the examination of others. If we ſearch what the criticks have ſaid of this Hiſtory, we ſhall find their commendations exceed the reſt. Among theſe we may mention Degory Whear, the firſt Camden-Profeſſor of Hiſtory at Oxford, who, ſpeaking of ſuch univerſal hiſtorians as are moſt worthy and before all others to be read; and having only named Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, he goes on thus: Hos autem ſequi poſſunt nonnulli ex recentioribus: quos inter, principem locum obtinere meretur Gualterus Raulæus noſtras, eques auratus, vir clari nominis, et ob ſingularem fortitudinem ac prudentiam, meliori fato dignus. Is univerſalem hiſtoriam ab initio mundi uſque ad Macedonici imperii, ſive tertiæ monarchiæ occaſum, ex probatiſſimis auctoribus coagmentavit; noſtræ quidem genti idiomate vernaculo, ſed accurato admodùm judicio, methodo perſpicuâ, ſtylo elegante ac virili. Methodus legendi hiſtorias, 8*vo. Cantab.* 1684. p. 28. To this we may join the character of Dr. Henry Felton in his Diſſertation upon the Claſſics, where he ſays, "Sir "Walter Ralegh's Hiſtory of the World is a work of ſo "vaſt a compaſs, ſuch endleſs variety, that no genius "but one adventurous as his own, durſt have undertaken "that great deſign. I do not apprehend any great diffi-"culty in collecting and common-placing an univerſal "hiſtory from the whole body of hiſtorians; that is nothing "but mechanick labour. But to digeſt the ſeveral au-"thors in his mind; to take in all their majeſty, ſtrength "and beauty; to raiſe the ſpirit of meaner hiſtorians, "and to equal all the excellencies of the beſt; this is "Sir Walter's peculiar praiſe. His ſtyle is the moſt per-"fect, the happieſt, the moſt beautiful of the age he "wrote in; majeſtick, clear and manly; and he appears "every-where ſo ſuperior rather than unequal to his ſub-"ject, that the ſpirit of Rome and Athens ſeems to be "breathed into his work."

Or if what the Poets have ſaid upon this performance, may be more entertaining to the reader, ſome pains have been taken to do our author honour alſo by them. As to thoſe copies of verſes which were written upon this hiſtory in a fair MS. epitomy of it in 4*to.* which was among the collections of that remarkable virtuoſo Thomas Britton, late of Clerkenwell, as we find in the printed catalogue of that part of his library which was ſold towards the latter part of the late king William's reign; I never ſaw, nor knew where to recommend any one to the ſight of them. But have, before me, a MS. collection of Orations and Poems, written moſtly by a ſtudent of New-College in Oxford, about the middle of the laſt century (who was afterwards a perſon eminent in his profeſſion) Among theſe, there is an elegy on his dear friend Mr. George Franklin; wherein, having deſerve theſe encomiums; for beſides his own learning, knowledge and judgment, which many would have thought ſufficient for any undertaking, he with that caution, wherewith we have beheld ſo many others of his great enterprizes temper'd, would ſuffer no part of this hiſtory to paſs his own hand, before ſome of the moſt able ſcholars, whom he aſſembled, it ſeems, for this purpoſe, had debated the parts he was moſt doubtful of, and they moſt converſant in, before him. Thus in the Moſaic and Oriental antiquities, or fainter and more remote footſteps of time, he would ſometimes conſult the learned Dr. Robert Burhill. [a] In all parts of chronology, geography, and other branches of mathematical ſcience, he wanted not the opinions of the learned Hariot, and the earl of Northumberland's three Magi, [b] long his neighbours in the Tower; and wherever he ſcrupled any thing in the phraſe or diction, he would hear the acute and ingenious Sir John Hoſkyns, ſometime alſo reſident in theſe confines; who viewed and reviewed the ſaid hiſtory, as we are told, before it went to the preſs, and whom Ben Johnſon, proud of calling others his ſons, could gratify that humour in calling father. [c] Thus having ſpared for no labour, and neglected no means to bring this work to the perfection wherein we behold it, 'tis no wonder that ſome ſcribbler or other ſhould, upon finding it ſo univerſally read, endeavour to raiſe himſelf a little profit or credit from it, by pretending that the world needed an abridgment of its hiſtory, [d] as if that wherewith Sir Walter Ralegh has preſented us, either is, or was intended for any thing more. But this more ſpecious kind of detraction having elegantly deſcrib'd his great proficiency in other ſciences, the poet directs it as the higheſt compliment he could make to his perfection in this we are now ſpeaking of, that

In UNIVERSAL HISTORY, 'twas clear,
He had approv'd himſelf Great RALEGH's heir.

But among S. Sheppard's Epigrams, written about the ſame time, and publiſh'd 8*vo*. 1651, there is, in the third book, one, On that incomparable Hero Sir Walter Ralegh; which ſpeaks of him and his hiſtory in the following words.

Like the Athenians, when with furious ire,
Againſt learn'd Socrates they did conſpire;
After his death, themſelves were like to ſlay,
For ſorrow they had made him ſo away;
And, having carv'd his ſtatue out in braſs,
Erected it within their market-place;
And to him offer'd myrrh and ſpicery,
Adoring him as if ſome deity:
So we, while thou on earth with us did'ſt live,
Slighted thy worth; not having hearts to give Thee thanks and honour for that Gift of thine,
The lovely iſſue of thy brain divine;
But now thou art not with us, we look on Thy book, and wonder at Thee being gone.
Reſt, ſacred ſpirit, while thy work ſhall be Devoutly honour'd by poſterity.

There is alſo in b..ing, a picture of our author, drawn with a pen and ink, having an emblematical device with an epigram under it, which relate partly to his Hiſtory of the World. That device, in an oval frame of laurel or bays, preſents a globe ſupported by a ſword, and a pen; the ſword broken by a ſcepter in a hand on one ſide, and the Tower in proſpect on the other: and theſe are the lines, as they are printed in Phœnix Britannicus, one word only reſtor'd, according to the author's original, of which I have obtain'd a ſight.

O! had'ſt thou ſerv'd the Heroine all thy days;
Had heav'n from ſtorms of envy ſkreen'd thy bays;
Had'ſt thou ſtill flouriſh'd in a warlike reign;
Thy ſword had made a conqueſt like thy pen!
But nought to ſuch untimely fate could bring
The valiant ſubject, but a tim'rous king.

But that which of late years did much revive the publick regard to this hiſtory was, the ingenious Dr. George Sewell's Tragedy of Sir Walter Ralegh, publiſh'd 8*vo*. 1719, and the much-admired character he has therein given of it. Conſidering under what diſadvantages that dramatic performance appear'd, as written by a poet who had no practice or fame in this kind of writing; one inſufficiently read in the perſonal ſtory of his hero, to form that plot, and enliven it with thoſe characters and incidents whereof it was capable; beſides, acted at the New-Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, which then had leſs the favour of the town, eſpecially for tragedy; and when another new play was at the ſame time acting at the Old Houſe in Drury Lane. Conſidering all this, and, notwithſtanding, how many nights this tragedy ſucceſſively drew a noble and numerous audience, and how many editions of the copy ſoon paſſed the preſs; we may perceive, not only, what general and grateful reſpect ſtill ſurvives towards the particular memory of this famous man, but alſo how inclinable we are to clear ourſelves of the imputation many times thrown upon us of alienating our encomiums, and transferring the honours which are due to the worthies of our own iſland, upon examples out of heathen or foreign hiſtories, which becauſe leſs affecting to our paſſions, and leſs applicable to our inſtruction, are leſs meritorious of ſuch celebration. In the laſt act of this tragedy, where the poet brings in his hero deliberating or reflecting upon this capacious work, his Hiſtory of the World lying on a table before him; the ſentiments are ſo well aſſembled, ſo noble and natural, that it has been doubted, whether there was ſo much of fiction in the ſoliloquy, at leaſt the votive part of it, as truth: But it is as follows.

Now my long toil is done, my ſoul at eaſe
Views her paſt travels through the various heap
Of truth and fable. All that meaſur'd time
Records of nations, governments and laws,
Of heros, conquerors and purpled kings,
Lye here compris'd. O may the toiſome taſk Anſwer the labourer's care with due returns!
May men grow wiſer by their father's follies,
Or learn to emulate the virtuous dead!
And thou, my country, neareſt to my heart,
Dear land of liberty and heavenly truth,
As thou ſurvey'ſt the various models here
Of earthly power, their riſe and infant ſtate,
Their progreſs and their period; mark the flaws
Of every frame, and value much thy own:
Secure, while monarchy ſtill bears the ſway,
And joyful ſubjects pay a free obedience.

[d] The firſt attempt we have of this kind was by Alexander Roſs, a Scotch divine, and ſchoolmaſter at Southampton, in a book call'd, The Marrow of Hiſtory; being an Epitome of Sir Walter Ralegh's Hiſtory of the World, 12*mo*. 1652, &c. certainly a moſt unconnected, enervating, and injudicious performance. His fallacious argument for this unacceptable trouble "of a dwarf ſeeing further upon a "giant's ſhoulders than the giant himſelf" may be his caſe in the ſtature of his wit, but not the advantage of his proſpect. And there is as much reaſon for clipping of ſterling money as ſuch mens writings. 'Tis true, Sir Walter Ralegh has made ſome digreſſions in his hiſtory, but they are the digreſſions of Sir Walter Ralegh; by which the life, ſpirit, air and complexion of the author are known; and above all, the great deſign of this work, thoſe examples and thoſe documents wherewith he moſt ſtrenuouſly endeavour'd to ſeaſon that hopeful prince's mind for whom it was written. Therefore has made apology ſufficient for the ſame, where he ſays, "That "ſeeing we digreſs in the ways of our lives, and that "the life of man is nothing elſe but digreſſion, I may "the better be excus'd in writing their lives and actions." And indeed, men of ſuch eminency, erudition and experience, detraction meeting with no countenance, the author of it threw out another, of Animadverſions upon this hiſtory; but as inſignificant and no leſs diſregarded than the other, being agreeable to that unhappy ſpirit of contradiction which ever harraſs'd him to oppoſe the greateſt writers in his time.[a]

But that which is more conſiderable concerning this hiſtory is, whether our author ever continued it down to his own times; and whether, on ſome pretence that this firſt part did not meet with encouragement, he ever deſtroy'd the ſaid continuation himſelf, as we have it in the mouths of every-body when they ſpeak of him, but in the belief of no-body who knows any thing of his ſtory or his character. All that he ſays himſelf, in the leaſt glancing this way, is firſt in his preface, "That he propos'd to confine his diſcourſe with this our renowned iſle of Great- "Britain." And "That he forbears to promiſe a ſecond or third volume, which he intends
"if the firſt receives grace and good acceptance, for that which is already done may be "thought enough and too much." Laſtly, in the concluſion of the hiſtory he ſays, "Where"as this book by the title calls itſelf The firſt Part of the General Hiſtory of the World, imply-
"ing a ſecond and third volume, which I alſo intended and have hewn out; beſides many "diſcouragements perſuading my ſilence, it has pleaſed God to take that glorious prince out "of the world to whom they were directed; whoſe unſpeakable and never-enough lamented
"loſs has taught me to ſay with Job, Verſa eſt in luctum cithera mea, et organum meum in
"vocem flentium." From hence it ſeems plain enough, that our author had only ſome plan, or perhaps a few rough draughts of ſome ſucceeding parts of the hiſtory at this time drawn up, and that he was diſcouraged from making any further progreſs in them. Allowing his mind might change, and that there was time enough to finiſh the remaining volumes between this year, and that of his death, which is ſcarcely allowable; yet as we know how moſt of that time was employ'd by him, it will admit of no room for any ſuch performance. For in 1615, the year which followed that wherein he publiſh'd his hiſtory, two at leaſt of his moſt elaborate tracts beforemention'd were written. The ſame year he was alſo buſy, as we ſhall find, in writing letters and making other intereſt for his releaſement, which he obtain'd before it was quite expir'd. After this, it will no leſs appear, that he made himſelf too eminently the ſubject of rience, may well be truſted with ſuch liberties, and thanked for taking them. But tho' when ſuch prove wandering guides, it is more to our inſtruction than if they kept the ſtreight and beaten road; yet they may be no patterns, in this particular, for writers of a private and inferior character. Another Abridgment we have of this hiſtory, in 8*vo*. 1700, &c. the author of it unknown; but the preface is written by Mr. Echard, who ſays, "The great knowledge and learning, the accurate

"ſkill in penetration, the ſublime wiſdom and piety,
"together with the curious remarks and obſervations,
"which ſo ſignally appear in Sir Walter Ralegh's Hiſtory,
"have ſufficiently recommended it to the judicious part
"of the world: yet that his too frequent and long di-"greſſions and obſervations, tho' ſeveral of them very "fine and ingenious, are, too many, foreign to his ſub-
"ject: and yet that his moral and religious reflections,
"tho' ſometimes long, are generally too excellent to "need a vindication." But ſtill "That theſe faults
"were the faults of the age, and have made many curious
"perſons wiſh for an epitomy, &c." ſo Roſs's attempt being executed with ſmall ſkill and ſucceſs, he recommends this. But thoſe obſervations and digreſſions which theſe perſons were ſo curious as to wiſh retrenched in this hiſtory, archbiſhop Uſher, or the learned Dr. Bainbridge, had the curioſity to prefer, it ſeems, as matter of choiceſt note: as may appear by the excerptions made out of this hiſtory in a manuſcript which has the writing of both thoſe authors in it, and is preſerved in the library of Trinity-College in Dublin. And ſuch another preference, as the moſt delicate paſſages in this hiſtory, has lately been made by an ingenious hand in London, in a collection of many Divine, Moral, and Political Reflections out of it; which, if made with that choice, and brought into that order it is, capable of, will do our author more juſtice than all the epitomies of his hiſtory that the world ſhall be troubled with.

[a] Such as the lord Bacon and Sir Thomas Brown in philoſophy; Fernelius and Dr. Harvey in phyſick; beſides others. As for theſe Animadverſions which the ſaid Roſs publiſh'd a few months before his death upon our author's Hiſtory of the World, they are join'd to his Leviathan drawn out with a Hook, againſt Mr. Hobbes, 12*mo*. 1653; and were manifeſtly publiſh'd to help off his foregoing wretched performance, The Epitomy. They contain about ſeventy pages, and about as many obſervations on our author's hiſtory; pretending to note his miſtakes, and clear ſome doubtful paſſages therein. Tho' whoever ſhall examine them may find, that he has made more paſſages doubtful than he has clear'd; and as for miſtakes, the greateſt are thoſe which himſelf makes of his author; ſometimes perverting his ſentiments; ſometimes oppoſing his citations as his opinions; and at others, correcting his opinions out of the citations he had approv'd of. In ſome places, he is ſo poor a corrector as to fall upon his author for the lapſes of his printer; in many, labours about things of no conſequence; and in moſt, notes no miſtake, nor clears any doubt, according to his title, but recites a paſſage only to make ſome ſuperfluous additions to it, from his own bottomleſs fund of pedantry, or ſome reference to others of his own ſtupid writings. So that he ſeems throughout like ſome broker, who has all his life been ſtoring his upper rooms with a great deal of old lumber, that he may be able, when any curious antique is produced, only to oppoſe others of a different form, how inferiour ſoever in uſe or application, rather to puzzle the ignorant in what they ſhould prefer, than convince them of what they ought to reject; having no opportunity ſo creditable to diſcloſe the variety of his own trifles, or hopes of making them paſs for ſomething of value. This man might have ſwell'd out an article or two more in his ſaid tract, from what Ralegh himſelf has obſerv'd upon his own hiſtory when it came from the preſs, could that critic have come at his remarks. For there is ſuch a curioſity remaining in his family, as one of the firſt printed copies, which had been his own book. 'Tis printed on large paper, with the maps colour'd, bound in red leather, with gilt leaves, and his creſt, the Cap of Honour, ſtampt on the covers. In this copy Sir Walter has made two or three corrections with his own pen; particularly in the 535th page of the three laſt books, there is one eſcape which has not been corrected in any of the following impreſſions, wherein I have particularly looked for it; where ſpeaking of the Roman army which was to face Hannibal, Ralegh has, under the words five hundred horſe, drawn a line; and, in the margin, written, "It
"muſt needs be five thouſand horſe; for ſhortly after,
"Nero carries with him a part of his army to his col-
"legue, in which there was a thouſand horſe."

modern hiſtory, to be any further an author of that which is ancient. There is, indeed, a little intimation of the deſign he had upon ſome ancient part of our Engliſh ſtory, preſerved in a letter of his own, written it ſeems, tho' undated, before his great work was publiſh'd, to that acquaintance, whoſe library was moſt likely to accommodate him with thoſe uncommon books which he wanted for his purpoſe. This letter is as follows. " Sir Robert Cotton, If you have any of " theſe old books, or any manuſcripts wherein I may find any of our Britiſh antiquities; if you " pleaſe to lend them me for a little while, I will ſafely reſtore them, and think myſelf much " beholden unto you: or if you have any old French hiſtory, wherein our nation is mention'd; " or any elſe, in what language ſoever. (So ſubſcribes himſelf) Your poor friend, W. Ra- " legh." [a] But this does not ſufficiently aſſure us, whether the uſe of theſe books was to continue his General Hiſtory, or furniſh him upon ſome more particular ſubject, however, we may incline with the writer of Sir Robert Cotton's life to the former opinion. And as for the reaſons of one ingenious author, why Sir Walter Ralegh was the moſt proper perſon to write the hiſtory of his own time; [b] and the opinion of another, " That his admirable performance " already publiſh'd, ſufficiently ſhews, that if he had attempted the hiſtory of his own country, " or his own times, he would have excell'd even Livy or Thucydides; and that the Annals of " queen Elizabeth by his pen, without diminiſhing from the ſerious, judicious Camden, had " been the brighteſt glory of her reign; and would have tranſmitted his Hiſtory as the ſtan- " dard of our language even to the preſent age:" [c] Theſe are ſtill no affirmatives that he did finiſh ſuch a ſecond part. So that his own intimations in the firſt part, reſerv'd and inconcluſive as they are, ſeem to have been the only foundation of that formal ſtory, " How Sir Walter " Ralegh, a few days before his death, ſent for Walter Burre, the bookſeller who had printed " his firſt volume, and taking him by the hand, aſked him, how that work of his had ſold? " who anſwer'd, ſo ſlowly that it had undone him; hereupon Ralegh ſtepping to his deſk, " reach'd out the other part of his hiſtory, which he had brought down to the times he liv'd in, " then ſaying, with a ſigh, Ah friend! has the firſt part undone thee? the ſecond volume ſhall " undo no more; this ungrateful world is unworthy of it; ſo ſtept to the fire, threw it in, " and ſet his foot on it till it was conſum'd." But, as we obſerved before, Ralegh had no leiſure to finiſh ſuch a ſecond part of his hiſtory down to his own time. In the next place, 'tis no ways probable that he, who, in regard to the firſt part, could follow the rule of Seneca; that he, who having ſatisfied his own conſcience, could diſregard the cenſure of others, ſhould ſacrifice ſo great a part of his labours, or any part, in ſuch a raſh and inconſiderate manner, to the ſudden repreſentations of a bookſeller, without ever ſuſpecting any mercenary ends in him. Further, it does not appear true that the firſt part did ſell ſlowly, for there was a ſecond edition of it ſet forth by that very bookſeller, within three years after the firſt, as we have in a note before obſerv'd; and laſtly, the firſt man we can meet with who reports the ſame, is a trifling and ſuperficial writer, who produces no authority for his aſſertion. [d]

As to the unfiniſh'd parts he might have of ſuch a continuation, to admit that they were thus deſtroy'd would, moreover, in no wiſe agree with an account we have more ſatisfactorily atteſted of that great quantity there was in being of Sir Walter Ralegh's unprinted writings, ſeveral years after his death. For it is affirm'd to us, " That the famous Mr. Hamden, a " little before the civil wars, was at the charge of tranſcribing three thouſand four hundred " fifty two ſheets of Sir Walter Ralegh's manuſcripts, as the amanuenſis himſelf told me (ſays " my author) who had his cloſe chamber, his fire and candle, with an attendant to deliver

" him the originals, and take his copies as fast as he could write them." [a] Yet what is become of this treasure now, I have not been able to learn; for, if we suppose that Mr. Hamden would not be at the trouble and charge of transcribing any of our author's writings which had then been printed; and grant that all of his which have been printed since that time, as well as all we can hear of remaining in MS. which are allow'd to be his, were part of that collection or quantity, they will not, both join'd together, as might be computed from what is here observed of them, amount to a fourth part thereof, tho' we should admit two or three pieces more, also ascribed to him, which have not yet been named, and happen to fall under this historical division. The first of them is call'd, A notable and memorable Story of the cruel War between the Carthaginians and their own Mercenaries: Gather'd out of Polybius and other authors, by that famous Historian Sir Walter Ralegh. [b] Tho' this was indeed written by him, it is no different work from what he had before publish'd, but reviv'd during the civil wars, to reflect with some authority upon the distractions of those times. The other two pieces might seem to fall within the intended continuation of his Universal History; but the first of them, call'd The Life and Death of Mahomet; the Conquest of Spain; together with the Rising and Ruin of the Saracen Empire, ascribed to Sir Walter Ralegh near twenty years after his death, by the bookseller who dedicated it to his son, [c] is, except a few leaves about that of Mahomet, no more than a translation of an epitomy made by some ignorant Spanish author, chiefly from what one of his own fabulous countrymen had written of a fictitious prince named Jacob Almansor, [d] as I have been assur'd by a gentleman of great knowledge both in the Spanish and Oriental writers, whose answer, having satisfy'd me with the intelligence I was ambitious of procuring about this book, I here take the liberty of subjoining for the satisfaction also of the publick. But the stile itself, so uncouth in some places, so meagre in others, and incorrect, especially in known things, places, and persons, might of itself exclude our author from having any hand in it. The other piece is stiled, An Introduction to a Breviary of the History of England; with the reign of King William I. entitled the Conqueror, written by Sir Walter Ralegh. It was near fourscore years after his death before this was publish'd. Yet there are several old manuscript copies of it in the libraries of the curious, [f] which entitle him the author of it;

[d] There seems to be other translations of the life of this pretended prince than that which follows this life of Mahomet in the book ascribed to Sir Walter Ralegh, as Almansor, the learned and victorious King that conquer'd Spain, his Life and Death; translated from the Spanish by Robert Ashley, 4*to. Lond.* 1627. La vie de Jacob Almansor roi d'Arabie. 8*vo. Paris*, 1638. Almansor's Life, with the Conquest of Spain by the Moors, 8*vo.* 1693, &c.

[e] " Sir  The greater part of this book, " containing The History of the Conquest of Spain, and " the Life of the Caliph Jacob Almansor, in whose reign " the author supposes that conquest to have been made, " with an account of his immediate predecessor and " successors, is said by the author, page 34, to be " abbreviated out of two Arabian writers, translated into " Spanish in the year 1606; both the authors living in the " time of Almansor; the one, a captain in that war, and " the other for 20 years together of his chamber, and af- " ter his death a provincial governor in Arabia Felix. " But it appears to be no other than an abstract, or trans- " lation of an abstract made in Spanish, of the first " book of the first part, and the first book of the second " part of Miguel de Luna's History of the Loss of Spain, " entitled, Historia verdadera del Rey D. Rodrigo, &c. " which history he pretended to have translated in 1589 " (for that is the date of the first part) from the Arabic of " Abulcacim Tarif Abentarique, written in the year of " the Hejra 140, who appears to have inserted in his " work The Life of the Caliph Jacob Almansor, written " in the same language by another author, named Alii " Abençufian, vice-roy and governor of the province of " Deuque in Arabia, in the year of the Hejra 110."

" Whether there ever were two such Arabian historians " as these, is very uncertain; but certain it is, that de " Luna's history can be no translation of any genuine " Arabian writer, but must be wholly a forgery of his " own: for there never was any such caliph of the " Saracens in Asia as Jacob Almansor; the whole account " of him, his father, son and grandson, being a mere " romance in every particular. Spain was conquer'd in " the reign of Al Walid Ebn Abd' almalec, the VIth of " the Arabian Khalifs of the family of Omeyya, who " died in the year 96. The only Khalif in Asia who " took the surname of Al Mansur, was the second of the " family of Al Abbas, named Abu Jaafar Abdalla, and " began his reign in the year of the Hejra 137, which " is 35 years after de Luna's Almansor is said to have " died. Nor did any Arabian ever write in the manner " of de Luna, or send such letters as he has inserted in " his history; wherein tho' some particulars relating to " the war and conquest of Spain may be true, yet what- " ever he says of the Arabians in Asia, or the Khalifs " there, is utterly false, and without the least shadow of " truth."

" As to the life of Mahomet, which takes up only " the first 24 pages of this book, it was prefixed either " by the translator or abbreviator, and extracted from the " accounts given of that pretended prophet by christian " writers; and being for the most part false and ri- " diculous, deserves little regard."

" I cannot think therefore, notwithstanding the opini- " on of the bookseller in his dedication, that a person of " Sir Walter Ralegh's learning and judgment was ever " any way concern'd in this book: we hear not, that " any copy of it was ever found in his study, or that any " MS. of it, ascrib'd to him, is preserved, as of his genu- " ine pieces, in the libraries of the curious. And had " the author or translator look'd ever so little into the " Saracen history, even as given by the Byzantine hi- " storians, and the Latin writers of the middle age, he " must have known better than to be impos'd on by " so bare-fac'd an impostor. Whether the stile and lan- " guage of this performance confirm my opinion or not, " you  &c.

But the copy from whence this book was printed in 8*vo.* 1693, being among the manuscripts of archbishop Sancroft, was committed to the press by Dr. John Moore, afterwards bishop of Ely, as I have it attested under the hand of Robert Keck, Esq; late of the Temple, in it; but it was written at leaſt two years before he publiſh'd his Hiſtory of the World, becauſe it is inſcribed to a perſon who died ſo long before the ſaid publication, in theſe words: "I "intend by the help of God and your furtherance, right noble earl of Salisbury, to write a brief "hiſtory of England from William the firſt, entitled the Conquerer, to the end of queen Elizabeth "of perpetual memory." But by then his Hiſtory of the World was finiſh'd, he was, as we have obſerved, alſo from his own words, diſcouraged from all continuation. To thoſe diſcouragements might be added, the ungrateful treatment which was ſhewn to this Part he did publiſh, at its firſt appearance: for tho' we have obſerved what univerſal approbation it has met with ſince the author's death; yet how it was receiv'd as ſoon as it came abroad and made its firſt viſits at court, we are yet to relate.

THOSE, who thought the king muſt needs be a patron of authors becauſe he was one of the number, have been ready to inſinuate, that his favour encreaſed towards Ralegh in proportion to the proofs his pen had given of his abilities; therefore, that his many excellent Writings, and eſpecially this Hiſtory of the World, were the moſt powerful interceſſors for his releaſment out of the Tower; as if his majeſty, in reſpect to his own honour, thought it in vain longer to confine his perſon, ſince no condition could confine his fame; or, in regard to Ralegh's merit, that he had well deſerved no place ſhould be a barrier to his liberty, who had given ſuch extraordinary teſtimony that no age could ſet a bound to his knowledge. Sanderſon has aſcrib'd the freedom which not long after enſu'd, to one of thoſe motives; where he ſays, "Sir Walter Ralegh, wearied with "long impriſonment, and having there ſpent his time well in the Hiſtory of the World, made "his petition more paſſable to the king; whoſe love to learning granted him now at laſt his "liberty; and, not long after, leave to wander after a deſign to the weſtern world, where "he had been in ſeveral climates before." [a] But others, who ſeem to have known the matter much better, or have more ingenuouſly imparted it, aſſure us, that Ralegh's excellent talents were ſo far from ingratiating him with the king, "that tho' his majeſty had been intemperately "praiſed by flatterers for ſome of the weakeſt of his own compoſitions, yet he could not forbear, "out of an impertinent emulation, to affect Sir Walter Ralegh the leſs, becauſe of the great "repute which followed him for his excellent pen." [b] Nay, we are elſewhere told, in anſwer to Sanderſon above, that Ralegh's Hiſtory of the World gave the king ſo much diſpleaſure, "that "at its firſt publication it was forbid; and particularly, for ſome paſſages in it which offended "the Spaniard; as alſo for being too plain with the faults of princes in his preface." [c] For it is, indeed, repleniſh'd with many remarkable examples of divine vengeance pour'd forth on princes of many other nations as well as our own, who ſtrove to eſtabliſh their thrones by oppreſſion and iniquity. That paſſage in anſwer to Sanderſon, is ſo far from being deny'd by this writer, that he afterwards confirm'd it in contradiction to what himſelf had written as above, about Ralegh's petition being made more paſſable by his Hiſtory; where, after his groſs manner of interpretation, he ſays, "King James and all other princes had cauſe of complaint, becauſe "his whole book ſets out the eaſtern monarchs with much glory, and exclaims againſt chriſtian "princes as moſt inhuman; tracing all the Engliſh ſoveraigns from the conqueſt, eſpecially Henry "the eighth; whom, for his daughter's honour, Sir Walter Ralegh might have ſpar'd from gall "and bitterneſs." And a little further, "King James might perhaps obſerve more, to repreſs "the wickedneſs of ſuch a perſon, who, under pretence of taxing a vice in the father, intend-"ed cunningly to ſtain the whole race, &c." [d] This objection againſt Ralegh's character of that king, is more particularly aſcribed to king James by another writer alſo before-cited, who tells us, "That after much ſcorn caſt upon Ralegh's Hiſtory, the king, being modeſtly de-"manded What fault he found? anſwer'd, as one ſurpriſed, That Ralegh had ſpoken ir- in one of the printed copies of the ſaid book in my poſſeſſion. The ſaid Dr. Moore's preface to this piece, however ſome have thought it father'd on our author, is in theſe words, "This life of William the Conqueror writ by "Sir Walter Ralegh, was found in the library of a perſon "of high quality. Whoſoever has been converſant in the "works of that accompliſh'd knight, and a little acquainted "with his great genius and ſpirit, and his manly unaffected "ſtile, will make no doubt but what here is preſented unto "the world was his genuine iſſue. For the comprehenſive "and penetrating thoughts, the lively imagination, and "the mature exact judgment of Sir Walter Ralegh, do all "manifeſtly appear in this ſmall treatiſe. It may be "matter of ſome wonder that a work fill'd with ſuch a "number of judicious reflections upon the nature of govern-"ment in general, and ſo many wiſe obſervations relating "to the particular ſtate of our own country, ſhould have "been thus long condemn'd to obſcurity; had not an ill "fate attended the learned compoſitions, as well as the brave "actions of this renowned gentleman. But by what unhap-"py accident ſoever it has hitherto been confin'd to privacy, "it was thought it would be an injury to the publick "any longer to conceal a juſt and true account of the "reign of William the firſt, wherein ſo many remarka-"ble matters and great revolutions happen'd, and to "which the writers of government and policy in our "nation have very frequent recourſe; ſince the tranſ-"actions of that time, unto which they ſo commonly "appeal, are here related with that faithfulneſs, brevity "and clearneſs, that become an exact hiſtorian."

"reverently of king Henry the eighth!" [a] as if he would have reflected a breach of gratitude upon our Hiſtorian towards his benefactreſs the late queen, in ſpeaking ſuch truth when he was to give a character of her father as, not only others who read it muſt concur in, ſeeing the Hiſtorian has ſo many proofs at his finger's end to confirm it; but what that king himſelf, were he alive, on whom it was written, muſt alſo have allowed; ſince it is only a paraphraſe upon his own dying confeſſion, that he had been a Prince, who never ſpared man in his anger, nor woman in his luſt. But if king James could thus object againſt Ralegh for one character, and pay him no thanks for another which follows in the ſame paragraph of that Preface, and in ſome parts of the Hiſtory itſelf; this may perhaps beſt ſhew where lay the breach of gratitude. But however his majeſty might think it a kind of blaſphemy, that any below the dignity of princes ſhould be the cenſors of them: yet that objection aforeſaid ſeems not to be the natural cauſe, ſays our laſt-quoted author, of his diſlike to this hiſtory, "ſince none ever exclaim'd "more againſt that prince than uſually king James himſelf did." And others, more particularly ſtill, are inclin'd to believe, that any liberty Ralegh may have taken with the characters of other princes, was not ſo much the real cauſe of ſuch diſguſt in king James, as, through the inſinuations of ſome miſchievous ſycophants about him, who well knew what humour might be moſt agreeably fed, that ſeveral parts of the hiſtory contained an oblique and artful expoſure of himſelf and his miniſtry; as if, truly, the general Hiſtory of the World was chiefly a ſecret Hiſtory, or ſatire upon his Court; and Scotch faces were to be ſeen in it, ſtuck upon old Jewiſh, Babylonian or Aſſyrian ſhoulders. For, as one has obſerv'd, "There was a time, when one of our moſt "renowned Hiſtorians could not comment upon a piece of the Old Teſtament, without being "thought to write a libel upon his own times: and the king was almoſt led to fancy he ſaw "his own features in the face of Ninias the ſon of queen Semiramis; but ſurely, if he could "think his juſtice cenſured in the ſtory of Achab's taking away Naboth's vineyard, and not "commended in that of the French king's conduct towards his judge and admiral of France; "he muſt not only have been a very captious and ſelf-tormenting reader, but have ſatiriz'd himſelf "more ſharply by engroſſing of applications, or acquieſcing in reſemblances, than he could "have been by that author, had he really intended any." [b] But the truth is, that conſcious minds can find in every example ſomething to chaſtiſe themſelves; and, to ſtomachs vitiated through foul and unwholſome adminiſtrations, with evil habits, the moſt innocent diet is upbraiding. That Ralegh foreſaw his enemies would make ſuch perverſe conſtruction and miſuſe of his Hiſtory, is evident enough in his own words; where, mentioning the choice he had made, as leaſt exceptionable, of the elder times to deſcribe, he yet anticipates this objection, "Againſt this choice alſo: Why may it not be ſaid, that in ſpeaking of the paſs'd I point at the "preſent; and tax the vices of thoſe who are yet living, in their perſons who are long ſince "dead, and have it laid to my charge? But this I cannot help, tho' innocent; and certainly, "if there be any, who, finding themſelves ſpotted like the tygers of old time, ſhall find fault "with me for painting them over anew, they ſhall therein accuſe themſelves juſtly, and me "falſely." [c] Yet ſuch fault there was, we ſee, found; and ſo falſely was he accuſed. Thus the honour which ſhould reward a publick benefit, is ſtifled by private prejudice.

We are therefore to ſeek ſome other mediator for Ralegh's deliverance out of priſon than his merit by this publick benefit; and that, we ſhall at laſt find to be his money, tho' other cauſes in our common hiſtories are alſo ſuggeſted, eſpecially that which ſeemed moſt effectual, the offer he made of fitting out an expedition to ſecure, and poſſeſs for the crown, a gold mine in Guiana, which he had himſelf diſcover'd when he was formerly in that country, and which, ſince that time, had been by others ſo amply teſtified, that further confirmation was not now requir'd. So that Ralegh's being deceiv'd by Keymis with ore of a golden complexion, which he brought from thence, or by any chymical tricks, ſuch as ſecretly ſlipping real gold with the ore into the melting-pot, are fooliſh untruths. [d] Now that offer Ralegh had made at leaſt three years before he obtain'd his liberty, with no unreaſonable expectation of its being accepted, ſince king James had ſo publickly aſſerted and confirm'd the right of England to that Country, through Sir Walter Ralegh's conqueſt and diſcoveries therein, with the ſubmiſſion he had gain'd from the chief lords thereof, as to have given commiſſions and patents for the poſſeſſion of the ſame, that is to ſay, all from the river of Amazons to the Deſſequebe, and all the iſlands for twenty miles about, in his majeſty's name; which were accordingly executed in all due form by captain Charles Leigh and captain Robert Harcourt, which laſt left a colony there of thirty perſons for three years, as may be read at large in the narratives of their ſeveral expeditions.[a] Beſides, the publick invitations and encouragement which afterwards enſued, to all who would again ſettle and plant in that new-diſcover'd part of America,[b] gave the Diſcoverer himſelf no doubt, the greater hopes that his own propoſitions, being not for his private, but the publick benefit (yet at his own expence, and that of ſuch friends as he ſhould engage in the adventure) could not but be embrac'd. Add to this, the advantages of his further knowing the riches of this country, even while he was in priſon, not only by the long converſation he had with thoſe Indians, whom we find here with him in the former part of his confinement, but others who from time to time came over to him. For during this long impriſonment, he held conſtant intercourſe with Guiana, and was at the charge every year, or every ſecond year, of ſending a ſhip or more thither, to keep them in hopes of being relieved from the Spaniards,[c] who had again encroach'd upon them, and cruelly maſſacred both ſeveral of the natives, and of his own men.[d] So that the number of Voyages he ſet forth for Guiana, was at leaſt as many, if not more, than thoſe he is before obſerved to have fitted out for Virginia.

But all this experience, which ſhould have recommended his offer, ſerv'd at firſt only to render it unacceptable. For the Treaſurer Cecyll being then alive, he, with two or three others who bore the ſway at court, were reſolved to diſcountenance it; not that they ſo much doubted the probability that ſuch treaſure might remain unpoſſeſs'd, or the knowledge and reſolution of Ralegh to compaſs it, ſo much as his diſpoſition towards themſelves, if by a ſucceſsful return he ſhould purchaſe the king's favour. Therefore, to prevent ſuch a rival as he might prove to Them, the advantage he propos'd to the State was neglected; nay, ſo deeply had they rooted prejudices in the king's breaſt towards him in this particular, as well as in others before mention'd, that when his majeſty was ſollicited by any perſon in Ralegh's behalf (and Royal ſollicitors he had) he, with that implicit reliance on other men's reports, which thoſe in ſupreme ſtation ſo often bury their own judgments and their juſtice in, would anſwer, That his council knew him better than he did. But after Cecyll's death, and now that Sir Ralph Winwood was ſecretary of ſtate,[e] Ralegh reviv'd his propoſal to him, and, in a letter, told him with relation to thoſe two or three earwigs who were ever crawling about the king, and at the mercy of whoſe repreſentations he had ſo long lain, that it was his only infelicity the king did not know him as well as thoſe courtiers pretended to do: "For, had his majeſty known me, ſays he, I had "never been here where I now am; or, had I known his majeſty, they had never been ſo "long there where they now are. His majeſty not knowing me has been my ruin, and his "miſknowing them has been the ruin of a goodly part of his eſtate. But they are all of "them now, ſome living and ſome dying, come to his majeſty's knowledge." We learn further out of the ſaid letter, that both queen Anne, who had inform'd herſelf from the beginning of all that Ralegh had been accus'd with, and her brother the king of Denmark, at both times of his being in England,[f] were thoroughly ſatisfy'd of his innocency, otherwiſe they would never have moved his majeſty in his behalf. And prince Henry, who had been curious in ſearching into the nature of his offences, had been frequently a mediator for him, as we have read before. Hereupon, ſays Ralegh, "The wife, the brother, and the ſon of a king, do not "uſe to ſue for men ſuſpect; but ſince they all have done it, and with reference to me alone, "you, ſtrengthned by their example, may with the more hardineſs do the like." Towards the end, Ralegh having acknowledg'd, that all he had remaining was owing to the king, and that he was ready to ſacrifice it all in his majeſty's ſervice, concludes with this noble diſtinction, To die for the king, and not by the king, is all the ambition I have in the world.[g]

This and other like addreſſes to that new ſecretary, advanced not Ralegh's requeſt ſo much, but he found it neceſſary to uſe ſtronger intereſt than what he was here making, and more ſubſtantial arguments than could flow from a pen. For whatever "pity of his ſufferings, his merit and "fame of learning now begat in many, or by whatever means of the French ambaſſador, with "others of our own lords," it is pretended, in our common accounts of him, that "he got free-"dom of repairing for his health to his houſe at St. James's, a year or two before he procur'd "his commiſſion for his voyage to Guiana,"[h] we are more poſitively and particularly told, "That Sir William St. John and Sir Edward Villiers, half-brother to the lady Villiers, after-"wards dutcheſs of Buckingham, procur'd Sir Walter Ralegh's liberty, and had fifteen hundred " pounds for their labour."[a] It further appears, that theſe uſed their power with Sir George Villiers, the new riſing favourite at court, and ſo obtained the king's conſent for Ralegh's enlargement: for there is a letter of Ralegh's acknowledgments to that favourite in theſe words, " Sir, You have, by your mediation, put me again into the world; I can but acknowledge " it; for to pay any part of your favour by any ſervice of mine as yet, it is not in my " power. If it ſucceed well, a good part of the honour ſhall be yours; and if I do not " alſo make it profitable unto you, I ſhall ſhew myſelf exceeding ungrateful. In the mean " while, and, till God diſcover the ſucceſs, I beſeech you to reckon me among the number " of your faithful ſervants, tho' the leaſt able. W. Ralegh."[b] This letter is dated only March 17, but probably written in this year laſt mention'd, 1615; becauſe three days afterwards, as Camden has preciſely remember'd, Sir Walter Ralegh was releas'd out of the Tower.[c] So that he thus purchas'd his liberty in the thirteenth year of his confinement; that is to ſay, after he had been (without intermiſſion) twelve years, three months, and five days in the ſaid Tower of London, beſides near three months more at his firſt commitment thither, and during his arraignment at Wincheſter.

Releas'd out of the Tower.

At this time Carr, earl of Somerſet, had been about four or five months in the ſaid Tower with his counteſs, for the barbarous impoiſonment of Sir Thomas Overbury about two years before in the ſame place, to which he had treacherouſly driven him, for only having obſtructed the ſaid earl's vile and ſcandalous commerce with that lewd woman, while ſhe was young Eſſex's wife. " Theſe two accidents (at this time drew great notice) happening (as 'tis ob- " ſerved in a tract aſcrib'd to the lord Brook) ſo much beyond all expectation; that the one, " being a ſpecial favourite of the king, the other a condemned man; the one impriſon'd, " the other ſet at liberty; gave great occaſion of ſpeech and rumour, and ſo much the more " wonder and admiration, becauſe of Ralegh's wit and policy."[d] Ralegh is further ſaid by the ſame author, to have given Somerſet many quips and taunts during his ſaid impriſonment; and it may not be improbable, towards ſuch an undeſerving intruder upon his eſtate. But, as this earl of Somerſet was convicted of felony for the ſaid murder, whereby the two hundred thouſand pounds he had heap'd up, and lands to the income of nineteen thouſand pounds per Annum being again diſpers'd;[e] and as the king had laid that heavy curſe upon himſelf and his poſterity which he did, if ever he pardon'd any of the ſaid murderers, it might have been thought that Ralegh's compariſon of himſelf and that noble malefactor, would not have been ſpoil'd, when he ſaid, That the whole Hiſtory of the World had not the like precedent, of a king's priſoner to purchaſe freedom, and his boſom favourite to have the halter, but in ſcripture, in the caſe of Mordecai and Haman. Inſtead of that, Ralegh is ſaid, by the relator of this paſſage, to have been told, the king ſhould reply upon hearing this obſervation, That Ralegh might die in that deceit;[f] and ſo he did, as this author truly ſays: for the king now ſav'd the life of the one, as much to the aſtoniſhment of the world, as he afterwards put the other to death. But he could do no leſs, if his favourite was really a maſter of ſuch ſecrets as are elſewhere ſpoken of.[g] And this is enough to reſolve why the misfortunes of that earl, if they may be called ſuch, which at the worſt were more favourable than his merits in any wiſe deſerved, were not equal to his crimes.[h]

Ralegh being thus at liberty, ſoon appears buſy in making preparation for his voyage. To this purpoſe he called in the eight thouſand pounds, which he had lent to the counteſs of Bedford, i reckon'd in king James his declaration, a competent ſatisfaction for Sherborne; tho' it was afterwards valued by the ſtate at 5000 l. per annum. But ſeeing that not ſufficient to fit out a fleet in the manner he found neceſſary, his wife conſented alſo to ſell her houſe and lands at Micham in Surrey, for which he received twenty-five hundred pounds;[k] all which and more he expended in this expedition. And what frenzy could poſſeſs him, as he ſays himſelf, thus to diſpoſe of his whole ſubſtance, and undertake ſuch a toilſome and perilous voyage now that his conſtitution was impair'd by ſuch a long confinement, beſides age itſelf, ſickneſs and affliction, were he not aſſur'd thereby of doing his prince ſervice, bettering his country by commerce, and reſtoring his family to their eſtates, all from the mines of Guiana; and, ſays he, if I myſelf had not ſeen them with my own eyes.[l] I have not yet heard who was the purchaſer of that eſtate at Micham; but there is a letter of Ralegh's to a nobleman extant, which poſſibly relates thereunto. It is to entreat him to make an impartial valuation of ſome lands to a riſing favourite who was to be the purchaſer, and is penn'd in the following words. " I " humbly beſeech your lordſhip to give me leave, and pardon too, if I need it, for the an- " ſwering of thoſe things which you were lately pleas'd to object againſt me; and that you " will charitably alſo conſider both of my demands, and of the reaſons which embolden me " to make them. Thoſe anſwers go here, in a paper which is enclos'd, apart; and my letter " ſhall ſay but thus much, that the gentleman, who is ſo greatly in favour, hath many fair " fortunes before him, and we, nothing to look for but miſery; and that he is better able to " give us above the worth of the land, than we in condition to abate any part thereof. And " therefore we humbly beſeech your lordſhip, that your compaſſion and care of honour, may " be the judge between his proſperous navigation, and our ſhipwreck: and that your charity " for us, and your deſire of ſatisfaction for him, may equal the ballance between us. I hope " ſo heartily to find all juſt favour at your hands, as I will venture, upon this, to aſſure " you, that I will do all my utmoſt to make my wife and ſon forget their miſery in them- " ſelves, and to be ever mindful of their duty towards your lordſhip; to whom I hope they " will be, as I am ſure myſelf have been, and am, a moſt faithful, humble ſervant." [a]

BESIDES the ten thouſand five hundred pounds which it coſt Sir Walter Ralegh to put himſelf in equipage for this long-propoſed voyage, a much greater ſum than would have paid for his liberty of receding from it, or for a formal pardon, had he thought he needed, and had gone about to purchaſe it; there were many co-adventurers, who, by contributions to the expence thereof, entitled themſelves to a ſhare in the returns. But moſt of theſe are called by Ralegh, a company of voluntiers, who had never ſeen the ſea nor wars; and, except ſome forty gentlemen, a very diſſolute, diſorderly, and ungovernable crew, " whom their friends thought it an " exceeding good gain to be diſcharg'd of, at the hazard of ſome thirty, forty or fifty pounds, " knowing they could not have lived a whole year ſo cheap at home." [b] There were, moreover, ſeveral merchants, not only in England but foreign parts, who contributed to this Mine-adventure; ſo confident were they that it was no chimera, no ſuppoſititious or airy treaſure that was promiſed or purſued. One of theſe merchants, afterwards knighted, and very eminent for his dealings, was named Peter Vanlore, who ſo approved of Sir Walter Ralegh's undertaking, that he not only ſent a letter to his brother Sir Adrian Thibaut in Amſterdam, requeſting him to engage another merchant there to communicate ſomething he knew of the riches in Guiana to Sir Walter Ralegh; but made that requeſt in Ralegh's own manner of expreſſion, from a copy which he drew up for him. This draught, as I have it from the ſaid original, is as follows: " Brother Tibotes, There is a merchant in Amſterdam, that for the love he bears to my " honourable friend Sir Walter Ralegh, is content to diſcover ſomewhat of importance unto " him in Guiana, to which country Sir Walter Ralegh is now preparing to go; but he doth " require aſſurance from Sir Walter Ralegh, that he himſelf may be aſſur'd to enjoy ſuch part " of the commodity diſcover'd, as he ſhall agree upon with Sir Walter Ralegh by his deputy " Mr. Henry Hovenar. I do therefore pray you to ſpeak with the party which Mr. Hovenar " will bring unto you, and to know what aſſurances he will require, which to pleaſure Sir " Walter, I ſhall be willing to give; that is to ſay, to give him aſſurance that upon Sir " Walter's return into England, the charges being deducted, the diſcoverer ſhall receive from " Sir Walter ſuch part of the ſaid merchandize as Sir Walter and he ſhall agree on; altho' " there needs no ſuch aſſurance to be given, becauſe his majeſty doth aſſure all Sir Walter's " partners by the Great Seal of England, That they ſhall truly and quietly enjoy all their parts " and ſhares of what goods, merchandize or treaſure ſoever ſhall be returned; out of which " Great Seal of England, the diſcoverer ſhall have an aſſignment for ſo much as belongs unto " him, to be deliver'd here in London, to whomſoever he ſhall appoint to receive it." Then in a new line he concludes thus: " To Mr. Peter Vanlore. This is the letter which I deſire " you to write to your brother in Amſterdam; and for any aſſurance you ſhall give, I will " again put you in ſureties to ſave you harmleſs. W. Ralegh." [c] This letter is dated July 1.

1616. And if Ralegh had his commiſſion for that voyage before this time, as it appears he had, by his citing it, then it muſt be erroneouſly dated, being near two months after, in king James his Declaration.[a] Here again, that commiſſion ſeems to have been given under the Great Seal of England; and alſo elſewhere:[b] In that Declaration, 'tis ſaid to be under the Privy Seal. But there are other things obſervable of this commiſſion as it is there printed, and in other places, as we ſhall ſee preſently.

In the mean while we may here obſerve a little oppoſition that was made to this voyage. And indeed ſome perſons at court, who might remember what advances Ralegh had formerly made there, by the means of ſeveral exploits which he undertook at a diſtance from it; and others, admoniſh'd by conſcience, that every friendly gale in his navigation would be ſplitting them upon a rock, might well be expected to obſtruct, as far as they could, his progreſs: but none do we hear of ſo impatient and clamorous againſt it as the Spaniard. For there had been now in England, about three years, an agent from Spain, named Diego Sarmiento de Acuna, better known, but not till about the time of Ralegh's death, or perhaps after it, by the title of count de Gondomar; a man, who, if he gain'd that influence he did over king James purely by art, muſt be allowed a good ſhare of dexterity in the myſteries of negotiation; but as he was adapted by nature to ſooth and captivate him, no leſs than by the pretenſions of his agency, it diminiſhes the wonders of his ſucceſs in making that king ſuch a ſubject to his enchantments, and keeping him ſo many years a priſoner as it were in the Tower he had heap'd up of airy and glittering promiſes: yet what reward was reſerved, for all his ſervices here, in his own country, and how this ardent ſlave to the will and pleaſure of his maſter, was both executioner of his royal pride as well as other paſſions, and ſacrifice alſo at laſt to them, muſt be left for thoſe to diſplay who have more leiſure to dilate upon ſuch retaliations of Providence. This was the man who (as he is repreſented in king James's Declaration) now "took great alarm," and is ſaid to have "made loud and vehement aſſertions to his majeſty in repeated audiences, that he knew, and "had diſcover'd the intention and enterprize of Sir Walter Ralegh to be but hoſtile and pi-"ratical, tending to the breach between the two crowns,[c] and the danger and deſtruction of "the king his maſter's ſubjects in thoſe parts; proteſting in a ſort againſt it." To which that the king, ſhould anſwer, (as it is there ſaid after Ralegh's death) "He would ſend Sir Walter Ralegh with a limited commiſſion (but how limited it was will ſoon appear) and that "he "durſt not, upon peril of his head, do any ſuch matter; and if he did, he would ſurely "do juſtice upon him, or ſend him bound hand and foot into Spain, with all the gold and "goods he ſhould obtain by robbery and bring home, were they never ſo great."[d] Then the king by Sir Ralph Winwood, got both a ſolemn proteſtation from Ralegh, that he had no other intention but only to go to thoſe gold mines; and alſo a cloſe letter to his majeſty (as it is here in his declaration juſtly call'd) confirming the ſame. This cloſe letter was both written cloſe to the purpoſe, or in ſuch expreſſive terms as to have laid open the whole ſcheme of Ralegh's voyage; and alſo as a matter to be kept cloſe, or with the utmoſt privacy; for 'tis ſaid, that upon ſuch communication, his majeſty promiſed, on the word of a king, to keep it ſecret:[e] and it would have prevented all ſuppoſition of diſingenuity, if this cloſe letter had been fairly exhibited in that declaration, had it been when this was pen'd, in the king's poſſeſſion, as it ought according to his royal promiſe. On the contrary, this ſeems to have been the very letter, by which, through the Spaniſh ambaſſador's means, his maſter the king of Spain was pre-admoniſhed of Ralegh's whole enterprize, and had ſent to Guiana, before he left the Britiſh channel, to prepare a greater force than his, to oppoſe him, as will hereafter appear. Nay, 'tis viſible by what immediately follows in the ſaid declaration, both that this cloſe letter (how cloſely ſoever the contents of it are with-held) did reveal the particulars of Ralegh's naval ſtrength, and that the king did divulge it to the Spaniſh ambaſſador; becauſe it was ſo far from making him recede from his former jealouſy, that he is diſcover'd to have objected thereupon againſt the number of ſhips Ralegh had prepared for the ſaid voyage,[f] to which Ralegh then doubtleſs made as proper anſwer, as we ſhall find he did hereafter. But in ſhort ſuch a propoſal, by one carrying the reputation of ſuch an active, witty and valiant gentleman, eſpecially of ſo great a commander at ſea, as his enemies allow he had;[g] one who muſt be thought moſt wary above all others of incurring king James's diſpleaſure, under which he had ſo long ſuffer'd; one who had given ſuch publick atteſtations of his ſincerity in the proſecution of this propoſal; and one who, as the greateſt proof he could give thereof, was actually embarking his whole fortune as well as credit, together with thoſe of his friends and relations, all finding ſecurity for their good behaviour, without any charge to the crown if they fail'd, and with proſpect of great advantage if they ſucceeded, was ſo far from being overthrown by any remonſtrances of the ambaſſador himſelf, or from being thought a moſt noble and generous overture by all other men, that even the king's honour is acknowledg'd, in his own Declaration, to have been engag'd, not to deny his people the adventure and hope of ſo great riches.[a] And yet what character of that king's honour towards his people, is expoſed in the ſame leaf of that very Declaration, where it is pretended, that in his own princely judgment he gave no belief to it, as being perſuaded that in nature there were no ſuch mines entire, or that the Spaniards, ſo induſtrious in the chace of treaſure, would have ſo long neglected the ſame; is left to the reader's diſtinction. But it may be beſt diſcover'd by the care taken to ſecure his majeſty's dividend ſo clearly, and to expreſs many other articles ſo doubtfully, in the commiſſion itſelf, of which we ſhall now give an impartial abſtract, whether it was from a magnanimous principle or a mercenary one, from upright policy or downright prevarication, that the ſame was granted; being as follows.

His commiſſion for a voyage to the South or elſewhere in America.

" JAMES, by the grace of God, &c. To all to whom theſe preſents ſhall come, &c.
" Whereas Sir WALTER RALEGH, knight, intendeth to undertake a voyage by ſea
" and ſhipping, to the South parts of America or elſewhere within America, poſſeſs'd and " inhabited by heathen and ſavage people; to diſcover ſome commodities and merchandize " profitable for the ſubjects of our kingdoms, whereof the inhabitants make little or no uſe;
" whence may enſue, by commerce, ſome propagation of the chriſtian faith and reformed
" religion among thoſe idolatrous people: and whereas there are divers merchants, &c. well
" diſpoſed to aſſiſt Sir Walter Ralegh, had they aſſurance to enjoy their due ſhare of the pro" fits returned, Sir Walter Ralegh being under the peril of the law; and whereas divers other
" gentlemen his kinſmen and friends, with ſeveral captains and commanders, are alſo deſirous
" to follow and venture their lives with him, if they might be commanded by none but " himſelf: We, upon deliberate conſideration, deſiring the benefit of our ſubjects, alſo to " give our princely furtherance to the ſaid Sir Walter Ralegh and his friends, as well as to " encourage others in the like laudable enterpriſes, advance the converſion of ſavages, and
" encreaſe traffick by our ſubjects of this kingdom, have of our ſpecial grace, &c. granted
" Sir Walter Ralegh full power to carry for the ſaid voyage, ſo many of our ſubjects, or others " who will become our ſubjects, as ſhall willingly accompany him; with ſufficient ſhipping,
" armour, weapons, ordnance, munition, powder, ſhot, &c. and all other things as he ſhall
" think neceſſary for the uſe and defence of him and his company; beſides liberty to exchange " or otherwiſe diſpoſe of his goods or merchandize; alſo to return into this or other of our " dominions with ſuch gold, ſilver, bullion, or any other wares, and they to be converted to " the proper uſe of the ſaid Sir Walter Ralegh and his company: paying to us, our heirs,
" &c. the full fifth part of all ſuch gold and ſilver, bullion, and ore of gold or ſilver,
" pearl and precious ſtones as ſhall be ſo imported; withal ſuch cuſtoms, &c. as ſhall be due
" for any other goods whatever. Further to encourage Sir Walter Ralegh and the adven" turers, we promiſe in verbo regio, that no gold, ſilver or other wares by them imported " from thoſe parts ſo poſſeſs'd and inhabited, ſhall be ſeiz'd by us, our heirs, or any of our " officers, but that it ſhall remain (the fifth part of the ſaid gold, ſilver, bullion, &c. as be" fore, with all other cuſtoms and duties being truly paid) to the ſole uſe of Sir Walter Ralegh
" and his company. Further of our moſt ſpecial grace, &c. we conſtitute the ſaid Sir
" Walter Ralegh to be the ſole governor and commander of all perſons who ſhall travel or be " with him in the ſaid voyage or in their return. And give him full power to correct,
" puniſh, pardon, and rule them according to ſuch orders and inſtructions as the ſaid Sir
" Walter Ralegh ſhall eſtabliſh, as well in caſes capital and criminal as civil, both marine " and other; ſo that the ſaid proceedings, as near as conveniently may be, are agreeable to " the laws of this realm and to the chriſtian faith now profeſs'd in the church of England.
" And becauſe in ſuch enterprizes great inconveniences have grown by mutinies and diſorders
" for want of ſufficient authority, we give full power to Sir Walter Ralegh in caſe of rebel" lion or mutiny by ſea or land, to exerciſe martial law upon juſt and apparent neceſſity, in
" as ample a manner as our lieutenant-general by ſea or land, or our lieutenants in the coun" ties of England. And we give Sir Walter Ralegh full power to appoint ſuch captains and We further command the wardens of the cinque ports, cuſtomers, " and other officers, quietly to permit Sir Walter Ralegh, and all who ſhall adventure with " him, to paſs to the ſaid South or other parts of America, poſſeſs'd and inhabited as aforeſaid, " and to return with any goods whatever, and to ſell or otherwiſe diſpoſe of the ſame to the " only uſe of him and his company; paying the fifth part of all gold, ſilver, bullion, &c. " as before, imported, and other cuſtoms and duties aforeſaid. And theſe preſents, &c. ſhall " be to the ſaid wardens, &c. ſufficient warrant. And we grant to the ſaid Sir Walter Ralegh, " that theſe our letters patents or the inrollment thereof, with all the grants, clauſes, &c. therein, " ſhall be ſufficient and effectual in law, any law, ſtatute, &c. notwithſtanding. Witneſs " ourſelves, the 26th day of Auguſt, in the 14th year of our reign of England, France and " Ireland; and of Scotland, the 50th. Per breve de privato ſigillo."

THIS abſtract is made from the ſaid commiſſion, as it is printed in king James's Declaration,[a] and may agree with that which ſeems alſo to have been given us from the records.[b] Whether there was, originally, any preamble to it we cannot ſay. But there are authors who affirm, that in this commiſſion king James called him his truſty and well-beloved Sir Walter Ralegh.[c] Tho' theſe may be words of courſe in ſuch like inſtruments, yet if ſome words were thus taken out in that recital aforeſaid, it might give reaſon of inferring that by the ſame liberty others have been ſqueez'd in. Yet even as it is ſuffer'd there to appear, 'tis ſurely far from being ſo clearly penn'd in point of thoſe limitations it is ſaid in his majeſty's Declaration he promis'd the Spaniſh ambaſſador: for here is no limitation to any part of America, not only the South parts but elſewhere being authoriz'd, and all that are habitable, inhabited in ſome degree or other by heathen and ſavage people: ſo vague, ſo equivocal, and diſputable is that diſtinction: not one word of Guiana, no owning of his own right, or the power he had lately given to plant there, no privilege for working any mine there, nor prohibition to meddle with the king of Spain's ſubjects there or elſewhere, as another writer has well obſerv'd.[d] On the contrary, full liberty to carry what arms and ammunition they pleas'd for defence, if they ſhould need it; and laſtly, the royal aſſurance of enjoying unmoleſted whatever they returned with. In ſhort, this commiſſion muſt eaſily be obſerved to have been penn'd, how clearly ſoever pretended, as if king James did neither know of Sir Walter Ralegh's intention for and at Guiana; tho' a little before, he had the whole particulars thereof from Ralegh's own hand, or that there were any Spaniards planted there; tho' he appears to have known that alſo from the Spaniſh ambaſſador himſelf, whoſe own kinſman, as we ſhall hear, was ſent, during Ralegh's reſtraint, from Spain, to build and colonize upon that very ſpot to which Ralegh had now this unlimited commiſſion, as we may rather term it, to go. For 'tis ſo much the reverſe of that cloſe penn'd letter wherein Ralegh had, ſo expreſſively, and ſo unreſervedly, placed his whole truſt of this voyage in king James, that it ſeems contriv'd, both to hoodwink the Spaniard till the action was over, tho' the king betray'd it himſelf, and to ſecure loop-holes ſufficient for the royal authority againſt his exceptions;[e] but they proved ſo large, that it was thought expedient, in the end, as we ſhall find, that the commiſſion ſhould not be inſiſted on to limit or reſtrain any body.

Whether this indiſtinct power in that commiſſion made Ralegh more or leſs importunate for his pardon, we cannot ſay. Some indeed write, that he laboured mainly to obtain it; but they are led into that belief by the declaration aforeſaid: whereas we find it expreſsly aſſerted in a letter of Carew Ralegh's; that his father had overtures made him of procuring his pardon for fifteen hundred pounds by Sir William St. John, one of the perſons of whom he purchas'd his freedom, therefore one whoſe intereſt was the leſs to be doubted in this particular; but that Sir Walter Ralegh conferring, a little before his departure from England, with Sir Francis Bacon (newly made lord keeper of the great ſeal, and not long after lord chancellor) upon this pecuniary pardon, he poſitively adviſed Ralegh againſt it in theſe words: Sir, the knee-timber of your voyage is money; ſpare your purſe in this particular, for upon my life, you have a ſufficient pardon for all that is paſs'd already, the king having, under his broad ſeal, made you admiral

admiral of your fleet, and given you power of the martial law over your officers and ſoldiers." [a] But we are elſewhere told, that even for leſs than half that money beforemention'd, that is to ſay, "for ſeven hundred pounds, the ſaid Sir William St. John, and alſo Sir Edward Villiers "(before ſpoken of) offer'd Sir Walter Ralegh not only his full pardon, but liberty not to go "his voyage if he pleas'd; and that he refus'd both; the rather becauſe he was told by Sir "Francis Bacon (as above) that his ſaid commiſſion was as good a pardon for all former "offences, as the law of England could afford him." [b]

AND now, near ſeven months after the date of his commiſſion, began his fleet to appear, or rather that part of it which lay in the Thames, and conſiſted of ſeven ſail. From the Survey which was taken thereof by the appointment of Charles earl of Nottingham the lord admiral, on the 15th of March in the year laſt named, it appears, that the firſt of them, or admiral, a brave ſhip, as deſcribed by one who might probably have ſeen it, and built by Ralegh himſelf, [c] was named the Deſtiny, of 440 tons, and 36 pieces (or more) of ordnance; Sir Walter Ralegh general, and his ſon Walter captain: beſides two hundred men, whereof fourſcore were gentlemen-volunteers and adventurers, moſt of them Sir Walter's relations; which number was afterwards encreas'd. Second, the Jaſon of London, 240 tons, and 25 pieces of ordnance; captain John Pennington vice-admiral, fourſcore men, one gentleman and no more. Third, the Encounter, 160 tons, 17 pieces of ordnance; Edward Haſtings captain: (no men more, except the maſter, mention'd) but he dying in the Indies, was ſucceeded in the command by captain Whitney. Fourth, the Thunder, 150 tons, 20 pieces of ordnance; Sir Warham Sentleger captain, ſix gentlemen, ſixty ſoldiers, ten land men. Fifth, the Flying Joan, 120 tons, 14 pieces of ordnance; John Chidley captain, twenty-five men. Sixth, the Southampton, 80 tons, 6 pieces of ordnance; John Bayley captain, twenty-five mariners, two gentlemen. Seventh, the Page, a pinnace, 25 tons, 3 rabnets of braſs; James Barker captain, eight ſailors. [d] But before Ralegh left the coaſt of England, he was join'd by as many ſhips more: ſo that his whole fleet conſiſted of thirteen ſail, beſides his own ſhip. [e] And tho' we cannot be ſo particular in the remaining part, we may yet learn thus much of it, that one ſhip, named the Convertine, was commanded by captain Keymis; [f] another, called the Confidence, was under the charge of captain Woolaſton; there was a ſhallop, named the Flying Hart, under Sir John Ferne; two flyboats, under captain Samuel King, and captain Robert Smith; and a carvel, with perhaps another named the Chudley, beſides. [g]

WITH the former part of the fleet Ralegh ſet ſail from the Thames on the 28th of March aforeſaid, [h] which was in the year 1617, and was ſoon after ready to proceed at the Iſle of Wight, when ſeveral little accidents fell out to retard his progreſs; for he ſtay'd there ſome days for Sir Warham Sentleger, whoſe ſhip, the Thunder, by the negligence of her maſter, was at lee in the Thames: alſo after Ralegh was got to Plymouth, captain Pennington was not come to the Iſle of Wight, and when he did arrive, was forced to ride back to London to engage the lady Ralegh to paſs her word for the money which was to redeem the bread for his ſhip, amounting to thirty pounds, without which he could not have gone forward; nor could Sir John Ferne proceed till Ralegh had ſupply'd him with a hundred pounds by his couſin Herbert, and procur'd him another hundred pounds of his friend Dr. Sutcliffe, dean of Exeter, having furniſh'd himſelf with a third hundred before he came from Wales. Ralegh tarried alſo for captain Whitney, who had a third part of his victuals to provide; and to aſſiſt him, Ralegh generouſly ſold his plate at Plymouth, notwithſtanding which, and Ralegh's having given him more countenance than any other of his officers, Whitney ran away from him at the Granadoes, and drew captain Woolaſton with his ſhip after him: Ralegh had further the patience to wait ten or twelve days for captain Bayley, which he afterwards ungratefully requited by deſerting alſo the fleet at the Canaries, for no apparent reaſon but Ralegh's refuſing him a French ſhallop he took in the bay of Portugal; and yet after Ralegh had bought her for fifty crowns, that the French might have no cauſe of complaint, Bayley might have had her if he had deſir'd it. [i]

"that time the king granted this commiſſion he was, by "Sir John Digby, treating a marriage between prince "Charles and the Infanta of Spain, upon terms of two "millions of money with her." But what put a ſtop to that match, may, in the ſame author, and others, be ſeen.

For theſe reaſons he was forced to linger ſome months at Plymouth, loſing thereby a fair wind, and indeed the ſeaſon of the year. The mean while he publiſh'd in May following, ſuch orders throughout his fleet, as gained him great applauſe, for the regularity and inſtruction they eſtabliſh'd therein. A gentleman of his company, in a tract he wrote of this voyage, having expreſs'd "how many ways Sir Walter Ralegh was moved to enterprizes of this nature "more than any other Engliſhman whatſoever; by his wiſdom and learning, variety of con- "ference, and experience of places he had formerly held; alſo how much greater his noble "ends have been than any man's whatſoever of our nation who had attempted the like courſes;" he proceeds "to the particular government of his fleet; which tho' others (ſays he) have in "ſome meaſure obſerved, yet in all the great volumes which have been written, touching "voyages, there is no precedent of ſo godly, ſevere and martial government; fit to be en- "graved in every man's ſoul that covets to do honour to his king and country in the like "attempts:" then exhibits "a copy of the ſaid laws, articles and commandments, which we "at this preſent (ſays he) obſerve;" and of which, it may not therefore be unacceptable, hereunder to preſent the heads. It was the end of June or the beginning of July, before all his company join'd him and he ſail'd from Plymouth: then being encounter'd with a violent ſtorm ſome eight leagues to the weſt of Scilly, in which captain Chidley's Pinnace was ſunk, and captain King driven into Briſtol, Ralegh held it, from experience as well as reaſon, the office of a commander of many ſhips, and thoſe of different ſailings and conditions, rather to take a port, and keep his fleet

[a] Bearing this title, Orders to be obſerved by the Commanders of the Fleet, and Land Companies, under the Charge and Conduct of Sir Walter Ralegh, Knight, bound for the South Parts of America or elſewhere. Given at Plymouth in Devon, 3 May 1617. They firſt enjoin, That divine ſervice ſhould be read morning and evening, or, if interrupted by foul weather, once a day. That all ſwearing and blaſphemy ſhall, after admonition, be fined. That no man refuſe obeying his officer in all things commanded for the benefit of the journey, or refuſe to wait his turn as directed, the ſailors by the maſter and boatſwain, the land men by their captains, lieutenants and others. Two captains of the watch in every ſhip to chooſe two ſoldiers every night to ſearch between decks that no fire nor candle-light be carried about after the watch ſet, nor burning in any cabbin without a lanthorn: Tobacco forbidden all men but upon the upper deck. Land men to learn the names and places of the ropes, to aſſiſt the ſailors upon deck. Sailors to be trained as they do land men, ſo that all may be eſteemed ſailors or ſoldiers, as there is occaſion: not to chaſe or board any ſhip without order of the general. To take nothing from any in league with his majeſty; but, in extremity, to agree for the price. Every night to fall aſtern the general's ſhip and follow his light, and receive inſtructions of the courſe to be held, every morning. If ſeparated by ſtorms, to open their ſealed billets, firſt on this ſide the North Cape if needful; ſecondly, at the South Cape; third, after 23 degrees; and fourth from the height of Cape de Vert. Upon diſcovering any ſail at ſea, either to windward or leeward of the admiral which he cannot diſcern, if ſhe be large and ſingle, to ſtrike main top-ſail and hoiſe it again ſo often as they judge it to be 100 tons burden, as if 200, to ſtrike and hoiſe twice, &c. Upon diſcovering a ſmall ſhip, to do the like with fore-top-ſail; but if many great ſhips appear, both to ſtrike the main-top ſail often, and hang out the enſign in the main top. If they go large before wind, to ſtand as they do, till it may be judg'd the admiral had ſeen the ſaid ſigns and ſtanding. But if you went large at the diſcovery, to hale the ſheets after a while, then go large again: ſo if they have their tacks aboard, and you yours aboard at the diſcovery, bear up a little and hale your ſheet off again, to ſhew us what courſe they hold. If you diſcover a ſail by night to windward of you, and you windward of the admiral, bear up to acquaint us: if you think you might ſpeak with her, keep aloof, and fire a piece to give us knowledge. None to fire any ordnance but in diſcovering a ſail by night, in danger of enemies, fire, or ſinking. If you fire by day we ſhall know 'tis to make a ſhip ſtrike, if by night we ſhall know you ſee more ſail than your own; if you think we hear not, in a quarter of an hour fire again. If you are in preſent danger by a leak, ſhoot two pieces ſoon after one another; if by fire, three in like manner. In foul weather every ſhip to fit her ſails to keep company with the reſt, and not to run ſo far a head by day but it may fall aſtern the admiral at night. If attack'd by ſea, the captain to appoint ſufficient aſſiſtance to the gunner, and, if needful, the cabbins between deck to be taken down; all beds and ſacks employ'd for bulwarks. Muſketeers of every ſhip to be divided under captains for the forecaſtle, the waſt and the poop. Gunners not to ſhoot great ordnance at other diſtance than point blank: officers to ſee no looſe powder be carried between decks near linſtock, or match in hand. Hogſheads ſawed in two, filled with water ready on the decks, and wet blankets againſt fire. Carpenters to be divided, in the hold and between decks, with leaden plates, plugs, &c. at hand. Proper numbers of ſailors to be appointed to every ſail under proper commanders: ſo that all knowing their charge and places, may do their duty without confuſion or noiſe, none being to ſpeak but the officers. No man to board a ſhip of the enemy without order. Every ſhip under lee of the enemy, muſt labour to recover the wind, if the admiral endeavour it; or if the enemy be to leeward, the whole fleet to follow the admiral or other leading ſhip within muſket ſhot of the enemy, giving ſo much liberty to the leading ſhip after her broad-ſide deliver'd and her ſail trim'd; then the ſecond ſhip to give her ſide; ſo the third and fourth all taking as the firſt, and giving the enemy the other ſide, ſhall keep him under a perpetual volley: And thus to the windermoſt ſhip of the enemy, till it be batter'd to pieces or forced up to intangle the reſt. If the admiral chace and is headmoſt, the next ſhip to take up his boat, unleſs otherwiſe ordered; the like to be done by thoſe that follow other chaſing ſhips. The divided Muſketeers not to deliver their ſhot but at ſuch diſtances as their commander directs. Ships to be kept clean between decks. Ordnance not cloy'd with trunks and cheſts. Proviſions to be delivered to the ſteward. Apparel to be in cloak-bags, except ſome few cheſts that will not peſter the ſhips. Fire-arms to be kept clean; if out of order, the officer to order the armorer to amend them. No feaſting or drinking between meals; or drinking healths on the ſhip's proviſion. Every captain, by his purſer or other officer, to take weekly accounts of the victuals. No candles to be delivered by the ſteward to any private man or private uſe. Whoever ſteals apparel, victuals, &c. to be puniſh'd as a thief and murderer. No man to ſtrike any officer on pain of death: private men ſtriking one another to be puniſh'd by court martial. Players at cards or dice for apparel, arms, &c. to be di arm'd and made ſwabbers. Cowards upon any landing or otherwiſe, to be diſarmed and made labourers to carry victuals for the reſt. None to land in foreign parts without order from ſome chief commander; and where they land, none to force either chriſtian or heathen women on pain of death. When landed in the Indies, not to eat fruits unknown, and ſuch not eaten by birds on the tree, or beaſts under it. Not to ſleep on the ground, or eat new fleſh till ſalted two or three hours. To ſwim in no rivers but where the Indians do, and to uſe them with courteſy. Other orders on the land to be eſtabliſh'd by general conſent when they ſhould arrive there. A flag on the mizen ſhrouds of the admiral, was to be the ſignal for ſummoning the officers to council. See a tract call'd, News of Sir Walter Ralegh, &c. 4*to.* 1618; from page 19 to 28.

together,

together, than to endanger the loſs of his maſts and rigging, or the advantage which enemies might take, or the loſs of more time in attending another rendezvous, by the danger of a ſeparation. Therefore he put into Ireland, and was oblig'd to ſtay ſeven weeks there: ſo that the winds only were to be accuſed now (as he obſerves) for their delay. And here, tho' by his credit he procur'd fifty oxen, which he diſtributed among his fleet, ſome of the crew ſpared not, at his return, to defame him with having taken care to revictual himſelf and none of the reſt. On the 19th of Auguſt he ſet forward from Cork. [a]

Arrives at Lancerota.

When he arriv'd at the iſle of Lancerota, on the 6th of September, Ralegh ſent a requeſt to the governor, that he might be admitted to treat for ſome proviſions: the governor ſent back word, that he would confer with Ralegh himſelf, if he would come attended but by one gentleman, and armed only with their rapiers. Ralegh taking with him lieutenant Bradſhaw met the governor, who agreed, that if he would ſend up an Engliſh factor, whoſe ſhip then rode in the road, whatever the iſland afforded ſhould be deliver'd at a reaſonable rate. Ralegh ſent the factor, but the governor procraſtinated, and at laſt ſent word, that unleſs he would embark his men which lay on the ſea ſhore, the iſlanders were ſo jealous they durſt not divide from one another to ſupply him. Ralegh comply'd, but when half his men were got aboard, the iſlanders began to offer violence upon the reſt. They ſlew one, and ſent the factor to tell Ralegh they would part with nothing to him, for that they believed his company to be the Turkiſh fleet which had lately deſtroy'd Puerto Santto. The Engliſh hereupon would have gone and helped themſelves, but Ralegh conſidering what diſpleaſure it might give at home, how the merchants might ſuffer, and the poor Engliſh factor be ruin'd, complained to the governor of the Grand Canaries; of whom he alſo deſired leave to take water undiſturb'd; but inſtead of anſwer, when he landed ſome hundred men in the deſart part of the iſland where they found freſh water, there ambuſh was laid, by which one of his men was wounded to death, and more had been ſlain had not captain Thornhurſt and lieutenant Hayman, two valiant gentlemen, ſeconded by Sir Warham Sentleger and young captain Ralegh, with half a dozen more, made forty of them run away. From this unavoidable fray, Bayley found pretence to turn tail and go home again.

At Gomera.

In want of water they ſail'd to Gomera, one of the ſtrongeſt and beſt defended of all theſe iſlands, and the beſt port. The Spaniards, being ſeated upon the very waſh of the ſea, roughly ſaluted the fleet at its firſt entrance with their cannon, and the Engliſh returned their ſalutation. But as ſoon as Ralegh recover'd the harbour, and commanded there ſhould be no more firing, he ſent a Spaniard he had with him, aſhore, to aſſure the governor he had no intention to make war with any of the Spaniſh king's ſubjects; and if any harm had been done by his great ordnance to the town it was their fault, who, by ſhooting firſt, gave the occaſion. The governor anſwer'd, he thought they had been the Turkiſh fleet aforeſaid; but having been certified they were chriſtians and Engliſhmen, and ſought nothing but water, he was willing to let them take what they pleas'd, if he might be aſſur'd they would make no attempt upon the town-houſes, or their gardens and fruits. Ralegh reply'd, that he would give him his faith, and the word of the king of Great Britain, his ſoveraign, that if the people of the town or iſland ſhould loſe ſo much as an orange or a grape by any one of his men without paying for it, he would hang him up in the market-place. And Ralegh kept his men in ſuch good diſcipline, that the governor in divers letters (for he wrote to him every day) acknowledg'd how punctually Ralegh kept his faith with him, in regard to the inoffenſive behaviour of his company; and alſo how much himſelf was beholden to him for his particular civilities. For his counteſs, who was of Engliſh extract, being a Stafford by the mother's ſide, and of the houſe of Horne by the father, having ſent Ralegh ſome preſents of fruit, ſugar and ruſk, he return'd others of greater value. [b] The earl moreover, gave him at his departure, on the 21ſt of September, a letter to Don Diego Sarmiento the Spaniſh ambaſſador in England, teſtifying how honourably Ralegh had comported himſelf to the Moriſco's in theſe Canary Iſlands during the fourteen days that he was among them. Before he ſet ſail, he diſcharg'd a bark of the Grand Canaries, taken by one of his pinnaces, coming from Cape Blanc in Africa; who complaining that his men had eaten of their fiſh to the value of ſix duckets, Ralegh gave them eight.

After having weather'd through a violent hurricane and ſome vaſt ſhowers of rain, beſides dangers no leſs fearful within; ſickneſs now beginning to viſit his ſhip, [c] he arriv'd on the 2d of

[b] Tho' the preſents Ralegh return'd to this governor's lady are not mention'd in his Apology, whence his progreſs hitherto is chiefly extracted, I find, in his own Journal aforeſaid of this voyage, that they conſiſted of an extract of amber, ambergreeſe, a fine cut-work ruff, a very excellent picture of Mary Magdalen, and a good quantity of roſe-water, which was of great value and eſteem in theſe parts.

[c] Whereof there died, his provoſt-marſhal W. Steed on the 21ſt of September; his maſter-ſurgeon Newball on the 29th;

At Bravo. of October at the iſle of Bravo: and here alſo underwent great hazards and hardſhips; beſides the ſickneſs daily ſpreading among his men. For whereas all thoſe who navigated even between Cape de Vert and America, were wont to paſs between fifteen and twenty days at moſt, he found the wind ſo contrary to him, and indeed to nature, ſo many ſtorms and ſhowers, that he ſpent near ſix weeks in the paſſage from hence; by reaſon whereof, and the burning heat of the climate, he was in great diſtreſs for water. Here loſing-anchors, cables and water-caſk, beſides two more of his company,[a] he was driven after two days, by a kind of turnado, from this iſland; which, as well as the others he touch'd at, before mention'd, he has well deſcrib'd in his Journal of this unfortunate voyage. After his return home, detraction did not ſpare to give out, that he went to Cape de Vert knowing it to be infected, and thereby loſt many of his men; whereas he was a hundred and ſixty leagues from that Cape, according to his own account, in his Apology; and had threeſcore men ill in his own ſhip before he came to Bravo, as we find it in his Journal; tho' if he had gone to that Cape now, after the rains which had fallen, there had been little danger of any ſuch infection. All places that lie near great rivers, in low and mooriſh grounds, do indeed, as he rightly obſerves, ſubject their inhabitants to fevers and agues; as even along both ſides of our own river Thames; and other infection is not found either in the Indies or in Africa, except when the eaſterly wind or breezes are excluded and kept off by ſome high mountains from the valleys, whereby the air wanting motion, ſtagnates, and becomes exceedingly unhealthful, as at Nombre de Dios, and ſome other places. But, ſays he, as good ſucceſs admits of no examination, ſo the contrary allows of no excuſe.[b]

Hence they proceeded, on the 4th of October, towards Guiana. But the ſickneſs reviſited and deſtroy'd many of thoſe whom the ſtorms ſpared, carrying off numbers of his ableſt men both for ſea and land, no leſs than forty-two of his own ſhip ending their voyage with their lives,[c] moſtly in this month, at leaſt before they reach'd the coaſt.[d] About the 12th of the ſame month, when their ſickneſs began to be at the height, and they at the greateſt diſtance from any ſhore, they were many other ways alſo diſtreſs'd; for when they began to be in ſcarcity of water, they were alſo becalm'd; yet ever threatned with extremity of tempeſtuous weather, from the ſtrange and unuſual alterations in the atmoſphere. One while the horizon muffled as it were in ſuch thick and fearful darkneſs, that they were forced to ſteer a day or two by candle-light. At other times, arched and overſhot with gloomy diſcolorations; ſo that watery rainbows were continually invading their eyes, or heavy ſhowers their bodies, and dead calms retarding their ſhips. Afterwards at Trinidad, Ralegh obſerved, beſides two water-galls, no leſs than fifteen rainbows in one day, and one of them bent as it were both ends together, making a perfect circle; and theſe were ever followed with wet weather; for as he alſo noted, eſpecially of the morning rainbow, it did not here produce a fair day, as in England.[e] But one good effect enſu'd, that when their water was ſo ſcarce, near the latter end of this month, that the ſhip's crew was reduced to half allowance, they ſaved ſome hogſheads, which fell from the clouds, and all quenched their thirſt with great cans of this bitter draught, as Ralegh deſcribes that rain water to have been. On the laſt day of this month, as he was raiſed abruptly out of his bed in a ſweat, by the noiſe which a ſudden great guſt had occaſion'd in his ſhip, he got a cold, which turned to a burning fever, and caſt him down for twenty days together; in which time he receiv'd no other ſuſtenance than a few ſtew'd prunes, but drink, every hour, both day and night; and ſweated ſo exceſſively, that he was forced to ſhift three times every day, and as often at night.[f] At laſt the violence of his diſeaſe was abated, by the oranges and other fruits he had received at Gomera of the governor's lady; which he had carefully preſerved in ſand to his great refreſhment; and without which, as he owns himſelf, he could not have lived:[g] But it was double the time before he could recover in any tolerable degree from this ſharp viſitation.

In this ſlow and ſickly manner they arriv'd at laſt, on the 11th of November, at the north

been in England three or four years with him; but he was removed ſo far up in the country, there was no purſuing him. [a] Therefore he ſtood away for Caliana, which is in 5 degrees, on the coaſt of Guiana, at the firſt diſcovery call'd Port Howard, [b] where the caſſique was alſo his ſervant, and had lived with him in the Tower of London two years. There he arrived in a day or two, having paſſed the iſland noted for its multitude of birds and ſilk-bearing trees, and from thence ſent for his ſervant Harry, the Indian, who, with other caſſiques, came and brought him great ſtore of Caſſavi bread and roaſted mullets, with plantanes, pinas, piſtacias, &c. But Ralegh ventured not to eat of the pinas, which tempted him exceedingly, till after a day or two's airing on the ſhore in a tent which was there pitch'd for him; then he alſo eat ſome armadillo and a little pork, and began to gather ſtrength. Here alſo he landed his ſick men, and recovered many; and here he buried captain Edward Haſtings (the lord Huntington's brother) who died ten days or more before, and with him his ſerjeant major, Hart, and captain Henry Snedale; the charge of whoſe ſhip Ralegh gave to his ſervant captain Robert Smith of Cornwall. [c] Here he alſo ſet up his barges and ſhallops which they brought from England, in quarters, cleanſed his ſhips, trim'd up his caſk, and ſupply'd them with water; fix'd up a forge, and made ſuch iron works as they wanted. Thus on that ſhore, and this river they employed and refreſh'd themſelves for about three weeks; during which time, Ralegh was very much careſs'd by the Indians of his old acquaintance aforeſaid, and the other natives of this place, who cheriſhed him daily with the beſt proviſions that the country yielded, and offer'd him all kind of obedience, even to the making him their ſoveraign prince and ruler, if he would abide and ſettle among them; ſo freſh continued his memory, and ſuch unanimous impreſſions of homage and reſpect had his former behaviour ſtill left upon them; which offer he mentions with the greateſt modeſty and indifference in the diſpatch he now ſent to England. For in this interval, captain Peter Alley, one of his company, who was much troubled with a vertiginous diſorder in his head, having got leave to return home, and the opportunity of a Dutch veſſel which lay there, Ralegh among other letters, ſent one by him to his lady, dated from Caliana the 14th of November. Herein, ſays he, "I cannot write to you but with a "weak hand, for I have ſuffer'd the moſt violent calenture for fifteen days that ever man did, "and lived; but God that gave me a ſtrong heart in all my adverſities, has alſo now ſtrengthned me in the hell-fire of heat. We have had two moſt grievous ſickneſſes in our ſhip, of "which forty-two have died, and there are yet many ſick; but having recover'd the land of "Guiana this 12th of November, I hope we ſhall recover them. We are yet two hundred "men, and the reſt of our fleet are reaſonably ſtrong, ſtrong enough I hope to perform what "we have undertaken, if the diligent care at London to make our ſtrength known to the Spaniſh "king by his ambaſſador, has not taught the Spaniſh king to fortify all the entrances againſt "us. Howſoever, we muſt make the adventure, and if we periſh, it ſhall be no honour for "England, nor gain for his majeſty, to loſe, among many others, an hundred as valiant "gentlemen as England hath in it." Then having ſpoken of Bayley's running away from him, the unnatural weather they had laboured through, and their tedious paſſage, with the preſent of fruits which had ſo much relieved him, as is before obſerved, beſides the death of ſome principal officers, and recommendation of himſelf to ſome friends in London, eſpecially his ſon Carew, he concludes thus: "To tell you that I might be here king of the Indians were a "vanity; but my name hath ſtill lived among them; here they feed me with freſh meat, and "all that the country yields: all offer to obey me." [d] At this time alſo, a gentleman of his company having drawn up a diſcourſe in praiſe of Guiana, and in honour of this adventure; eſpecially of the principal diſcoverer Ralegh himſelf, it being dated from Caliana November the 17th, ſent it alſo into England by the ſame bearer; [e] and it was printed the following year. [f]

At Caliana.

Offer'd to be made king in theſe parts.

On the 4th of December they left this river, and came next day to the Triangle Iſlands; [g] but were all in danger of leaving their bones upon the ſholes before they got thither. For they were laid aground, eſpecially Ralegh's larger ſhip, for the ſpace of twenty-four hours or more;

and had it not been fair weather, would never have got off the coaſt, having not above two fathom of water. Here, after a few days, when all the fleet was gather'd together, it being conſider'd in a general conſultation, that Ralegh himſelf who had grappled with the ſickneſs for ſix weeks, and was now rather ſo much relaps'd than recover'd, that he could not move otherwiſe than as he was carried in a chair, [a] they reſolved that there was no thoughts of his undertaking the paſſage up the Orenoque in perſon. And further, tho' they could never underſtand by Keymis, who was the firſt of any nation that had enter'd the main mouth of that river, nor by any of their mariners, who had traded there many years for tobacco, what certainty the water was of; yet having found by experience, that ſhips at eleven foot water, lay aground three days in paſſing up; therefore there was no attempting it with Ralegh's ſhip, which being heavier, and charged with near forty pieces of ordnance, drew ſeventeen foot. Nor would his ſon with the reſt have ventured, with the proviſions they had, through any other perſon's aſſurance or reſolution of ſtaying to relieve them at a place appointed, againſt the forces expected to approach, but that of his father and their general. [b] So it was reſolved by all, that the five larger ſhips ſhould ride at Punta de Gallo in Trinidad under Ralegh, to ſecure their retreat, and the five leſſer (for this was now the whole number of his fleet) with five or ſix foot companies of fifty men each, ſhould enter the river. According to this determination, the fleet was here divided; that is to ſay, captain Whitney in the Encounter; Woolaſton in the Confidence; King in the Supply; Smith in a Pink, and Hall in a Carvel. The companies had for their leaders, captain Charles Parker, and captain North (brothers to the lord Mounteagle and the lord North;) young Ralegh; captain Thornhurſt of Kent; captain Pennington's lieutenant, who ſeems to be another Hall, and captain Chidley's lieutenant, Prideux. Sir Warham St. Leger, Ralegh's lieutenant, who had the charge of theſe companies, fell ſick at Caliana; ſo it was confer'd on George Ralegh, Sir Walter's nephew, who had ſerved with great commendation in the Low Countries; and captain Keymis had the chief charge for their guidance and landing within the river. [c] But Keymis having laid down the plan of his intended attempt upon the mine, and undertaken to diſcover it with ſix or eight perſons in Sir John Ferne's ſhallop, Ralegh, upon conſideration, diſliking that method of proceedure, determined to alter it, and therefore gave him his inſtructions in the following words.

His Inſtructions to Keymis.

" Keymis, Whereas you were reſolv'd, after your arrival into the Oronoque, to paſs to the " mine with my couſin Herbert and ſix muſketiers, and to that end deſired to have Sir John " Ferne's ſhallop; I do not allow of that courſe; becauſe you cannot land ſo ſecretly, but " that ſome Indians on the river ſide may diſcover you, who giving knowledge thereof to the " Spaniard, you may be cut off before you recover your boat. I therefore adviſe you to ſuf- " fer the captains and companies of the Engliſh to paſs up weſtward of the mountain Aio, from " whence you have no leſs than three miles to the mine, and to encamp between the Spaniſh " town and you, if there is any town near it; that being ſo ſecured, you may make trial what " depth and breadth the mine holds, and whether or no it will anſwer our hopes. And if " you find it royal, and the Spaniards begin to war upon you, then let the ſerjeant-major re- " pell them, if it is in his power, and drive them as far as he can: but if you find the mine is " not ſo rich as to perſuade the holding of it, and it requires a ſecond ſupply, then ſhall you " bring but a baſket or two to ſatisfy his majeſty that my deſign was not imaginary but true, " tho' not anſwerable to his majeſty's expectation; for the quantity of which I never gave " aſſurance, nor could. On the other ſide, if you ſhall find any great number of ſoldiers are " newly ſent into the Orenoque, as the caſſique of Caliana told us there were, and that the " paſſages are already enforc'd, ſo as without manifeſt peril of my ſon, yourſelf and the other " captains, you cannot paſs towards the mine; then be well adviſed how you land, for I know " (that a few gentlemen excepted) what a ſcum of men you have, and I would not for all " the world, receive a blow from the Spaniard to the diſhonour of the nation. I myſelf, for " my weakneſs, cannot be preſent, neither will the company land except I abide by the ſhips, " the galleons of Spain being daily expected. Piggot the ſerjeant-major is dead, Sir Warham " St. Leger, my lieutenant, without hope of life, and my nephew, George Ralegh, your ſer- " jeant-major, now, but a young man: it is therefore on your judgment that I rely; who, I truſt, " God will direct for the beſt. Let me hear from you as ſoon as you can. You ſhall find " me at Punta de Gallo dead or alive; and if you find not my ſhips there, yet there you ſhall " find their aſhes; for I will fire with the galleons if it come to extremity, but run away I " will never." WITH theſe inſtructions thoſe five ſhips ſet forward, parting from Ralegh and the reſt of the fleet at the iſlands aforeſaid, with a month's proviſion, on the 10th of December.[a] But when they found a new Spaniſh town, call'd St. Thome, conſiſting of about 140 houſes; tho' lightly built, with a chapel, a convent of Franciſcans, and a garriſon erected on the main channel of the Orenoque,[b] about twenty miles diſtant from the place where Antonio Berreo, the governor taken by Ralegh in his firſt diſcovery and conqueſt here, attempted to plant; Keymis and the reſt thought themſelves oblig'd, through fear of leaving the enemy's garriſon between them and their boats, to deviate from their inſtructions, which enjoin'd them, firſt to carry a little party to make trial of the mine, under a ſhelter of their own camp; and then to deal with the Spaniſh town as it ſhould give cauſe, by permitting or offering to prevent them. So they concluded to land in one body, and encamp between the mine and the town;[c] whereby, tho' themſelves were ſomething ſtronger, their boats were ſubject to the ſame expoſure, and the mine left untry'd contrary to Ralegh's order. For, about three weeks after their departure, landing, by night, it ſeems, nearer the town than they ſuſpected, and meaning to reſt themſelves on the river-ſide till morning, they were, in the night-time, ſet upon by the Spaniſh troops, appriz'd of, and fore-arm'd for their coming, as we ſhall ſee. This charge was ſo unexpected, and ſtruck the common ſoldiers with ſuch amazement and confuſion, that had not the captains and ſome other valiant gentlemen made head, and animated the reſt, they had all been cut to pieces. But the reſt, by their example, ſoon rallying, made ſuch a vigorous defence againſt the Spaniards, that they drove them to a retreat, till in the warmth of their purſuit, the Engliſh found themſelves at the Spaniſh town before they knew where they were. Here the battle was renewed afreſh upon them, being aſſaulted by the governor himſelf Don Diego Palameca, and four or five captains at the head of their companies; againſt whom, captain Walter Ralegh, a brave and ſprightly young man, now twenty-three years of age, but fonder of glory than ſafety, not tarrying for the muſketiers, ruſh'd foremoſt, at the head of a company of pikes, and having killed one of the Spaniſh captains, was himſelf ſhot by another; but preſſing ſtill forward, with his ſword upon Erinetta, probably the captain who had ſhot him, this Spaniard with the butt-end of his muſket fell'd him to the ground, and after theſe words, Lord have mercy upon me, and proſper your enterprize, young Ralegh ſpoke no more. Hereupon John Pleſſington, his ſerjeant, thruſt the ſaid Spaniſh captain through the body with his halbert. Two commanders more of the Spaniards were at the ſame time ſlain, one by John of Morocco, another of young Ralegh's company: and laſtly the governor himſelf alſo loſt his life in the ſaid engagement;[d] which happen'd, as Camden reckons, the ſecond of January.[e] The leaders being thus all diſpatch'd, and many of their ſoldiers, the reſt fled and were diſper'd, ſome to ſhelter about the market-place, from whence they kill'd and wounded the Engliſh at pleaſure; ſo as they ſaw no way left to be ſafe, but by firing the town about their ears, and driving them to the woods and mountains, whence they ſtill keep the Engliſh waking with perpetual alarms.[f] Others were more careful to defend the paſſages to their mines, of which they had three or four not far diſtant, than they had been to defend the town itſelf.[g] But for the magazine of tobacco, which one writer, among other erroneous repreſentations of this voyage, thought might countervail the charge of it, could it with ſome other things have been preſerved,[h] it ſeems not to have been conſumed by the Engliſh; becauſe Ralegh had enough thereof ſoon after to have paid for the victualling of his fleet, if there had been occaſion, as himſelf has related.[i]

ALL obſtructions ſeeming thus removed, captain Keymis had now a fair opportunity to make what trial he pleas'd at the mine; and that he did attempt the diſcovery will appear by the conſequence, as his preparations do in the letter he wrote to Ralegh ſix days after the action aforeſaid, tho' it came not long after to his hands. Herein having open'd in as gradual and diſcreet a manner as he could, how gallantly his ſon fell in this exploit, and obſerved, that if

INDEED Ralegh had need of thoſe prayers, on his own part, at this time, not only in his ſickneſs, but even in the intervals he had of recovery; for here to give ſome account of him in this time of their ſeparation, we may obſerve, that he lay with the five larger ſhips under himſelf, captain John Pennington, his vice-admiral, one of the moſt ſufficient gentlemen for the ſea, that England has, ſays he; Sir Warham St. Leger, another valiant and worthy gentle-
At Punta de Gallo. man, Sir John Ferne, and captain Chidley of Devon, [b] moſtly at Punta de Gallo, and other ports about Trinidad, no leſs than a hundred and fifty miles from the reſt of his fleet, making the adventure up the Oronoque, yet in daily apprehenſions of meeting with the Spaniſh armada ſent purpoſely to lay wait for and deſtroy him; which it would probably have done, after the great ſickneſs which had ſo much weakned his men, and under this diſadvantageous diviſion of his ſhips, but that the enemy luckily waited for him in a wrong place. Beſides, it having been falſely rumour'd in his fleet, that he brought out of England twenty-two thouſand broad-pieces of gold with him, ſome of his crew traiterouſly conſpir'd to ſail away, while he was gone aſhore in his barge, to take views and make diſcoveries of the country, [c] which he was ſome-times wont to do, as at Terra de Brea, or the Pitch-land, as he calls it, from the bitumenous ſubſtance which ſo remarkably iſſues there, as he has well deſcrib'd; and when he travers'd ſome woods to ſeek the trees that yield that precious balſam whereof he got a ſmall quantity, which ſmelt like angelica; [d] ſo to have left him a prey to famine, wild beaſts, or the no leſs unmerciful Spaniards, by whom he might have been flea'd alive, as other Engliſhmen, who came but to traffick, had formerly been. Add to this the many provocations he received from the Spaniards who were in any of the ports where his men landed, only to exchange a few commodities for tobacco or other products of the country, not only by the moſt opprobrious language, but diſ-charging ſometimes a volley of twenty muſkets at a time upon them, whereby Sir John Fern, had ſome of his men kill'd. [e] And laſtly, the uneaſineſs he was continually in, that he could hear no tidings of the reſt of his fleet thus detach'd upon the adventure. And tho' ſome Indian ſpies were brought to him in the beginning of February, by one of whom, who could ſpeak the Spaniſh tongue, he was firſt inform'd, that the Engliſh in Orenoque were reported, by ſome Tivitivas he had ſpoken with, to have taken St. Thome and ſlain Diego de Palameca the gover-nor, with captain Erinetta, and captain John Rues; that the reſt fled, and that two Engliſh captains were likewiſe kill'd: Tho' the ſame was ſoon after alſo aſſerted, with other particulars, by another Indian; yet Ralegh would not ſet them down, till he knew the truth; which af-terwards endeavouring to compaſs of other Indians, ſaid to have been at the taking of that town, whom he ſent in purſuit of, they eſcaped, and he was not certified in the report, even near the middle of this month, for ſo far his own Journal extends. [f]

In the mean while Keymis made an attempt for the mine, and had ſet forward with captain Thornburſt, Mr. W. Herbert, Sir John Hamden and others; but at their firſt approach, near the bank where they intended to land, he received, from an ambuſcade of Spaniards in the woods (who had probably gather'd there with expectation of his coming that way to the mine) a volley of ſhot, which ſlew two of his company, hurt ſix others, and wounded captain Thornburſt ſo dangerouſly in the head, that he languiſh'd thereof three months after. [g] This blow firſt ſtagger'd the reſolution of Keymis, who then, as he reflected more upon the ſtate of their condition, was more over-power'd with doubts and diſcouragements; inſomuch that tho'

the Engliſh under him might have been informed of two or three mines more, beſides this which Keymis had undertaken to lead them to, by a Mulatto, who had waited on the late governor in his chamber, and, as he has written in his letter beforemention'd, knew all things that concern'd his maſter. [a] This ſervant, afterwards, by no other means than courteous uſage, diſcover'd the ſame to Ralegh himſelf; and not only the places where thoſe mines lay, but more particularly, that two of them, gold ones, were in the poſſeſſion of Don Pedro Rodrigo de Parama, and Hermian Frontino; and a ſilver one, in the poſſeſſion of Franciſco Faſardo; and that the cauſe of their remaining unwrought was, that they wanted Negroes to work them: for, by a law of Charles the emperor, the Indians could not be conſtrain'd, and the Spaniards neither would nor could endure the labour. [b] Yet did the Engliſh now decline all endeavour, either to be directed to theſe, tho' but few miles diſtant from the town, or proceed to poſſeſs that which Keymis was to conduct them to, tho' within a few hours march. Nay, when the ſhips were upon their return, and they had ſailed down the river as far as the country of Carapana, one of the natural lords, who had reſerved that part of Guiana to the late queen; and, having heard that the Engliſh had abandon'd St. Thome, and left no forces, as he hop'd they would have done, had ſent a great canoo, laden with ſtore of fruits and proviſions, to the captains; alſo by one of his men, who had learn'd the Spaniſh tongue during his long ſlavery under the Spaniards, had offer'd them a rich gold mine in his own country, to engage their ſtay; further proffering to leave ſufficient pledge for any Engliſh perſon they ſhould ſend to examine it; and, when captain Leak with another of the company, named Molineux, offer'd themſelves to go, the greater part nevertheleſs refus'd to ſuffer them. This declenſion of his offer, ſo heightned Carapana's deſire to make it acceptable, that he ſent again, leaving one of his men ſtill aboard, who entreated to detain them but two days, and Carapana would himſelf, aged as he was, bring them a ſample of the ore; who, tho' ſtill rejected, and the ſhips under ſail, yet ſent once more a boat after them up to the mouth of the river, in hopes to the very laſt of retrieving them, as the ſaid captain Leak, Parker, Molineux, and half a dozen officers more, are, by Ralegh, nominated to atteſt. [c] But the adventurers, among other diſſwaſives from all temptation to continue there any longer, harbour'd a notion that the Spaniards had ſecretly agreed with, and employ'd thoſe Indians only to trepan the Engliſh; which appear'd but a weak and ill-grounded apprehenſion to Ralegh; for ſuch treachery might have been eaſily prevented, had they waited the arrival of the old Indian chief, who would have brought the ore to their very ſhips. And what advantage in betraying them, ſays he, could there be, when the Guianians offered to leave hoſtages, ſix for one? Moreover, one of the Indians, whom the Engliſh found in fetters when they took St. Thome, and brought with them aboard, could have told them, that the very caſſique, who ſent to ſhew them the gold mine in his country, was unconquer'd and at enmity with the Spaniard; and could have aſſur'd them withal, that ſuch mines were in that country poſſeſs'd by the ſaid caſſique. [d] But no intreaty or invitation would retain them, and ſo they return'd, about the middle of February, to Punta de Gallo, after the fleet had been thus divided, and they abſent above two months from Sir Walter Ralegh, as himſelf has informed us; [e] whereby it appears, that the fleet united at, or very ſoon after, the time he diſcontinued his Journal; and it appears no-where in that Journal, that any inhuman offer was made to remove from Punta de Gallo to the Charibes, many leagues off, where he knew famine muſt over-take the land ſoldiers before they could over-take him, as his enemies ſuggeſted: [f] beſides, he cleared himſelf in ſuch a ſolemn manner of this aſperſion at his death, as leaves not the leaſt ſtain of cruelty any where but upon their characters who ſlander'd him with it. [g]

The fleet united.

'Tis poſſible that Keymis might, at his firſt return, be favourably received, and as familiarly admitted to Ralegh's table as before; [h] for a diſappointment of this conſequence was not to be too readily broach'd on one ſide, nor reprehended on the other. Beſides, as ſome mitigation of their ill ſucceſs, and inducement to further hopes, Keymis produced two ingots of gold which had been reſerved at St. Thome, as the king of Spain's quinto, or proportion; together with ſeveral other valuable ſpoils of the governor. [i] Keymis alſo brought with him a large quantity

[i] Among the reſt, one, that was more curious in its nature, than coſtly in its materials; being only a bottle made of a ſerpentine ſtone; but it had a rare ſoveraign quality of giving any wine or water infus'd therein for twenty-four hours, the taſte and operation of the Spa water, and to make the ſame of ſingular efficacy in expelling the gravel, and curing all diſorders of the ſpleen; for which it was highly eſteemed by Sir Walter Ralegh, and, ſeveral years after his death, alſo by Richard earl of Cork; who, having been made acquainted, by Sir Walter's quantity of papers, letters, memorials, ſchemes, plans and maps found in the ſaid governor's ſtudy; which gave ſome ſingular lights into the ſtate and condition of Spain, with reſpect to many of the American plantations. Among theſe papers were found four letters, which plainly diſcover'd, not only Ralegh's whole enterprize to have been betray'd, but his life thereby put into the power of the Spaniards themſelves; [a] and by whom, even to the breaking of that peace, if any was broken, for which he was afterwards exclaim'd againſt. Ralegh himſelf has related: [b] for he thought this ſuch black and cruel uſage, that he forbore not, in a letter which he wrote, about a month after this time, from the iſle of St. Chriſtopher's, to Sir Ralph Winwood, the ſecretary of ſtate, to ſhew his ſenſe of it in theſe words: "It pleaſed his majeſty to value "us at ſo little, as to command me, upon my allegiance, to ſet down under my hand, the "country and the very river by which I was to enter it; to ſet down the number of my men, "and burden of my ſhips, and what ordnance every ſhip carried; which being made known "to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, and by him ſent to the king of Spain, a diſpatch was made "and letters ſent from Madrid before my departure out of the Thames." [c] By the contents of thoſe Spaniſh letters it further appears, that three hundred Spaniſh ſoldiers, and ten pieces of ordnance, were commiſſioned to be ſent from their reſpective garriſons againſt the adventurers up the Orenoque; that is, a hundred and fifty men from Nuevo Reyno de Granada, under the command of captain Antonio Muſica; and another hundred and fifty from Puerto Rico, to be conducted under Franciſco Zanchio. There was alſo prepared an armada by ſea, to ſet upon Ralegh himſelf and the ſhips with him; "by which, ſays he, we had not only been torn to pieces, "but all thoſe in the river had alſo periſhed, they being of no force for the ſea fight; for we "had reſolved to have burnt by their ſides, and to have died there, had the armada arriv'd; but, "belike, they ſtay'd for us at Margarita, by which they knew we muſt paſs towards the "Indies." [d] In another letter, which he wrote the next day from the ſame iſland to his wife, Ralegh ſays, "Never was poor man expoſed to ſlaughter as I was." Then having related the particulars of the forces beforemention'd, ſent to deſtroy him, through the communication of his ſcheme to the court of Spain by the Spaniſh ambaſſador, he concludes this part with theſe words: "It were too long to tell you how we were preſerved; if I live, I ſhall make it "known." [d]

His enterpriſe betray'd.

But the indignation which Ralegh muſt have conceived at the ſight of theſe letters, was not a little heightned, when he came to hear that Keymis had made no actual trial at the mine, and the reaſons he gave for having relinquiſh'd it. He alledg'd indeed, that after the ſalley of the Spaniards upon them from the woody banks, which had diſabled ſeveral of his men at their firſt attempt to land, he began to conſider, they had not then able men enough left to work the mine; tho' indeed, it lay not ſo deep, as to need all thoſe pioneers and implements, which, in king James's Declaration, Ralegh is objected againſt for not carrying with him, as may appear by the firſt diſcovery of this mine, in the former part of theſe ſheets. Keymis alſo argued, they had not men enough to keep this mine, tho' they ſhould eſcape further danger in the difficult paſſage to it, which he feared much they ſhould not; the Spaniards being more careful to preſerve it, as was ſaid, than the town; and the ways to it, Aſpera y Fragoſa, as Ralegh has obſerved; agreeable to that infirtility and unaptneſs for cultivation, which Acoſta and other naturaliſts, have deſcrib'd in thoſe grounds which are impregnate with ſuch treaſures. Keymis urged further, that they wanted ſufficient proviſions for the number remaining, having been much longer up the page, with its virtues and value, performed ſeveral notable cures thereby, and at laſt made an acceptable preſent of it to Sir Henry Wotton, then provoſt of Eton-College, who was troubled with one, or both of thoſe infirmities. See the earl of Cork's Letter to Sir Henry Wotton, in Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, 12mo. 1651, p. 497.

[a] The king of Spain's firſt letter, ſent to Guiana by a bark of Aviſo, to arm the Indians againſt Ralegh's coming, was dated 19 March 1616, at Madrid (which letter, ſays Ralegh, in his to Sir Ralph Winwood, I have, here enclоſed, ſent you, the reſt I reſerve; not knowing whether they may be intercepted or not.) The ſecond of that king's was dated 2d of May 1617, ſent alſo by a caravel to Diego de Palameca, governor of Guiana, El Dorado and Trinidad. The third of his majeſty's, was ſent by the biſhop of Puerto Rico, and delivered to that governor the 15th of July following: and the fourth was ſent from the farmer and ſecretary of his cuſtoms in the Indies at the ſame time. Thus Ralegh's letter to Winwood (from St. Chriſtopher's) in his Remains (laſt edition) p. 172. compared with ſome manuſcript copies of it in the Harleyan library, &c. Others tell us, theſe advertiſements and preparations were the cauſe of all the reſiſtance that was made at St. Thome; that Ralegh's whole deſign, under his own hand, was delivered by king James to Gondomar; and that his own letter (thereof to king James) was found in the governor of St. Thome's cloſet; which letter he brought back, and ſhewed to the lords of the council. See Obſervations on Sanderſon's Hiſtory, p. 13. Thus alſo in the State-Trials, vol. 1. p. 219; and in Dr. Welwood's Memoirs, it is ſaid, Ralegh's plan, which king James promiſed to keep ſecret, was ſent by Gondomar to Spain, and thence to the Indies, before Ralegh left the Thames; and the very original paper was found in the Spaniſh governor's cloſet.

[b] Tho' Ralegh has charged this matter of betraying him to the Spaniards in plain terms, both in his letter to the ſecretary of ſtate, which follows as above, and in his Apology; one, or both of which king James had certainly read, it is yet obſervable, that this topic is not ſo much as touch'd upon in his majeſty's Declaration, but entirely ſunk in ſilence.

river than they expected; and that they could not carry enough from the town up the mountain, their company being divided, the greater part, in the town itſelf, and thoſe too weak to defend it. That he further found all regard to order and obedience broke through, as ſoon as captain Ralegh was dead; and feared the fatal news of his death, would either not find his ſick father alive, or haſten his end: that to attempt the diſcovery, and fail through any of theſe diſcouragements, he thought would be more detrimental than wholly at this time to decline it: that to diſcover it for a pack of profligates and mutineers, was more than they deſerv'd; and to diſcover it for Ralegh himſelf, not likely to live, and unpardon'd, was, as whiſper'd in the company, for a man non ens in the law. Above all that, it would therefore be a greater error to find it for the Spaniards, than to pretend it could no-where be found. Laſtly, that theſe arguments, approved of by the majority, were confirmed by the alarm they received at the diſcovery of the letters (aforeſaid) in the governor's cloſet; whereby they were led, every moment, to expect a freſh enforcement of the enemy againſt them from each end of the river; therefore ſeparate as the fleet was, and not able to make reſiſtance, they all agreed to return. [a]

However ſpecious theſe arguments, or ſome of them, might be, Ralegh was in no-wiſe pacified with them. He utterly diſavowed the whole conduct of Keymis before ſeveral of his company, and the ignorance he had pretended to them; told him, that a blind man might have found the place, by the marks and directions himſelf had ſet down under his own hand; and that his care of loſing more men in paſſing the woods was but feigned; for, after his ſon's death, it was known he had no care for any man ſurviving, and therefore, had he brought home but one hundred weight of ore, tho' with the loſs of as many men, it would have given the king ſatisfaction, preſerved his reputation, and encouraged a return the next year, with greater force, to have held the country for his majeſty, to whom it belong'd; [b] for the riches and fruitfulneſs whereof, himſelf had formerly ſo largely atteſted. [c] But ſince he had ſuffered his wilfulneſs, in ſpite of his knowledge, to defeat their whole undertaking, he ſhould indeed be glad if Keymis could make thoſe reaſons, for not opening the mine, paſſable with the ſtate, but that he himſelf could not juſtify the neglect. Keymis grew deeply diſcontented hereat, and continued ſo ſeveral days. "Afterwards he came to me in my cabbin (ſays Ralegh) and "ſhewed me a letter he had written to the earl of Arundel, excuſing himſelf for not diſcovering "of the mine, uſing the ſame arguments, and many others, which he had done before; and "prayed me to allow thereof." But Ralegh, no way ſatisfied, declared, that as Keymis could plead no ignorance, he could admit of no excuſe, being wounded in his credit with the king paſt all recovery, and that this could admit of no reparation. Keymis, ſeeing Ralegh reſolved not to favour his folly, retir'd as one knowing not what courſe to take, yet expreſſing, perhaps, alſo ſome deſign of giving further ſatisfaction; "and went out of my cabbin into his own," ſays Ralegh, where having ſhut himſelf in, Ralegh ſoon after heard a piſtol go off, and ſending up to know who diſcharg'd it, Keymis made anſwer, he fir'd it himſelf, becauſe it had been long charg'd. About half an hour after, his boy going into his cabbin, found him dead, with much blood by him, having a long knife thruſt through his left pap into his heart, and his piſtol lying by him; with which it appear'd, that he had ſhot himſelf, but the bullet being ſmall, and having only crack'd a rib, he diſpatch'd effectually with the knife. [d] And this, as I compute, happen'd about the latter end of February aforeſaid, or perhaps the former part of March, becauſe Ralegh mentions it in the letters he wrote this month into England, before refer'd to; therefore the death of Keymis could not happen in the following ſummer, as one author miſtakes. [e] And whereas ſome had given it out, that Keymis ſlew himſelf through remorſe that he had ſeduced and deluded ſo many gentlemen with an imaginary mine, Ralegh will not allow that to have been the cauſe; but aſcribes it entirely to his own poſitive and paſſionate temper, and ſays, that "he would not have laid violent hands on himſelf for any

And the Apology, p. 39. James Howel ſays, that captain Keymis, the main inſtrument for the diſcovery of the mine, piſtol'd himſelf in a deſperate mood of diſcontent in his cabbin in the Convertine; which not being Ralegh's ſhip, would remove Keymis's death ſtill further from all ſurmiſe that he had any ſuch foul play done him to prevent telling of tales, as Sanderſon and other prejudiced writers have maliciouſly inſinuated. The Obſervator on his Hiſtory of king James, calls it a baſe aſperſion; and Sanderſon, in his Anſwer, inſtead of producing any authority in his own juſtification, is for meddling no further with it; ſo refers to his Hiſtory, as a matter too large to be inſerted again. But what entirely clears the affair, is king James's Declaration; for had there been the leaſt ſhadow of ſuſpicion that Ralegh had been any way concerned in Keymis's untimely end, we may be well perſuaded, that Declaration would not have been ſilent thereof, which has amaſs'd and aggravated ſo many frivolous circumſtances in this voyage againſt him.

"man's

" man's opinion; nor when he did, adds Ralegh, could he have ſaid unto me, that he was " ignorant of the place, and knew of no ſuch mine; for what cauſe had I then to have re- " jected his excuſes, or to have laid his obſtinacy to his charge?" Further urging, " that " ſeveral captains," whom Ralegh names, " might be put to their oaths, whether or no, " Keymis did not confeſs to them, coming down the river, at a place where they caſt anchor, " that he could, from thence, have gone to the mine in two hours." [a]

AFTER this accident it was determined, in a council of the officers, to make for Newfoundland, to repair and refreſh their ſhips; but before, as well as after, they arriv'd there, great diſorders aroſe: ſome took to courſes of their own head, and ran away from him, as was before-mention'd; and many others proved ſo refractory and ungovernable, that, when he came to the iſle of St. Chriſtopher's, he was forced, under the conduct of his couſin, Mr. Herbert, to ſhip them home. Of whom, tho' he had ſhewed ſome uncommon generoſity to ſome of them, he ſays, in the letter he wrote from thence to his wife on the 22d of March, " I know they will not ſpare to wound me;" and further declares, " There is never a baſe " ſlave in all the fleet that hath taken the pains and care that I have done; that hath ſlept ſo " little, and travell'd ſo much: my friends will not believe them, and for the reſt I care " not." [b] In another letter he ſent from hence at the ſame time to Sir Ralph Winwood, he writes to the ſame ſenſe, and further adds: " But theſe being gone, I ſhall, ſays he, be able, " if I live, to keep the ſea till the end of Auguſt, with ſome four reaſonable good ſhips;" [c] for to that number was his fleet now reduced. By the time here propos'd of continuing at ſea, there might have now been thoughts of ſome courſe to qualify the miſadventure of the mine, and enable them to re-attempt it; perhaps by ſome little trading voyages: but how probable that he ſhould deſign any thing ſo far as the Eaſt Indies, or that with ſuch ſmall force he intended to go for the weſtern iſlands, to attack the Mexico fleet, and ſurpriſe the carracks, as in the king's Declaration is laid to Ralegh's charge, [d] we ſhall leave for others to decide.

At St. Chriſtopher's

'Tis plain that nothing of this was put in practice; for when they came to Newfoundland, the company in his own ſhip fell to mutiny, and thoſe who were for ſtaying abroad, whom Wilſon calls the major part, made Ralegh take an oath, ſays he, not to go home but by their allowance. [e] But the Declaration ſays, that the greater number were for returning to England; and that Ralegh getting on the ſea bank, put it to the queſtion; whereupon the voices divided, ſtarboard and larboard; and that when he perceived the greater number vote for their return, he went to that ſide and voted ſo too; [f] but manifeſtly to the hazard of his life was his voting on either ſide. [g] In the ſame Declaration we are further led to believe, he afterwards " offer'd " his own ſhip, which was of great value, to his company, if they would only ſet him aboard " a French bark, and that he made the ſame offer to ſome of his officers, when he was come " back to Ireland, as not knowing how things would be conſtrued, and being loth to put his head under the king's girdle;" [h] but he did, and we ſhall ſee the conſequence of it.

At Newfoundland.

BY the time that Ralegh arrived on the coaſt of Ireland, the ſacking of St. Thome, the firing of the town, and the ſlaughter of the Spaniards to the number of four or five hundred men, were largely deſcanted on by his enemies, as by his friends were his own more particular misfortunes in the long and dangerous ſickneſs he had endured; his diſappointment in the mine; the conſumption of ſo much treaſure; the loſs of his gallant ſon; the violent end of his old ſervant captain Keymis; and above all, the general diſorder, defection, and diſperſion of his whole fleet. All together, it became not ſo much a national as a univerſal topic of diſcourſe and attention; every one cenſuring or commiſerating as their intereſt or affections mov'd. It is remember'd, by Camden, that captain John North, brother to the lord North, a valiant gentleman, and who was much eſteemed by Ralegh for his faithful conduct under him throughout this voyage, was the firſt who related the deplorable news of this unfortunate expedition to king James, on the 13th of May, 1618. [i] He ſeems to have done it in a very juſt and pathetical manner; and it might have had a good effect, had that king's pity been as eaſily touch'd as his fear. Among authors, ſome, who had been for regiſtering this commiſſion of king James with that granted by Alphonſo king of Naples to Bertram his captive Moor, whom he entruſted both with his liberty, and a large ſum of money to buy him ſome fine horſes in Barbary, for which his jeſter gave him a prime place in his fool's chronicle; were now, upon the expectation of a return, ready, with the ſame jeſter, to blot out the king, and enroll the captive for a fool: but others look'd upon this action of Ralegh's in a nobler and more elevated light, and as what, for the integrity of acquitting his fiduciary pledges, was rather to be compared with the generous act of that brave Roman conſul, Attilius Regulus; who, to keep his promiſe and his faith, returned to his enemies, the Carthaginians, under whom he had been a priſoner; tho' he knew that he went to inevitable death. [a]

And now the Spaniſh ambaſſador having, by ſpecial advertiſements, gain'd the earlieſt intelligence of all that had paſſed at Guiana; and how, among the reſt, his own kinſman, the governor, had been ſlain, broke into the king's preſence in a turbulent manner, and bawling out for his majeſty's audience, only of one word, aſſaulted him with the abrupt and repeated exclamation of Piratas! Piratas! Piratas! At laſt he found breath and words to enlarge upon the matter ſo effectually, as what tended not only to the infringement of his majeſty's promiſe, but that happy union between the two crowns in their royal progeny, now the match between prince Charles and Dona Maria, with all the advantages it was pregnant with, was in ſuch a hopeful degree of maturity, even to the involving of both nations in the moſt durable and dreadful hoſtilities, that the pacific king of Great Britain was ready to do any thing in the world to appeaſe him, and huſh it up. To this purpoſe, his royal proclamation was forthwith publiſhed on the 11th of June; ſetting forth, that "Whereas we gave liberty to Sir Walter "Ralegh and others, to undertake a voyage to Guiana, where they had pretended a probabi- "lity of diſcovering gold mines, &c. We did, by expreſs limitation and caution, reſtrain "and forbid them from attempting any act of hoſtility upon any territories or ſubjects of "foreign princes with whom we are in amity; and more particularly, thoſe of our dear "brother the king of Spain, in reſpect of his dominions in that continent, which, notwith- "ſtanding, they have, by hoſtile invaſion of the town of St. Thome, &c. broken and "infring'd. We have therefore held fit to make publick declaration of our utter miſlike and "deteſtation of the ſaid inſolencies; and for the better detection and clearing up of the truth, "we charge all our ſubjects, that have any underſtanding or notice thereof, to repair to any "of our privy council, and make known their whole knowledge, that we may thereupon "proceed to the exemplary puniſhment and coercion of all ſuch as are found guilty of ſo "ſcandalous and enormous outrages." [b]

The next thing to be thought of was, a proper and plauſible inſtrument for the apprehenſion of Sir Walter Ralegh when he ſhould come aſhore; ſuch a one was Sir Lewis Stucley ſoon found to be (and not Sir John, as one writer erroneouſly chriſtens him [c]) who was vice-admiral of Devon (not lieutenant of the Tower, as the ſame negligent author miſtakes again.) One who, tho' Ralegh's countryman, and, as all others but Stucley ſay, his kinſman too, yet moſt officiouſly undertook that charge, through the ſorded proſpect of profit; "ſo unnatural, "ſays Wilſon, and ſervile is the ſpirit when it hath an allay of baſeneſs; there being many "others fitter for that employment." [d] However, his orders were to bring up this great malefactor in a fair and courteous manner, according to his majeſty's gracious and mild courſe, as it is call'd in his Declaration. And tho' we are told, by one, otherwiſe miſguided in his account of this expedition, by ſome diſtorted repreſentations of it in thoſe times, "That the "world much wonder'd, ſo great a wiſe man as Sir Walter Ralegh, would return to caſt "himſelf upon ſo inevitable a rock as it was fear'd he would;" [e] nevertheleſs, as we are aſſured, by captain Samuel King, an old officer of Ralegh's, who bore him company all this while, and has left us a particular Narrative of whatſoever occur'd in their journey from their landing now at Plymouth, to their final arrival at London, that he no ſooner put into the harbour, and heard of the proclamation aforeſaid againſt him, than he reſolved to ſurrender himſelf voluntarily into his majeſty's hands; and to that intent, both moor'd his ſhip and ſent his ſails aſhore the firſt day he landed; [f] which I take to have been in the beginning of July, and after he had been abſent upon this voyage a full twelve-month. Moreover, tho' he ſoon met here with ſeveral diſcouraging reports alſo, concerning the Spaniſh ambaſſador's ſtay at London only for his coming up, to proſecute him, as my ſaid manuſcript author has it; Ralegh ſtill continued firm in that reſolution. The ſaid ambaſſador is, in ſome common memoirs, ſaid to have been ſent for over to Spain at this time; and in ſome again, that his commiſſion was expir'd; but others think, that impatience to deliver the ſucceſs of his negotiations ſpur'd him away, according to inſtruction, when he had got full aſſurance that Ralegh ſhould be diſpatch'd at ſome rate or other; whatever he could ſay for himſelf: for he departed for Spain three weeks before Ralegh came to London, having left the remainder of his buſineſs in the hands of ſome eſpanioliz'd partiſans at court, whom he had made ſure.[a] However,

[a] Here, ſince we are to take our leave of this Don Diego Sarmiento, the following remarks upon him may not be thought very digreſſory, ſince they moſtly tend to the further illuſtration of Sir Walter Ralegh's ſtory. His firſt coming into England, tho' omitted by our imperfect hiſtorians of king James's reign, is remember'd, by Sir John Finet, in his Obſervations touching Foreign Ambaſſadors, to have been in 1613; being aged then, as I compute, from a date upon one of his pictures, 45 years. Therein he further appears with ſhort, thin, black hair, of a tall, meagre ſtature, with a longiſh viſage, and a cloſe, auſtere aſpect; which made his open and jocoſe humour ſo much more taking, that 'tis ſaid, he could perfectly raviſh the heart of our Caledonian Soloman, with the little jeſts, tales and fables he would ſo readily apply upon all occaſions. In the author aforeſaid, may be read this ambaſſador's weariſom ſcruples againſt the ſtate's ambaſſador, Sir Noell Caron, about right-hand and left, upper-hand and lower, chairs and ſtools, with ſuch like weighty and indiſpenſable points of honour among theſe ſoveraign miniſters. As to his carriage againſt Sir Walter Ralegh, it appears ſufficiently above, in the body of this narrative. But if he was related to that Don Pedro Sarmiento, a famous ſea commander, before mention'd to have been Ralegh's priſoner, that accident might ſomewhat ſharpen the ſaid ambaſſador againſt him; but much more this new one of Diego de Palameca's being ſlain at St. Thome, who was his near relation, as captain King tells us. However his perſecution of Ralegh appears with ſo much fury and intemperance throughout, as little agrees with that dexterity of management or circumvention which Oſborne calls the buſineſs of an ambaſſador; and for which, among other things, he thought this ſuch an incomparable agent. But indeed, it may not argue great ſtrength of abilities to carry a great ſway in the orb of government, no more than great ſtrength of ſinews to remove huge bodies in that of matter, ſo much as the great weakneſs or ſequacity of thoſe elements wherein they are centred or ſupported; and, as an ingenious writer obſerves, the power of the almighty is often evidenc'd by the weakneſs of the very inſtrument. There needed not the monſters of Afric to correct the ſins of the Egyptians, a ſwarm of locuſts could do it, and vermin formed out of the very duſt; and tho' a whole country were deſtroy'd by ſuch, will you argue, ſays he, they muſt needs have had the craft of foxes or the courage of lions? Some have intimated, that the Spaniſh ambaſſador could not, with all his worrying and baiting of king James, prevail ſo effectually for the deſtruction of Sir Walter Ralegh (how eaſy and tempting ſoever it might be to trample over the fence that is already broken down) but that he was forced to belabour the point with Spaniſh gold, among thoſe creatures who had the greateſt influence at court. For, as one writes, "The bargain was made, "and Ralegh was devoted for a ſacrifice before they knew "whether he was ſucceſsful or not; and, if we may "believe the accounts that are left upon record of that "part of hiſtory, the king of Spain gave a good ſum of "money for his head. Some have gone ſo far, as to "tell us who had the money, at leaſt a good part of it. "If this be true, the Engliſh court had in it, at that "time, ſome of the moſt infamous people that were "ever concern'd in any adminiſtration. As to thoſe "who reprove the king himſelf with it, I ſhall ſay no "more than this, they ought to have been very ſure of "the truth of it, before they recorded a thing of a "Britiſh king ſo much beneath the character of any "monarch in the world, viz. to take money from an "enemy for the blood of their own ſubjects, and of ſuch "ſubjects too as were moſt dangerous to the very enemy "they were ſold to; which is neither leſs nor more, "than ſelling their own ſafety, as well as innocent "blood." See An Hiſtorical Account of the Voyages and Adventures of Sir Walter Ralegh, 8*vo.* 1719, p. 38. However it was, the Spaniſh ambaſſador ſeems to have left the Engliſh court well ſatisfied on the 16th, and embark'd for Spain on the 20th of July 1618, having firſt emptied all the priſons in England of Romiſh prieſts, many of whom he carried with him home, further to grace his triumphs. Yet all true Engliſhmen conceived hopes that the late action under Ralegh at Guiana, and a tumult lately happening at the Spaniſh ambaſſador's houſe in Barbican, upon the murder of a boy, would fruſtrate the match. But this ambaſſador return'd to England in the beginning of March 1619, under pretence of purſuing that deluſive negotiation, and was lodg'd, not without murmurs, at the biſhop of Ely's houſe in Holborne. He was alſo trick'd out with titular honours, the uſual reward of ſuch ſervices as his were; being newly made Conde de Gondomar, as Sir John Finet obſerves; otherwiſe, in the whole, not ſo ſubſtantially rewarded at home, as the ſlaviſh pains he took abroad to pleaſe his prince was thought to deſerve. The train of his other titles may be read in a pamphlet, not long after his return, dedicated to him here, call'd The Spaniſh Engliſh Roſe; or Engliſh Spaniſh Pomegranate; by a moſt fulſom flatterer, named Michael Du Val, who has further bolſter'd him out, as well as Sir John Digby, newly created baron of Sherborne, (another precious promoter of the faid match) with ſuch extravagant additions of falſe honours, as both diſparage and diſcredit thoſe which were real. As for the pernicious practices of this Spaniſh ambaſſador in England, which might gain him thoſe airy gratuities, they are unfolded in another tract, entitled Vox Populi, or News from Spain; tranſlated according to the Spaniſh copy; which may ſerve to forewarn both England and the United Provinces how far to truſt to Spaniſh Pretences. Printed 4*to.* 1620, reprinted, thirty-nine years after, with the title of, A choice Narrative of Count Gondomar's Tranſactions during his Embaſſy in England; (in this edition, ſaid to be) written by Sir Robert Cotton. The editor, John Rowland, had no other reaſon for aſcribing it to this renowned antiquary than his having treaſur'd it up in manuſcript, and that he died heart-broken: whereas he was not ſo much as heart-grieved when the firſt edition was publiſh'd; tho' in the Second Part, hereafter mention'd, he is ſaid to have made heavy complaint againſt Gondomar. Nevertheleſs, the ſaid editor, Rowland, may have obſerved juſtly enough in his dedication of it to Sir W. Paſton, "That Gondomar, with his facetious "words and geſtures, could pipe king James aſleep; "that he did ſometimes hold the helm himſelf, and was "near running the ſhip aground, or to have ſplit her "upon the rocks: That the influence of his ill aſpect, "and eclipſing the ſun beams, is hardly over unto this "preſent age: That his ſucceſſor, Don Carlo Coloma, "was thought, by many judicious men, to be more "prudent; and that Gondomar was but a buffoon com-"par'd to him." In the treatiſe itſelf, Gondomar is repreſented in a Spaniſh council lately held at Aragon, and delivering his chief ſervices to have been, 1*ſt*, His working a diſlike between king James and his Houſe of Commons, perſuading him to rule by his prerogative; and as for money, to furniſh himſelf by the marriage with Spain and by domeſtick projects, without any ſubſidy: alſo that he hereby kept England from furniſhing its navy. 2*dly*, His ſhewing only a colourable reſiſtance of our Eaſt-India trade, as being rather hurtful than helpful to the ſtate, by carrying out our ſolid treaſures, and bringing home ſpice, ſilk, feathers and toys; beſides waſting our mariners. 3*dly*, His oppoſing our Weſt-Indian voyages moſt ſtrenuouſly, as what would raiſe another England to with-ſtand their New Spain in America; therefore that he croſs'd all the undertakings for Virginia and the Bermudas, cauſing the recuſants, who were ſharers, to withdraw their ventures and diſcourage the work. 4*thly*, That by this means likewiſe, he kept the voluntary forces from Venice, till it was almoſt too late to ſuccour them. 5*thly*, That he ſtickled hard for the Cautionary Towns, which the late king Philip called the keys of the Low-Countries. And 6*thly*, That the laſt, and not the leaſt ſervice he did was, in overthrowing Sir Walter Ralegh's voyage, and purſuing him, "I need not ſay almoſt to death, "ſays he, if all things hit right and all ſtrings hold." Further, that his commiſſion would not let him tarry to be a ſpectator of his execution, "which I deſired the rather "(ſays

However, before he left England, an excellent letter ſeems to have been written by Ralegh in his own defence, and conveyed to the king; which, as we have it in print, runs thus: "May "it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty, If in my journey outward bound I had my men "murder'd at the Iſlands, and yet ſpared to take revenge; if I did diſcharge ſome Spaniſh "barks taken, without ſpoil; if I did forbear all parts of the Spaniſh Indies, wherein I might "have taken twenty of their towns on the ſea-coaſts, and did only follow the enterprize I "undertook for Guiana, where, without any directions from me, a Spaniſh village was burnt, "which was new ſet up within three miles of the mine; by your majeſty's favour, I find "no reaſon why the Spaniſh ambaſſador ſhould complain of me.

"If it were lawful for the Spaniards to murder twenty-ſix Engliſhmen, tying them back to "back, and then cutting their throats, when they had traded with them a whole month, and "came to them on the land without ſo much as one ſword; and it may not be lawful for

"(ſays he) that by conceſſion, I might have wrung from "the inconſiderate Engliſh an acknowledgment of my "maſter's right in thoſe places, puniſhing him for attempt-"ing there, tho' they might preſcribe for the firſt foot. "And this I did to ſtop their mouths hereafter, and "becauſe I would quench the heat and valour of that "nation, that none ſhould dare hereafter to undertake "the like, or be ſo hardy as to look out at ſea, or "breathe upon our coaſt: and laſtly, becauſe I would "bring to ignominious death that old pirate, who is one "of the laſt, now living, bred under that Engliſh Virago, "and by her fleſh'd in our blood and ruin. To do this "I had many agents; firſt, divers courtiers, who were "hungry and gaped wide for Spaniſh gold: ſecondly, "ſome who bare him at heart for inveterate quarrels: "thirdly, ſome foreigners, who having in vain ſought "the elixir heretofore, hope to find it in his head: "fourthly, all men of the Romiſh faith, who are of the "Spaniſh faction, and would have been my blood-hounds "to hunt him or any ſuch to death willingly. And "laſtly, I left behind me ſuch an inſtrument, compos'd "artificially, of a ſecular underſtanding and a religious "profeſſion, as he is every way adapted to ſcrew himſelf "into the cloſet of the heart, and to work upon femi-"nine levity, who in that country have maſculine "ſpirits, to command and purſue their plots unto death." How much ſoever this may be called a fictitious ſpeech, it is founded on ſuch matters of fact, that Ruſhworth, and others of our moſt ſerious hiſtorians, have admitted the ſubſtance thereof as perfect hiſtory. The ſame year this pamphlet was firſt printed, there was written another, call'd Vox Spiritûs, or Sir Walter Ralegh's Ghoſt: being a Conference between Sir Gondomar, his majeſty's ambaſſa-dor of Spain; the Frier Confeſſor, and Father Baldwin the Jeſuite, at Ely-Houſe in Holborne, Nov. 20, 1620. For ſo I noted the true title to be, in a good old MS. copy of this conference, communicated to me, ſome time paſt, by Dr. Thomas Short, an eminent phyſician, at Sheffield in Yorkſhire. It has lately been printed in Phœnix Britannicus, from another good copy in the library of a very worthy gentleman, under the title of Proſopopœia: or Sir Walter Ralegh's Ghoſt, &c. but dated as tho' written two years later, which is a miſtake, as any one would ſoon find who is acquainted with the hiſtory of thoſe times. The purpoſe of this tract is, further to diſcloſe Gondomar's miſchievous tranſactions in England; as how he lull'd and deceived king James, perverted ſome noblemen to the Popiſh religion, and corrupted the prelacy to a toleration of Catholicks; how the navy was neglected; what money was expended upon one ſurvey, to know in whoſe poſſeſſion were the abbey-lands; how much a ſearch coſt of our harbours and havens; and how much to enumerate the well-affected to their religion: till the ghoſt of Ralegh riſing, detects their deviſes under theſe five heads. 1. The propagation of the Catholick religion. 2. The exaltation of the pope's ſupremacy. 3. The glorification of the Spaniſh monarchy. 4. The extenuation of the Low-Country's glory. 5. The abuſe of England's ſimplicity; and the whole, finally, to decry the match with the Infanta. In 1622, about Eaſter, Gondomar committed a groſs ſoleciſm in politicks, by ſuffering his ungovernable paſſion ſo to expoſe his leiger honour, by ſtriking William Lithgow, the Scotch traveller, whom he had long deceived with promiſes of reparation for the impriſonment, tortures, and robberies committed on him by the Inquiſition at Malaga, as may be read in the book of his Travels; that the ſaid ambaſſador got his ears ſoundly box'd by him before a numerous crowd of noble witneſſes. "His fiſtula, ſays Lithgow (meaning, "I think, his cane, tho' alluding to his diſeaſe) was "contrabanded by a fiſt; and for victory, favour lent "me authority." He was impriſon'd for it nine weeks in the Marſhalſea; "whence I returned (ſays he) with "more credit, than he left England with honeſty." In June following, as Camden tells us, Gondomar was re-ported to be impriſon'd in Spain, for ſo much promoting the match; and that the Infanta was to be marry'd to the grand duke of Tuſcany. Two years after, came out The ſecond Part of Vox Populi, or Gondomar's appearing in the Likeneſs of a Machiavel in a Spaniſh Parliament: wherein are diſcover'd his treacherous and ſubtle Practices to the Ruin as well of England as the Netherlands. Tranſlated out of the Spaniſh copy: Printed at Goricum, 4to. 1624. Dedicated to Frederick and Elizabeth, king and queen of Bohemia, and Maurice, prince of Orange, count of Naſſau; by T. S. of V. alias Thomas Scot, as the late Thomas Rawlinſon, Eſq; was rightly of opinion; with pictures of Gondomar, his litter, and bottomleſs chair, &c. "Herein (ſays the author to one of thoſe princes) you "ſhall perceive the curtain drawn from before the Spa-"niard, that the world may, for certain, ſee he is not "ſo beautiful as many of our Engliſh, who ſo long have "doated on him, would make him to be; nor on the "other ſide, ſo terrible that your Dutch need fear him, "how grim ſoever he looks upon them." It would be too tedious to recite the particulars of his deluding and defrauding the Engliſh nation recorded in this pamphlet; how he wreſted preſents and penſions from the Catholicks, no leſs than ten thouſand pounds from Sir Robert Cotton's friends and acquaintance; and from ſeveral ladies great ſums of money, to be repaid when Dona Maria arrived in England, or to prefer them at court under her; ſelling the place of groomeſs of the ſtole to ſix ſeveral ladies; and many other ſuch like profound acts of policy. But above all, that his compaſſing the ſecret of Sir Walter Ralegh's voyage and tranſmitting it to Spain, and pro-curing his death, drew the ſpecial notice and thanks of his royal ſoveraign, as the crown and maſter-piece of his negotiations. Much paper might be alſo employ'd in repeating the jeſts, ſtories, and ſayings of this Gondomar while among us, which have been treaſur'd up by ſome rare politicians of thoſe times; in moſt of which he was more witty than wiſe, expoſing in ſome his narrow ſpirit in matters of gratitude; and in others, frequently ridicul-ing the very religion he profeſs'd. Two years afterwards, the court was haunted with another pamphlet, call'd Sir Walter Ralegh's Ghoſt; or England's Forewarner. Diſ-covering a ſecret Conſultation newly holden in the Court of Spain. Together with his tormenting of Count de Gon-domar; and his ſtrange Affrightment, Confeſſion, and publick Recantation: laying open many Treacheries for the Subverſion of England, &c. 4to. Uitricht, 1626: which I ſhall here ſay no more of having before quoted it in theſe ſheets; nor of another book beſides, call'd Sir Walter Ralegh's Ghoſt; printed in 8*vo.* ſeveral years after; becauſe written on a ſubject which concerns not this ambaſſador. When Ralegh had ſettled his affairs in the weſt of England he began his journey for London, purſuant to his firſt reſolution: but before he came to Aſhburton, twenty miles from Plymouth, he was met by Sir Lewis Stucley; who ſaid, " he had orders for arreſting him and " his ſhip." Ralegh anſwer'd, " he had ſaved him the labour, and done it to his hands." And tho' at that time Stucley had no warrant, as our MS. author aforeſaid goes on, for ſuch arreſt, either from the king, or the lords of the council, " for it ſeems that his haſte was ſo great, " and his heart ſo ſet upon ſome ſuppoſed purchaſe, that he could not ſtay for a warrant;" [b] yet Ralegh, being told by him, that he had ſuch a verbal commiſſion from the ſecretary, did in no wiſe reſiſt even that authority. So they went back together to Plymouth, and lay at Sir Chriſtopher Harris his houſe; where Sir Walter Ralegh was ſo little watch'd, that he was ſometimes two or three days without ſeeing Sir Lewis Stucley. And Ralegh himſelf ſays, that Stucley left him nine or ten days to go where he liſted, while he rode about the country. [c] However, as we learn from captain King, it did, at laſt, come into Ralegh's mind (whether upon ſome private advices, how inſuperably the prejudice of his enemies was working againſt him; or any ſuggeſtions of his own, how he might work a reconciliation more ſucceſsfully from abroad, it is not ſaid, but contrive he did) to convey himſelf out of the kingdom. Therefore, while they were at Plymouth, he employ'd our author, the ſaid captain King to provide him a bark that would carry him over into France. King James's Declaration ſays, Ralegh dealt for a bark, as for a friend, and proffered twelve crowns for the paſſage: [d] Stucley ſays, he dealt with two captains of French barks: [e] the Declaration ſays, Ralegh was then under no guard, and Stucley, that he was then under his keeping. But leaving theſe inconformities to others, I here follow captain King, who informs us, that himſelf procur'd the veſſel, which is moſt likely, and that he detain'd it nigh four days, riding at anchor beyond command of the fort. The firſt night, about one of the clock, they ſecretly took boat to have gone aboard, but before they reach'd the bark, Ralegh, whether through ſome more prevailing thought that might ariſe of a generous reliance upon the king, or a more confident dependance upon the juſtice of his cauſe, or for any thing he left behind, or would have firſt left either in writing or otherwiſe, does not yet appear; but certain it is he changed his reſolution, and returned to his lodging unſuſpected by any one. The next day, he ſent money to the maſter of the bark, to retain him one night more; and yet Ralegh never went nigh him afterwards.

It has been objected, as captain King goes on, (who does not ſay by whom, but I find it in the king's Declaration [f]) that Ralegh was obliged to return, becauſe the night was ſo dark that he could not find the veſſel. " but I (ſays the captain) who was with him, will take my " oath, that if he had been only willing to have rowed a quarter of a mile farther, he might " have ſeen her. Beſides, if that night would not have ſerved, one of the other three would, " the wind being fair, and the tide falling out conveniently.

AFTER this, ſays captain King, Stucley received a warrant to bring up Sir Walter Ralegh, but with no more ſpeed than his health would permit; and he took to his aſſiſtance, one Manourie, a French quack, " upon what occaſion (ſays King) I here willingly omit, as well " becauſe I would not meddle with any inſtrument of ſtate, as becauſe I, little ſuſpecting what " followed, was ſomewhat careleſs in the obſervance of their carriage."

IN their journey they baited and lodg'd at divers gentlemen's houſes of Ralegh's acquaintance upon the road, from ſome of whom hearing, more diſtinctly the nearer he approach'd it, what a ſtorm his enemies had brew'd at court, he began to regret his having neglected the opportunity he had at Plymouth of retiring; which he diſcourſed of to his lady and to me, ſays captain King, who told him, " He could blame none but himſelf." But after that peremptory warrant which a purſuivant brought down for the ſpeedy bringing up of his perſon, he began again to meditate upon a retreat; tho', as he grew more deſirous, it grew more difficult. Therefore, when he had made ſuch inland advancement on his journey as to have no means left that would favour him by water, " He once more employed me (ſays captain King) who " was always ready to do any thing that might procure his ſafety; being well aſſur'd in my " own conſcience, tho' he ſought to abſent himſelf till the Spaniſh fury was over, yet, as he " always ſaid, That no miſery ſhould make him diſloyal to his king or country. And altho' " Manourie, in his Declaration, ſets down that Sir Walter Ralegh ſhould, to him in private, " ſpeak ill of his majeſty; yet I muſt proteſt till my laſt hour, that in all the years I followed " him, I never heard him name his majeſty but with reverence: I am ſorry the aſſertion of " that man ſhould prevail ſo much againſt the dead."

The particulars of captain King's employment for this ſecond eſcape, we ſhall reſpite a while, to make way for thoſe, which, according to the due courſe of time, muſt now be recur'd to out of that Frenchman's Declaration, as captain King calls it above, and ſhall do it with ſuch juſtice as not to omit or diſguiſe any of the ill words, againſt his majeſty, aſcribed to Ralegh therein. But can only do it from that which was ſuffer'd to appear after Ralegh's death, annexed to king James his Declaration; and thereby chuſe rather to hazard a treſpaſs upon the patience of ſome readers, who may think it a detail of improbable, at leaſt inſignificant objections, than incur the cenſure of partiality from others in omitting it; ſince king James, and conſequently his council, thought it would paſs for matter of ſuch importance, by their making it ſo great a part of what was hoped would juſtify his proceedings againſt Ralegh; and of ſuch authority, as to need no other evidence: not that it is there too expreſſively or poſitively call'd Manourie's Declaration, or his confeſſion or examination upon oath, but by a pretty, light, pliable phraſe, 'tis ſaid, " The ſtory himſelf reporteth to have paſs'd in this manner."

UPON Saturday, the 25th of July, Sir Walter Ralegh, Sir Lewis Stucley, and the ſaid Manourie went to lie at Mr. Drake's, where the letters of commiſſion from the privy council were brought to Sir Lewis Stucley, and that Ralegh hereat changing countenance, exclaimed with an oath, Is it poſſible my fortune ſhould return upon me thus again? This haſtening their departure, they advanc'd on Sunday morning nearer to London about four miles, and baited at Mr. Horſey's. That here Ralegh firſt cauſed Manourie to be ſounded what was in his heart (ſuſpecting, apparently, that he was deſigned as a ſpy over him) by his old domeſtick, captain King; who, diſcourſing Manourie upon Ralegh's calamities, ſaid, I wiſh we were all at Paris. Manourie anſwer'd, I would we were all at London; what ſhould we do at Paris? Becauſe, ſaid King, as ſoon as we come to London, they will commit Sir Walter to the Tower, and cut off his head. Manourie ſaid, he hoped better things, and that, according to his ability, he was ready to do him all honeſt ſervice. After dinner they ſet forward for Sherborne; and here Ralegh is ſaid to tell Manourie, All that was his, and the king had unjuſtly taken it from him. Manourie, and Ralegh's retinue lay in the town that night; but Ralegh himſelf and Stucley, at old Mr. Parham's. On Monday they got to Salisbury, where, as Ralegh was walking on foot down the hill, and had found, by enquiry, that Manourie had got ſome phyſick about him, he deſired him to prepare a vomit againſt morning. " For I know," ſaid he, (as he is here repreſented, with a ſurpriſing faith already in ſuch a man) " 'twill " be good to evacuate bad humours; and by this means, I ſhall gain time to work my friends, " order my affairs, and perhaps pacify his majeſty: otherwiſe, as ſoon as I come to London, " they'll have me to the Tower, and cut off my head, which I cannot eſcape without counterfeiting ſickneſs, which your vomits will effect without ſuſpicion." Accordingly that, at Salisbury, he complained of a dimneſs of ſight, with a dizzineſs in his head; and, when he was conducted towards his chamber, that he ſtagger'd, and ſtruck himſelf with ſuch violence againſt a pillar in the gallery, as made Stucley think he was ſick indeed; and in that belief, Manourie left him for that time. On Tueſday morning, Ralegh ſent his lady with the greateſt number of his ſervants forwards to London; and now it was he alſo ſent captain King thither, on the expedition aforeſaid (whom we ſhall meet with there, prepared for the ſame, as ſoon as Manourie is brought to an end of this ſame ſtory.) Then comes a ſervant of Ralegh's, into Stucley's chamber, and declares his maſter was out of his wits, that he left him in his ſhirt, upon all four, ſcratching and gnawing the ruſhes on the planks. Stucley ſent Manourie, who found him in bed; and aſking "what he ail'd?" he anſwer'd, "Nothing; "but that he did it on purpoſe." That then Ralegh aſked for the vomit, and took it without any heſitation. At Stucley's entrance, that he fell a raving; and, before his vomit operated, had ſuch ſtrong convulſions upon him, that Stucley, and all the help he could get, were not ſtrong enough to prevent the contraction of his ſinews as faſt as the company could draw them ſtraight, inſomuch that Stucley cauſed him to be chaf'd and fomented, but that Ralegh, truly, afterwards laugh'd at it to Manourie, and ſaid (ſuch a confident is he now grown!) he had made Stucley a perfect phyſician.

In the next place, Ralegh muſt be obſerved to take ſome repoſe; ſo Manourie is ſhut into the room with him, and having diſſuaded him from a more violent vomit, becauſe his firſt did not yet work, Ralegh aſk'd, if he knew not of ſome preparation which would make him look ghaſtly and irkſome outwardly, and not affect the vitals, or make him inwardly ſick. After a pauſe, Manourie aſſur'd him he could furniſh him with a harmleſs ointment, which would yet ſoon make him all over like a leper. "Whereby, we are told, Ralegh ſaid, "the "lords would be afraid to approach him, and that it would move their pity beſides." Soon after he had been thus anointed on the brows, arms and breaſt, the bliſters roſe ſo ſucceſsfully, and ſo ſoon ripen'd to their full diſcolourations, that Stucley, at his next viſit, perceiving Ralegh's body all broke out in purple ſpots with yellow heads, and the reſt of his ſkin ſo inflamed with heat, concluded he was ſtruck over with the plague, and that it was highly contagious. But aſking Manourie's opinion, he truly concealed all, for that, as yet, he knew nothing of Ralegh's intended flight; but thought it was only to gain time to ſatisfy his majeſty. However, away went Stucley to the grave biſhop Andrewes, then upon the point of his tranſlation to Wincheſter, and ſoon made known what a frightful figure Sir Walter Ralegh was become; deſcribed all the tokens upon him, and, in the end, return'd with two doctors, and one batchelor of phyſick. All their ſkill could not enlighten them with one ſpark of knowledge in the nature of his diſtemper; but they gave their opinion in writing, that the patient could not be removed into the air without manifeſt hazard of his life; and Manourie ſet his hand to it.

Here, Ralegh is deſcrib'd to have been much delighted that matters went on ſo proſperouſly, eſpecially that the vomit worked ſo thoroughly in the preſence of theſe learned doctors. But having apprehended they would inſpect his water, he directed Manourie to rub the urinal with a certain drug, which turned all to ſuch a diſmal colour, and ſuch a diſagreeable ſcent, that if heaven did not preſcribe, the patient muſt periſh; for nothing could the phyſicians do but pronounce the diſeaſe mortal. Further, that he then made Manourie bind his arm about with the black ſilk ribband which he took from his poniard; but that not diſtempering his pulſe agreeable to expectation, he had more bliſters raiſed the next day. By this time his phyſick having opened his ſtomach and made him hungry, he got Manourie ſecretly to buy a leg of mutton and three loaves, which he fed upon in private, and by this ſubtilty, was thought to have faſted three days, that is to Friday the laſt of July, ever feigning great indiſpoſition and uneaſineſs in company; but when alone, for to get the opportunity of being ſo was the chief ſource of all the artifice he did here really put in practice, he wrote his declaration or Apology, and is ſaid to have got Manourie to make him a tranſcript of it; which was, as the penman of this ſtory further ſays, ſince preſented to his majeſty. But by an expreſſion of that ambiguity and latitude, whether we are deſigned to underſtand it was before or after Ralegh's death; that penman, intelligent enough in other parts of Manourie's ſaid ſtory, and the reſt of the king's Declaration (for they were both of them viſibly caſt in one mould) might think it not neceſſary to be ſo here. It was ſurely a moſt vexatious ſtratagem, that Ralegh ſhould unexpectedly make ſuch a provoking vindication of his voyage, and thereby defeat the preparations that were were making to cut him off for it: but however it may, in the opinion of posterity, have cleared his innocence; among his contemporaries, it could not secure his safety.

The same night, as the story goes on, apparently to raise inflammations beyond his own person, he insinuated to Stucley, that he thought he had taken poison at Mr. Parham's, for that he was a Papist, and kept a priest in his house; but desired, and particularly to Monsieur, that it might not be spoken of. A while after, being in his bed-chamber undress'd, and no body present but his friend Manourie, he is said to have taken a looking-glass in his hand to admire his spotted face, and to have merrily observed to his said confident, how they should one day laugh for having thus cozen'd the king, council, physicians, and Spaniards and all.

On the first of August, being the day that the king arrived in his progress at Salisbury, Ralegh is said to have taken Manourie in private, and having open'd a red leather trunk, put into his hand nine pieces of Spanish gold, saying, "There is twenty crowns in pistolets, "which I give you for your physical receipts, and the victuals you bought me: and I will "give you fifty pounds a year if you will do what I tell you; and if Sir Lewis Stucley asks "what conference you have had with me, tell him that you comfort me in my adversity, "and that I make you no other answer than what is here written," giving him a piece of paper containing these words, "Ve la, M. Manourie, l'acceptance de tous mes travaux; perte "de mon estate, et de mon fils; mes maladies et douleurs: Ve la, c'effect de ma confience au "roy." [b] Which paper of Ralegh's own hand-writing, was afterwards produced by Manourie.

And now Ralegh is pretended to practise more unreservedly still about the escape with Manourie, as being all in his power to aid him, and he the only person trusted by Stucley. Whereupon he proposes, that Ralegh, at his coming to London, should lie perdue at a friend of Manourie's in Shire-Lane, which did not long engage his approbation, for Ralegh resolved otherwise; telling this only person trusted by Stucley (through an incredible profuseness of communication) "that he had sent captain King to hire him a bark below Gravesend, which "would go with all winds, and another little boat to carry him to it." Adding, that "to "hide himself in London, he should be always apprehensive of a discovery by the general "searchers that are there; but that to escape, he must get leave to go to his own house, and "being there, he would so handle the matter as to slip from Stucley through a back-door into "the boat with ease; for no body would dream he could go on foot, seeing him so feeble as "he seemed to be." Then that Manourie should say, "Why would you fly? your Apology "and your last declaration, do they not sufficiently justify you?" and that Ralegh should silence him with, "Tell me no more; a man that fears, is never secure."

In the next place, Ralegh is said to have procur'd the king's licence to be at his own house when he should come to London: and that when Manourie hereupon observed, his majesty seemed not inclin'd to take away his life, since he suffer'd him to repair to his own habitation for the recovery of his health; that Ralegh should reply, "They used all these kinds of flatteries "to the duke of Biron, to draw him fairly into prison, and then they cut off his head." Adding, "I know they have concluded among them, it is expedient that a man should die to re-assure "the traffick which I have broken with Spain." Thereupon, says our story, he broke forth into the most hateful and traiterous words against the king's own person (but it surprisingly

[a] Sir Walter Ralegh's Apology for his Voyage to Guiana, was not publish'd, that I can find, before 1650, and then commonly annexed to his Select Essays, printed in 8*vo.* the same year, where it contains 58 pages. But in Henry Hexam's Tongue-Combat between two Soldiers in the Gravesend Tilt-boat, 4to. 1623, p. 75, &c. it is quoted as a piece then well known, in manuscript at least, if not in print. And T. Chaloner must have had a knowledge of this Apology, or of Ralegh's Journal, when among the verses prefix'd to T. Gage's Survey of the West-Indies, Fol. 1648, he said,

Renowned Ralegh twice did undertake
With labour great, and dangers not a few,
A true discovery of these parts to make,
And thereof wrote both what he saw and knew.

This Apology was afterwards reprinted with the Essays abovementioned in 1667. And again with the Abridgment of Ralegh's History of the World, 8vo. 1700. But neither of the printed editions is so correct, in names, places, numbers, &c. as some manuscripts, in being, might probably have render'd them; particularly one copy presented to the library of St. John's college, Cambridge, by the learned and reverend Mr. Thomas Baker; containing 22 pages in a small hand, folio. This is dated two days after Ralegh's death, and sent by way of letter, from one who had long somewhat inwardly known him, to a friend; which particular we have not in the printed copies; but it begins as those in print do, with these words, If ill success of this enterprize of mine had been without example, &c. There is also a good old copy or two of this Apology among Sir Hans Sloane's MS. collections, mark'd, in his library, A. 271, and B. 521. Other manuscripts there are also of it in other libraries of the learned. As to the character of it, no more need be said than in captain King's words, where he "refers "those who would be satisfied about this voyage, to an "Apology written by Ralegh himself, in which he hath "faithfully and truly set down (says he) all the passages "thereof."

[b] As much as to say, "Behold there, M. Manourie, "the fruit of all my toils; the loss of my fortune and "of my son, the sickness I have endured and the sor-"rows: behold there, the effect of that faith I repo-"sed in his majesty." But behold where? ——for that ve la or voila, repeated as it is, plainly points at some more copious or convincing evidence which accompanied this expression, and more particularly demonstrated those losses and afflictions to have been the fruit of Ralegh's trust or faith in the king; to which these words appear but a bare direction; and which therefore seems here to have been suppress'd.

omits them all to object only his) ending with this improbable rant, " that if he could but " ſave himſelf for this time, he would plot ſuch Plots as ſhould make the king think himſelf " happy to ſend for him again, and reſtore him to his eſtate with advantage; yea, and would " force the king of Spain to write into England in his favour."

NAY, when Manourie (as we are further perſuaded) ſhewed ſuch care and concern for Stucley as to aſk, what would become of him if Ralegh eſcap'd? Whether he would be put to death, or loſe his office and eſtate? Ralegh is ſaid to anſwer, " Not to death; but he would " be impriſon'd for a while, yet his lands were aſſured to his eldeſt ſon, and for the reſt it was " no part of his care." Then Manourie aſks, if it were not treaſon in himſelf to be aiding to his eſcape? " No; anſwers Ralegh, you are a foreigner. However, if you pretend to know " any thing, they'll put you in priſon." " But what if I am diſcover'd to have a hand in " your eſcape?" ſays t'other. " Why follow me into France, your own country, replies " Ralegh; quit all and I will make amends for all."

As they travell'd, between Andover and Stains, Manourie, as this ſtory that is aſcrib'd to him acknowledges, diſcovered Ralegh's intended eſcape to Stucley, who thenceforth uſed extraordinary diligence in guards and watches upon him, which Ralegh perceiving, as it is alſo own'd, nevertheleſs truſts Manourie with a new propoſal at Stains in theſe words; " I ſee it is not poſſible to " eſcape by our two means alone, Stucley is ſo watchful, and ſets ſuch ſtrict guard upon me, " and will be too hard for us with all our cunning; therefore there is no way but to make him " of our council; and if we can perſuade him to let me ſave myſelf, I will give him in hand " the worth of two hundred pounds ſterling." Upon theſe words, he drew forth and ſhewed Manourie a jewel made in the faſhion of hail, powder'd with diamonds, having a ruby in the middle, valued at a hundred and fifty pounds ſterling; and putting it into his hands ſaid, " Beſides this jewel, he ſhall have fifty pounds in money: pray tell him as much from me, " and perſuade him to it, I know he will truſt you."

THIS overture being made by Manourie, Stucley, after ſome parley, ſent back word by him to Ralegh, " that he would accept of his offer, and bad him tell Ralegh he was " content to do as he had deſired: but would chuſe rather to go with him than tarry behind " with ſhame and reproach;" directing Manourie further to aſk, " how this could be done " without loſing his office of vice-admiral, which coſt him ſix hundred pounds; alſo to " what place they ſhould go, how they ſhould live afterwards, and what means he would " carry with him to furniſh this intended eſcape?" Ralegh obviates all this with praying him to tell Stucley, " that if he would ſwear unto him not to diſcover him, he would tell him his " whole intent; and that for the firſt point, tho' Stucley were to loſe his office, he ſhould yet " be no loſer; that as ſoon as he was got into France or Holland, his wife was to ſend him " a thouſand pounds; and that he ſhould carry with him only a thouſand crowns in money " and jewels to ſerve at preſent." After ſupper, Ralegh is further repreſented ſo open, ſo contrary to all his former character, and beyond all manner of belief, as to ſay, " O if I " could eſcape without Stucley, I ſhould do bravely; but its no matter, I'll carry him along, " and afterwards diſpatch myſelf of him well enough." Then Manourie having appriſed Stucley of all that paſs'd, brought them together. Ralegh ſhewed the jewel, and, probably, deliver'd it, for Stucley ſhewed himſelf content, and it was probably upon the acceptance of it, but deſired a little reſpite to diſpoſe of his office. Manourie, having thus ſeen the agreement made, took his leave of them for London (the part deſign'd for him ending here) after having ſaid to Ralegh, " he did not think of ſeeing him again, while he was in England." Ralegh, at parting, gave him, by a letter to a perſon at Radford, an iron furnace, with a diſtillatory of copper belonging to it; and charged him " to tell every body he met, how ſick he was, " and that he left him in an extreme looſeneſs that very night."

BUT as Ralegh had diſpatch'd captain King to London with inſtructions to be in readineſs for him, he kept moving on; when there fell out an accident which gave him freſh hopes to facilitate his eſcape. For when he came to his inn at Brentford, he was met by a Frenchman, named La Cheſnay, a follower of Le Clerc, agent from the French king; who told Ralegh, the ſaid French agent was very deſirous to ſpeak with him, as ſoon as he got to London, about ſome affairs which highly concerned his ſafety. Accordingly the next night after Ralegh was at London, the ſaid Le Clerc and La Cheſnay came to viſit him at his houſe: and there Le Clerc offer'd him a French bark, which he had prepared for him to eſcape in; and withal, his letters recommendatory for his ſafe conduct and reception, to the governor of Calais; and to ſend a gentleman expreſly that ſhould attend and meet him there. But Ralegh underſtanding the French bark not to be ſo ready nor ſo fit as that he had already propoſed for himſelf, himſelf, gave him thanks, and told him, that he would make uſe of his own bark, but for his letters, and the reſt of his offer, that he ſhould be beholden to him, becauſe his acquaintance in France was worn out. [a] With this paſſage, and a word or two only of Ralegh's attempt to eſcape, after he came to London, it not being thought proper here to expatiate upon the arts uſed in betraying it, ends the tedious fardel of objections accumulated to render him unworthy of mercy in the king's Declaration, and the ſtory aſcribed to the obſcure Frenchman aforeſaid in it, but unconfirmed by any affidavit or evidence upon oath, which, in other ſuch caſes, have been thought neceſſary vouchers: therefore how far to be call'd heinous offences, acts of hoſtility, depredations, abuſes of his charge, impoſtures and declenſions of juſtice, the reader may now firſt give his own judgment, and then compare it with what has been before ſaid of theſe accuſations by others. [b]

And now comes on the remainder of captain King's Narrative; wherein he tells us, that from Salisbury he was ſent before to London to provide a boat, and to lay her as low as Tilbury; and that he was alſo advis'd to put one Cotterell in truſt, who had been Ralegh's ſervant, for the proviſion of a wherry. As ſoon as King came to London, he dealt with Cotterell, who ſeemed as willing to do Sir Walter Ralegh ſervice as himſelf; but telling him of one Hart, who had been boatſwain to the ſaid captain's ſhip, and had a ketch of his own; with him the captain therefore agreed, and gave him money to get it in readineſs, having vowed ſecrecy upon the reward which the captain further promiſed him. But he had no ſooner received the thirty pieces of ſilver than he betray'd the deſign to Mr. William Herbert, who as ſuddenly made it known; but King not ſuſpecting any diſcovery, ſtill fed Hart with money to keep the ketch at Tilbury.

[a] Ralegh might ſay this to get his recommendation the ſtronger, but indeed his fame was now in high requeſt at the French court. For one of the nobleſt ſcholars in France, Nicholas Claudius Fabricius, lord of Peireſk, writing, ſoon after, a letter over to Camden, concludes it with theſe words, J'ay eu un grand deſplaiſir d'entendre le mauvais ſuccez de la navigation de my lord Rallé; parce que c'eſt un perſonage, dont la valeur et le merite ſont en grande recommendation: s'il ſe fait aucune relation de ſon voyage, je ſeray bien aiſe de la voir. Camdeni Epiſtolæ, 2°. 1691, p. 243. The original of this letter, written by the ſaid Peireſkus to Camden, is preſerv'd in the Cotton library.

As for that negotiation of this French agent with Sir Walter Ralegh after he arrived at London, to remove him from thoſe who thirſted after his blood, into the protection of a ſtate which better knew how to value his great accompliſhments, it was not ſo cloſely manag'd by them, but it took wind at court, inſomuch that Monſieur de la Cheſnaye was brought to an examination before the lords, and having confeſs'd his being employ'd by Le Clerc in the deſign of conveying Sir Walter Ralegh to France, he was, in September following, committed to a juſtice of peace's houſe in the nature of a cloſe priſoner. Le Clerc was alſo cited to appear before the council. And here, through thoſe eternal peccadillos which are ever brambling the courſe of embaſſies, aroſe a diſpute, which however juſtifiably it might be maintain'd by the ſaid French ambaſſador, ſeems yet to have added ſome fuel to the fire of indignation already kindled againſt Sir Walter Ralegh. For Le Clerc declar'd, he would continue dumb to all their interrogatories till he ſhould be uſed with that diſtinction which others, qualified as he was, had before been. Inſtancing, that Sir W. Becher, then agent for king James in France, had, at an audience before the council of ſtate, claimed the right, in honour of his repreſentative quality, of not propounding his buſineſs till the lords of the council ſhould ſtand up as he did, and be uncover'd as he was: for, being in that place ambaſſador, he ſhould be allowed to ſet and be cover'd, as the counſellors were at the time of their audience. This, Le Clerc affirmed, had been yielded to by the king his maſter's counſellors, and therefore he challeng'd the like reſpect from their lordſhips. The lords anſwer'd, that different countries had their different forms of treaty; and that the manner of proceeding in France, was no rule for ours in England. But Le Clerc perſiſted inflexibly in his right to this privilege. Then the lords, neither to comply with his demand, nor conſtrain his reſolution, determin'd to lay aſide all form or ceremony, by retiring, promiſcuouſly, into another room, no ways affected with the obſervances of the council-chamber, and there to diſcourſe over his tranſactions in favour of Sir Walter Ralegh, as a matter of private and indifferent converſation. Here Le Clerc made many ſolemn proteſtations that he knew nothing at all of the matter, till at length, after the confrontment of Le Cheſnay, and his re-confeſſion of their employment for Sir Walter Ralegh's eſcape, Le Clerc could no longer face it out, but confeſs'd it likewiſe himſelf. King James being informed thereof, Le Clerc had notice given him by the lords, to forbear all further exerciſe of his charge, and not to appear at court, till it ſhould be known, by the return of a meſſenger they had ſent expreſs to France, whether the king his maſter would herein avow his miniſter's actions. This was on, or not long after, the 17th of September; ſoon after Sir W. Becher was confin'd to his houſe in France; and about a month after, a diſpatch came over to Le Clerc with particular charge to deliver it himſelf into king James's own hand, to try if he could by that means, recover himſelf again at court. Away poſted Le Clerc to Royſton, where the king then was, and offering, himſelf to preſent the letters, could gain no admiſſion; but being refer'd to the lords in waiting, he ſaid, he would either perſonally, according to his inſtructions, or not at all, perform that ſervice. So he returned to London, and from thence, in a few days, or about a week before Sir Walter Ralegh's death, to France, with his letters undeliver'd; and the revocation of the Engliſh agent thereupon enſued. See Camden's Annals of King James; but chiefly Finetti Philoxenis: or choice Obſervations of Sir John Finet, Maſter of the Ceremonies to the two laſt Kings, touching the Reception, Precedence, Treatment, Audience, Punctilios and Conteſts of foreign Ambaſſadors in England, 8vo. 1656, p. 56. Alſo L' Ambaſſadeur, et ſes Fonctions, par Monſieur de Wiquefort, 4°. 1690, tom. 1. p. 397. where, tho' he ſays, La cour de France auroit bien voulu maintenir ſon miniſtre; yet that after monſieur Le Clerc returned to France, il ne fut pas fort conſideré depuis ce temps là. Such the fate of unſucceſsful ſervice!

[b] Upon the great murmurs and diſcontent among the people, which ſo generally aroſe at the putting of Sir Walter Ralegh to death, inſomuch that, tho' one of Eſſex's adverſaries, he was pitied even by Eſſex's friends; "King James, after the mode of weak and ill-conſulted "princes (ſays Oſborne) ſet forth a Declaration; which, "according to the ordinary ſucceſs of ſuch apologies, "render'd the condition of that proceeding worſe in the world's "opinion." Another author obſerving, "Such is the power "of envy, and ſo really criminal it is to be maſter of "more merit than ſuch a prince knew how to value, and "to have done ſervices which they could not ſufficiently "reward, that this alone was Ralegh's crime:" and having obſerved that his very enemies had ackowledged the reaſonableneſs of his attempt at Guiana, with the juſt meaſures he took to put it in execution; and, beſides his perſonal valour and publick conduct, the excellence of all the diſpoſitions he made for his expedition, concludes (with regard to the king's Declaration,) "That they had "not any thing to lay to his charge on that part, but what "was ſo evidently malicious, and ſo fooliſh in the con-"trivance alſo, as made all men aſhamed that heard it." See the Hiſtorical Account of Sir Walter Ralegh's Voyages and Adventures, 8vo. 1719, p. 37, 38.

On Friday night, which was the 7th of Auguſt, Sir Walter Ralegh came to London,[a] when captain King attended on him at his lodgings, but was told by Ralegh that he could in no wiſe get ready to go off that night. It ſeems to be the next day that Stucley got his warrant to indemnify him for any contract he ſhould enter into with Sir Walter Ralegh, or to authorize his compliance with any offer he ſhould make him for his eſcape, or in ſhort, as others have not ſpared to call it, a licence to betray him; for tho' Ralegh might now have been ſecured in a direct and undiſguiſed manner, yet the glory was to do it inſidiouſly, and under the vizor of friendſhip; being not more ſuitable to the genius of predominant power, than neceſſary on the preſent occaſion, to give room for ſo many more little circumſtances of objection as might occur to ſupply the place of one wanting, that ſhould have been capital. And this night it was that the French ambaſſador aforeſaid, came to Ralegh's houſe, and made the propoſal before recited. But when captain King came to him again the ſame night, Ralegh ſaid there was no going now without Stucley, whom he doubted not but he ſhould engage to go along with him, and that the next night, without failure, he would meet the captain at the Tower Dock. As for Mr. Herbert, aforeſaid, he was employ'd in garrowing Sir Walter Ralegh's houſe, as the captain phraſes it, while Ralegh, being thus drawn out of it by Stucley, under pretence of bearing him company, might be the more unexpectedly ſeiz'd with all ſuch private papers as he ſhould have about him; in hopes, no doubt, that by one means or other, ſomething might turn out to make a charge of ſufficient weight againſt him. But, in the concluſion, ſays our ſaid author, all the papers which were found, proved to be no other, than what might, without any diſcredit, have been laid open to all the world.

Captain King went, as he further tells us, on Sunday night to the place appointed with two wherries; and Sir Walter Ralegh alſo came thither; having put on a falſe beard, and a hat with a green hatband. He was accompanied with Sir Lewis Stucley, young Stucley, and his own page. Then aſking captain King, if all things were ready? he anſwer'd, they were, and that the cloak-bag and the four piſtols were in the boat. Stucley then ſaluted captain King, and aſk'd, whether thus far he had not diſtinguiſhed himſelf an honeſt man? to which King anſwer'd, that he hop'd he would continue ſo.

After they enter'd the boats and divided the piſtols, they had not rowed above twenty ſtrokes before the watermen told them, that Mr. Herbert had lately taken boat, and made as if he would have gone through-bridge, but returned down the river after them. This raiſed ſome apprehenſion in Ralegh, but, upon Stucley's encouragement, they rowed on; yet Ralegh, not well ſatisfied, called captain King near to him, who was in the other boat with young Stucley and Hart, and intimated, that he could not go forward unleſs he was ſure of the watermen, whom he then alſo ſpake to, aſking, whether, if any ſhould come to arreſt them in the king's name, they would row forwards or return. At this, the great boobies were ſo frightned that they cry'd, and anſwer'd, they knew no body there but captain King, who had hired them to Graveſend; and that they neither dared, nor would go any further. Ralegh ſaid, that a brabbling matter with the Spaniſh ambaſſador, was the cauſe that of neceſſity he muſt go to Tilbury to embark for the Low Countries; and that he would give them ten pieces of gold for their pains.

Then began Stucley's part, curſing and damning himſelf that he ſhould be ſo unfortunate as to venture his life and fortune with a man ſo full of doubts and fears. He ſwore that if the watermen would not row on, he would kill them; and perſuaded Ralegh that there was no ſuch danger as he ſuſpected; of which opinion captain King alſo ſtill was. Thus the time paſt till they drew near Greenwich, when a wherry croſs'd them, which Ralegh ſaid came to diſcover them. King ſought to diſſuade him from this ſuppoſition, and told him, that if they could but reach Graveſend, he would hazard his life to get to Tilbury. Theſe delays ſpent the tide, and the watermen ſaid, it was impoſſible to get to Graveſend before morning. Hereupon Ralegh would have landed at Purfleet, and Hart would have poſſeſs'd him, that tho' it was night he could procure him horſes to Tilbury. Stucley appeared very zealous for this propoſal, and ſaid, that upon that condition he could be content to carry the cloak-bag on his own ſhoulders half a mile; but King told him, that if they could not go by water, it was impoſſible, at that time of night, to get horſes to go by land.

By this time they had rowed as far as Woolwich, or rather about a mile beyond, which might be to a reach call'd the Gallions near Plumſtead. Here, approaching two or three ketches, Hart began to doubt whether any one of them was his. Upon this, Ralegh con-

[a] Camden, in his Annals of King James, ſays, Ralegh was brought to London on the 9th of Auguſt 1618; but, as I compute from the king's Declarations, it is a miſtake. He alſo in the ſame article, confirms Stucley's acceptance of the bribe to eſcape with Ralegh.

cluded they were all betray'd, and bid the watermen turn back, hoping to have got to his own houſe before morning; and began to examine Hart very ſtrictly; who pretended he had given his men expreſs charge not to ſtir from Tilbury till he came down; but this would not induce Ralegh to proceed. Before they had rowed back a furlong, they eſpied another wherry, and hailing her, they ſaid they were for the king. Ralegh perceiving they were ſome of Mr. Herbert's crew, propoſed to Stucley, ſeeing they were diſcover'd, and in reſpect to his ſafety, that he might remain ſtill in his cuſtody; and that Stucley ſhould openly declare to the watermen, he was his priſoner, which he did. Here Stucley and he fell into private diſcourſe, contriving how Ralegh might reach his houſe; and how Stucley might ſave himſelf harmleſs by ſaying, that he only pretended to go along with Ralegh in order to diſcover his intentions, and ſeize upon his private papers. Then they whiſper'd ſome time together, and Ralegh taking ſome things out of his pockets (whether more rubies powder'd with diamonds, our author does not ſay) and gave them to Stucley, who all this while, not only hugg'd and embrac'd him, as it ſeem'd with the greateſt tenderneſs, but made the utmoſt proteſtations of love, friendſhip, and fidelity. When they were got back to Greenwich, Stucley ſaid, that he durſt not carry Ralegh to his houſe, but perſuaded him to land, which they did; the other ſtrange boat landing at the ſame time, in which the men, they perceived, belonged to Mr. W. Herbert and Sir William St. John, the ſame who had made good profit of Ralegh before, as we have read. Upon Greenwich bridge, Stucley told captain King, it would be for Sir Walter's good, that he ſhould pretend he was conſenting with him to betray his maſter. King, not able to fathom the depth of this policy, as he tells us, refus'd it, thinking he ſhould not only thereby belie his own conſcience, but make himſelf odious to the world; therefore, tho' Ralegh himſelf made ſome motion of it to him, he could not, how ſerviceable ſoever it might prove, be guilty of ſo much inſincerity towards him. Then Stucley arreſted the captain in his majeſty's name, and committed him to the charge of two of Mr. Herbert's men. After this they all went to a tavern, and by the way, captain King heard Ralegh ſay, Sir Lewis, theſe actions will not turn out to your credit. Ralegh was kept apart from King till morning, when as they enter'd into the Tower, Ralegh ſaid to him, Stucley and Cotterell have betray'd me; adding, for your part, you need be in fear of no danger, but as for me, it is I am the mark that is ſhot at. Then captain King, being forced to take his leave, left Ralegh, to his tuition, with whom I do not doubt (ſays he) but his ſoul reſteth. And ſo concludes his Narrative.

HERE the curious reader would probably be willing to know what Stucley had to ſay for himſelf upon this buſineſs; and this I have alſo ſome opportunity of relating from the tract he publiſh'd after Ralegh's death in his own defence; which tho', for its author's behaviour aforeſaid, it has been ſo much diſregarded, that of all the hiſtorians general and particular, who have written of Sir Walter Ralegh, and ſome few of them, whoſe characters are pretty well known, to his diſparagement; I never met with one who has ſhewn it ſo much credit as to quote it: yet, as I have found ſome few paſſages not altogether uſeleſs in explaining other parts of this life, ſo thoſe, which concern this part, I have thought proper more particularly here to inſert, in obſervance to a good biographical maxim, which enjoyns us, as far as the parts they bear in our narrative will permit, to ſhew a due reſpect to the characters of all men, and conſequently not, in favour of any, to proſtitute our own.

IN this tract, which is properly enough addreſs'd to the king, one of the earlieſt motives to revenge, in that poor inſtrument of ſtate, as Stucley no leſs properly calls himſelf, againſt Ralegh, appears to be a pretence, that Ralegh had abridg'd Stucley's father of an incredible dividend in a prize many years before taken at ſea,[a] whereof a more particular account has been before given in its proper place; as the laſt motive will appear to be what Ralegh ſaid of this Stucley in his Dying Speech. But the arguments Stucley makes uſe of for having betray'd him, are drawn firſt from Ralegh's having pretended to be poiſon'd at Sir Edward Parham's houſe, who was Stucley's kinſman. For he reports Ralegh to have ſaid, "Tho' the gentleman would "not hurt me, yet there might be prieſts that did it: for I remember, after my morning's "draught of a cup of ale, which Sir Edward Parham offer'd me in the hall, I felt preſently "a kind of excoriation in my bowels, as if ſome jeſuite had been the butler." "Now, ſays "Stucley, when I ſaw the puſtles break out upon him at Salisbury, my compaſſion, I confeſs, "was too credulous to report it." But that being thus deceived himſelf, and thereby wronging his kinſman, it moved his indignation againſt Ralegh for abuſing both: ſo that in ſhort, he drew Ralegh to his deſtruction by a lie, becauſe he had induced Stucley to aſperſe his kinſman with one. And tho' divinity would not, as Stucley owns, yet reaſon of ſtate would hold it lawful to lie for the diſcovery of treaſon, in ſervice to the commonwealth. Then he endeavours to reconcile himſelf to the commonwealth, by anſwering the objection of his being ſo inſtrumental to the depriving it of ſo ſufficient a member as had not left his equal behind him, in theſe words: "No man denies but he had many ſufficiencies in him: but what were theſe "but ſo many weapons of practice and danger againſt the ſtate, if he eſcaped? being ſo deeply "tainted in ſo many points of diſcontent, diſhoneſty, and diſloyalty. He knew, as he had "written, that as in nature, ſo in policy, a privatione ad habitum non fit regreſſio. And "therefore being deſperate of any fortune here, agreeable to the height of his mind, who can "doubt but he would have made up his fortune elſewhere, upon any terms againſt his ſove-"raign and country?" [a] In another place, which relates to Ralegh's laſt endeavours of eſcaping, he tells the king, "On the Saturday when I received your majeſty's commiſſion by "my couſin Herbert, I received alſo intelligence by him, that at that inſtant Ralegh was "flying from my cuſtody without my privity, not having, as yet, made him any ſemblance "of condeſcent: [b] ſo that I almoſt came upon him unawares, even as he was putting on his "falſe beard, and other diſguiſements; which declares he did ſtill diſtruſt your goodneſs, "doubtleſs out of the conſcience of his guiltineſs, whatever he writ or ſaid to the contrary. "And is it any marvel then, that he was angry with me at his death for bringing him back? "Beſides, being a man, as he was thought, of ſo great a wit, it was no ſmall grief that a man of "ſo mean wit as I ſhould be thought to go beyond him. Yea, but you ſhould not have uſed "ſuch craft to go beyond him. No? Sic ars deluditur arte. Neque enim lex juſtior ulla eſt "quàm necis artifices arte perire ſuâ. But why did you not execute your commiſſion bravely "to his apprehenſion on him in his houſe? why? my commiſſion was to the contrary, to "diſcover his pretenſions, and to ſeize his ſecret papers, &c. And can any honeſt ſubject "queſtion my honeſty in the performance of ſuch a commiſſion, which tended to diſcover the "ſecret intentions of an ill-affected heart to my ſoveraign? How can any diſlike this in me, "and not bewray his own diſhoneſt heart unto the ſtate? Yea, but tho' another might have "done this, yet how might you do it, being his kinſman and his friend? Surely if I had "been ſo; yet in a publick employment and truſt laid upon me, I was not to refuſe it, much "leſs to prefer private kindneſs and amity before my publick duty and loyalty: for what did "I know the dangerous conſequence of theſe matters which were to be diſcover'd? or who "knows them yet, of thoſe that make themſelves my competent judges? But if there were "no kindred or amity between us, as I avow there never was, what bond then might tie me "to him, but the tie of compaſſion to his miſeries? which was in my ſoveraign's heart to "diſtribute, when he ſaw time, that did command me, and not in the diſpenſation of me, "nor of any other inſtrument's power that is to be commanded." [c] Theſe are his arguments; and he concludes his pamphlet with making two humble petitions to his moſt excellent majeſty; "Firſt, ſeeing that I, your poor loyal ſubject, am burdened and oppreſſed with the teſtimony "of a bitter enemy, of a perjur'd and condemned man, againſt all reaſon, conſcience and "law; that I may have your majeſty's leave, to the confirmation of the truth, which I have "avowed to be ſufficient; to receive the ſacrament upon it in your majeſty's chapell." But if he did receive the ſacrament, to confirm the truth of his aſſertions, for this ſeems to be the meaning of his words, if they have, or were intended to have any; how that would juſtify the falſhood of his actions; and how, his taking of the ſacrament would be of any credit to him, who has own'd, that divinity would not hold his practices lawful; or how clear him for the violation of that truſt and fidelity he had before taken the ſacrament, as we ſhall hear preſently, to maintain, he was not thought caſuiſt, or even inſtrument of ſtate enough to reſolve: the laſt petition is, "That his majeſty would be ſo gracious as to ſuffer a declaration to come "forth from the ſtate, for the clearing of theſe matters, and further ſatisfaction of the world;" which plainly diſcovers, that this pamphlet, ſent out under the name of this inſtrument, was a mere concerted preparative to the ſaid declaration which ſo obſervantly followed it; like a fomentation to ſupple the minds of the uneaſy people, that the ſoveraign unguent might enter more effectually. But how little ſatisfaction the ſaid declaration gave, we have already noted: and for Stucley's performance, it made not ſo much as himſelf eaſy; being, in his own opinion, ſo inſufficient to deface the black and odious ſtains of his conduct, that he was forced to write an Apology beſides; and that was ſo little regarded, as never to have been thought worthy of the preſs. Whether his life was more ſucceſsful than his writings, and how it fared with him after this piece of court-ſervice, may be gathered from ſeveral authors. Some hiſtorical compurgators of this reign, and conſequently no friends to Ralegh's memory, yet own, that Stucley's deſtiny was ſuitable to his dealings, being afterwards hang'd, ſay they, for clipping of gold.[a] But thoſe who had better intelligence, and knew the truth more particularly, have delivered it more perfectly; where they affirm, "That Stucley having, for a bag of money, falſified his "faith, which he had confirm'd by the tie of the holy ſacrament, he was, before the year "came about, caught clipping the ſame coin, in the king's own houſe at Whitehall, which "he had received as the reward of his perfidiouſneſs; for which being condemned to be "hang'd, he was driven to ſell himſelf to his ſhirt, to purchaſe his pardon of two knights." "Then (to avoid the ſight and ſcorn of mankind) withdrew himſelf to a little iſland in the "Severn ſea, called the Iſle of Landy, and there died a poor diſtracted beggar;"[b] which, as we find it elſewhere ſufficiently confirm'd, was in leſs than two years after Ralegh's death.[c] Thus horribly did the deceiver's reward prove his puniſhment; and thus we leave this notable monument of improſperous treachery.

RALEGH, as we before mention'd, was now priſoner again in the Tower of London, being brought thither on Monday morning the 10th of Auguſt. About two or three days after, a committee was ſelected to examine into the aforeſaid eſcape, it being a matter luckily capable, and highly neceſſary to be enlarg'd upon, in order to fill up the meaſure of accuſation. Such a premeditated flight was therefore declaim'd againſt as a crime ſo heavy and ſo heinous, ſuch a diſdain or deſpair of his majeſty's mercy, as was greatly to be expected could never obtain his forgiveneſs. Then again, for Sir Walter Ralegh to alienate himſelf thus from his native country by means of a foreign power, was ſtretch'd out to the idea of a ſeparation as horrid as the breach of ſome huge rock or promontory from the main land, when its foundation was ſap'd and waſh'd away by undermining waves. Put into the Tower.

THE arguments Ralegh now returned to extenuate this mighty tranſgreſſion, having been by no author tranſmitted to us, it is not impoſſible but they were with the reſt of his juſtification before thoſe commiſſioners, during the time of this his laſt impriſonment, induſtriouſly ſtifled. There is, notwithſtanding, one of his own letters on this ſubject deſcended, by means of the preſs, to us. It is directed, by the error of the editor it ſeems, to the duke, tho' as yet, no more than marquis of Buckingham, and dated the 14th of October. Herein, ſays Ralegh, with relation to his late attempted eſcape, "That which doth comfort my ſoul in this offence "is, that even in the offence itſelf, I had no other intent than his majeſty's ſervice, and to "make his majeſty know that my late enterprize was grounded upon a truth, and which "with one ſhip ſpeedily ſet out, I meant to have aſſured or to have died; being reſolved, "as it is well known, to have done it from Plymouth, had I not been reſtrain'd. Hereby "I hoped, not only to recover his majeſty's gracious opinion, but have deſtroy'd all thoſe "malignant reports which had been ſpread of me. That this is true, that gentleman whom "I ſo much truſted, my keeper, and to whom I open'd my heart, cannot but teſtify; and "wherein, if I cannot be believed living, my death ſhall witneſs. THOUGH all other events and motions in this expedition were now alſo rack'd and tenter'd by his adverſaries; tho' the commiſſioners (who were perhaps the ſame, mention'd in a kind of oblique manner, at the end of the king's Declaration, as witneſſes thereof) came now conſtantly to the Tower, to pick out or catch hold of any thing that might contribute ſome plauſible matter to condemn him; yet after the examinations, re-examinations, and confrontments of the moſt diſcontented perſons in the late voyage, none of all the depoſitions upon oath, that are pretended to have been taken, or were really worm'd out of them, were ever thought ſo material by the ſaid commiſſioners, as to have been diſtinctly brought to light, either in that Declaration or elſewhere, againſt Sir Walter Ralegh. Much leſs may we expect to meet with any of the arguments urged by himſelf in his own defence during this inquiſition, or cloſe and private manner of ſifting him from ſo many quarters. And yet, if they had been fairly preſented to the publick, it is not thought they could have given the world greater ſatisfaction, or have cleared him better than what he had juſt before written, both in his letter to the lord Carew and at the end of his Apology, to prove the authority he had for the late action at Guiana, the integrity of his conduct in it, with the reaſon and neceſſity thereof. Wherein it appears, he abſolutely depended on the honour of king James to continue now, as he had begun, the maintenance of his right to that country which Ralegh had lawfully poſſeſſed for the crown; at leaſt, ſo far, as not to renounce or circumvent his own commiſſion; otherwiſe, how well he knew that if he made the leaſt oppoſition to any reſiſtance of his attempt, he was liable to be purſued as an invader; or, if he returned with any gold, to be perſecuted as a plunderer by the Spaniards; and if he did neither, that he was ſtill no leſs liable to be accus'd as an impoſtor by his co-adventurers. But in this latter reſpect, all ſuſpicion was clearly removed, even from thoſe who by their loſſes in this voyage would have been moſt readily prompted to make ſuch reproach, when they found Ralegh prove himſelf as in theſe writings, to the face of mankind, ſuch a far greater loſer than any of the reſt hereby, as was before obſerved: and as for the other two objections, Ralegh has alſo made it no leſs amply evident in the ſame pieces, how glaringly he muſt appear to the world, a mere premeditated or deſigned ſacrifice to one of them, if king James ſhould maim his ſoveraignty of its title to Guiana, or now diſclaim'd the undertaking there which he had before authoriz'd. For therein he has ſhewed, that his majeſty was well reſolved of his right in thoſe parts bordering the Orenoque to the ſouth, as far as the Amazons, by having formerly given the Engliſh leave to plant and inhabit there; and that his own propoſal to go thither, was not accounted of as what would endanger the peace, even by the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who pretended it to be needleſs that Ralegh ſhould carry ſuch ſtrength with him, if he intended no other enterprize, for that he ſhould work any mine there without diſturbance; but had a good reaſon return'd by Ralegh for that ſtrength, from the example of Sir John Hawkins. Further ſhewing, that for the Spaniards to ſet up a town upon the Orenoque, was ſuch a uſurpation, and that their king ſhould thereupon call himſelf king of Guiana, was as unreaſonable as if he were to call himſelf king of Ireland, becauſe he took poſſeſſion at Smerwick, and built a fort there. Having alſo ſhewn, that no peace could be broken there by him, where no peace was maintain'd by the Spaniards, both from their bloody uſage of the Engliſh, who had lately been to trade there, and from the words in the king of Spain's late letters to the governor; " who firſt " call'd us enemies, when he hoped to cut us in pieces, ſays Ralegh, and having fail'd, peace- " breakers: when to be an enemy and a peace-breaker in one and the ſame action, is impoſ- " ſible." [b] Moreover, that here the Spaniards began the firſt ſlaughter; that their town was not burnt by any knowledge or permiſſion of his, nor his directions to the mine followed. Laſtly, having obſerved how little the Spaniards can endure that the Engliſh nation ſhould look upon any part of America, being above a fourth part of the whole known world, tho' the hundredth part was never poſſeſſed by the Spaniards: and withal, the many ill conſequences of acknowledging, that we have offended the king of Spain by landing in Guiana, even to the ruin of our navigation, trade, power, and dominion in this quarter of the globe, where there was as much room and reaſon for advancing the honour and riches of England as of any ſtate in chriſtendom; he concludes his Apology with theſe words, I have ſaid it already, and I will ſay it again, that if Guiana be not his majeſty's, the working of a mine there, and the taking of a town there, had been equally perilous; for, by doing the one, I had rob'd the king of Spain, and been a thief; and, by the other, a diſturber or breaker of the peace.

Now it is plain, that king James ſo much waved his right to Guiana, at leaſt till Ralegh was put to death (for then he aſſum'd it again, by the power he gave for another expedition to thoſe parts, [a] however, irreſolutely, according to cuſtom, he revok'd it) that as we obſerve in his Declaration, not only the place which Ralegh went to is pretended to be out of his commiſſion, but the title he ſtood upon, to be no ways compatible with it. Yet ſo inconteſtably did Ralegh make it appear, no doubt in his examinations at preſent, no leſs than in the writings abovemention'd, that if any peace could be broken where no peace had been maintain'd, it muſt either be by king James himſelf, in firſt granting a commiſſion to plunder another prince (for he knew where Ralegh was going, and no where declines his knowledge that the Spaniards were ſettled there) and then betraying it to procure a defeat of the very attempt he had empower'd; or elſe by the Spaniards themſelves, in reſiſting his endeavours to put it in execution; that after all this queſtoning, canvaſing, and heaping up of allegations againſt him, the council could not think it juſtifiable to take away Sir Walter Ralegh's life for all that had paſſed at Guiana. Yet, as he muſt be put to death, they found a way to appeaſe the Spaniards with his blood, by making this laſt action at St. Thome the efficient cauſe, but the obſolete condemnation at Wincheſter, fifteen years paſt, the nominal cauſe of his deſtruction: as a courſe whereby both the law would be judicially ſatisfied, and the title be left, for fear of diſpleaſure, undecided. So in the whole, it was reſolved there ſhould be room enough to revoke the king's former mercy, as it appears in his Declaration; and that Ralegh might loſe his head upon his former attainder; [b] notwithſtanding the repugnancies apparent in ſuch a concluſion to men of penetration;

[a] About a year after the death of Sir Walter Ralegh, king James granted captain Roger North, a commiſſion to inhabit and ſettle a colony near the river of Amazons in Guiana; but was ſoon aw'd by Gondomar ſo much, that, on the 15th of May 1620, he iſſued a proclamation to recall that gentleman from the ſaid undertaking, and committed his brother, the lord North, to the Fleet priſon for haſtning the ſaid voyage, as may be read in Camden's Annals of that king's reign. Some other little attempts were ſeveral years after made there, which may be read of in a manuſcript entitled, An exact Narrative of the State of Guiana, and of the Engliſh Colony in Surynam, in the Beginning of the War with the Dutch, and of its Actions during the War; with the taking thereof by the Fleet from Zeland: of which ſome copies are preſerved in the Aſhmolean and other libraries. But how all this ſpacious and fruitful country has been ſince ſhamefully de erted, by the Engliſh eſpecially; the quiet poſſeſſion there by the Spaniards, to this day, is ſufficient witneſs. Whereupon we cannot forbear reciting here the reflection of a late writer, in an eſſay, partly before quoted, On the needful Improvements in Trade: wherein, expreſſing how much he is for promoting merchants to rational and profitable adventures, and ſailors to new diſcoveries, as things moſt valuable in their nature, ſolid in their deſign, and glorioufly advantageous in their ſucceſs, he proceeds thus: "By ſuch adventures and diſcoveries, all our encreaſe in "colonies and plantations has been produced. 'Twas "by ſuch happy attempts, that the famous Sir Walter "Ralegh and his aſſiſtants, ſettled the Britiſh nation upon "the Northern continent of America; and, had he been "encouraged, or rather had he not been baſely betray'd, "he had ſettled us alſo upon the Southern continent; "and the power of Great Britain in her colonies and "iſlands, in that part of the world, had been ſuperior "as well in wealth as in extent of land, and in ſtrength "of people, to all the nations of the world that ever "ſettled there. And perhaps, by this time, we had "wanted no Aſſiento to carry Negroes to America; no "Licence to trade to the Gulph of Mexico, but the South-Sea had been our own, and all the wealth and glory "of America paid homage to king GEORGE. But "fate, and the ill policies of thoſe times hinder'd; and "the golden mountains of Chili, and the ſilver mines of "Potoſi, the wealth of the richeſt part of the world, is "ſacrificed to the luſt and ſloth of the pooreſt, and "proudeſt nation under the ſun." See the Humouriſt, vol. 2. 8*vo*. 1725, p. 39. Another modern author, in his Addreſs to the South-Sea Company, obſerving this attempt of Sir Walter Ralegh's to have been the greateſt enterprize that ever was undertaken by any private perſon; how much it would be to the glory of the ſaid Company to bring it to perfection; how much it was to the infamy of that age in which this great man ſuffer'd, that ſuch an enterprize was not only diſcourag'd, but even betray'd to the Spaniard, and this gallant gentleman expoſed to ruin; alſo how juſt a reproach to this nation ever ſince, that ſuch a part of the world, ſo timely and ſo effectually diſcover'd to us, has not been made our own, and all thoſe nations, who would ſubmit to us, and be aſſiſtant to the great work, be taken into protection, confederated and made uſe of in ſubjecting that inexhauſtible treaſure to be found there, to the government and crown of Great Britain; he concludes the ſaid Addreſs in theſe words: "The country is within the pa-"tent or charter of the South-Sea Company; the under-"taking ſeems to be their due: their charter begins at "the river Orenoque, and none can attempt it without "them. If they pleaſe to take ſuch a propoſal into "conſideration, the author of theſe ſheets is ready to "lay before them a plan or chart of the rivers and "ſhores, the depths of water, and all neceſſary inſtruc-"tions for the navigation, with a ſcheme of the under-"taking, which he had the honour, about thirty years "ago, to lay before king WILLIAM, and to de-"monſtrate how eaſy it would be to bring this attempt "to perfection. If the Company decline it, 'tis then "humbly propos'd, that they will give leave to a ſociety "of merchants to undertake it under the Company's li-"cence, and on ſuch conditions as may be thought "reaſonable; of which more ſhall be ſaid when ſuch a "propoſal ſhall be entertain'd by the Company." See an Hiſtorical Account of the Voyages and Adventures of Sir Walter Ralegh, 8*vo*. 1719; from p. 42 to 55.

[b] "A head (ſays Oſborne) of more weight to our "court (eſpecially in that dearth of wiſdom then raging) "than the Infanta could be, notwithſtanding that the "moſt general, no leſs than the leaſt ſuſpected reports, "made her alone owner of the greateſt beauty, virtue, "gallantry and prudence that were at that day extant "in womankind! But, as the fooliſh idolaters were "wont to ſacrifice the choiceſt of their children to the "devil, the common enemy of humanity; ſo our king "gave up this incomparable jewel to the will of this "monſter in ambition (the Spaniard) under the pretence "of a ſuperannuated tranſgreſſion, contrary to the opi-"nion of the moſt honeſt ſort of gownmen; who main-"tain'd, that his majeſty's pardon lay incluſively in the "commiſſion he gave him upon his ſetting out to ſea: "it being incongruous that he, who remain'd under the notion penetration; among whom, Carew Ralegh has very well obſerv'd thereupon, that his father was condemn'd for being a friend to the Spaniards, and loſt his life by the ſame ſentence, for being their enemy. [a]

A METHOD, however, of diſpatching him being thus piec'd out, the king, or thoſe with whom he left the management of this affair when he went upon his progreſs, appear'd very eager for bringing it to a period. Therefore, as the ſhorteſt way, a privy ſeal was ſent to the judges, forthwith to order execution. But they conſidering there ought to be ſome face of regularity in the matter, and a little finger in the court of juſtice to ſlide it off with as much decency and ſmoothneſs as the buſineſs would allow of, demur'd upon that extrajudicial manner of proceeding. Therefore, on Friday the 23d of October, there was a conference held upon the form or manner how priſoners, who have been attainted of treaſon and ſet at liberty, ſhould be brought to execution, between all the juſtices of England; as one of them, judge Hutton tells us: wherein the queſtion being put, "Whether a privy ſeal was ſufficient, it "being directed to the juſtices of the King's Bench, to command them to award execution "againſt Sir Walter Ralegh; or how they ſhould proceed before execution be awarded?" It was reſolved by all, "That he ought to be brought to bar, by Habeas Corpus to the lieu-"tenant of the Tower, and then demanded, if he could ſay any thing why execution ſhould "not be awarded? For the proceedings againſt him being before commiſſioners, they are deliver'd "only into the court of King's Bench, or they might have remain'd in a bag or a cheſt, and "no roll made thereof; and ſo long time paſſing, it is not a legal courſe that he ſhould be "commanded by a privy ſeal or great ſeal to be executed, without being demanded, what "he hath to ſay? For he might have a pardon, or he might ſay that he was not the ſame "perſon: as if one be outlawed of felony, and taken, he ſhall not be preſently hang'd, but "he ſhall be brought to bar, and ſo demanded, &c. Upon this reſolution, a privy ſeal "came to the juſtices of the King's Bench, commanding them to proceed againſt him accor-"ding to law." [b] In what ſenſe he was ſo proceeded againſt may be better underſtood by that notice which on the 24th of October, being the next day, Ralegh received from the commiſſioners to prepare for death; [c] and by his not being ſuffer'd, when he ſoon after appear'd in court, before the judges, according to law, to make any defence of himſelf for what had been the occaſion of his coming thither; as may be ſeen by the following abſtract of the ſaid proceedings, which I have been favour'd with from authentick copies.

Brought to *Weſtminſter-*hall.

ON Wedneſday, the 28th of October, Sir Walter Ralegh, at eight o'clock in the morning, was awaked out of a fit of a fever, with ſummons preſently to appear at the King's Bench bar at Weſtminſter; and, ſoon after nine o'clock, he was, by writ of Habeas Corpus, brought thither. The writ being deliver'd to the judges by Sir Walter Apſley, and Sir Walter Ralegh's conviction at Wincheſter read, the attorney, Mr. Henry Yelverton, ſet forth, "That the "priſoner having been fifteen years ſince convicted of high treaſon, and then received the "judgment of death, his majeſty, of his abundant grace, had been pleaſed to ſhew mercy "unto him, till now, that juſtice calls to him for execution. Sir Walter Ralegh (continued "he) hath been a ſtateſman, and a man, who, in regard to his parts and quality, is to be "pitied: he hath been as a ſtar at which the world have gazed; but ſtars may fall, nay "they muſt fall when they trouble the ſphere wherein they abide. [d] It is therefore his ma-"jeſty's pleaſure now to call for execution of the former judgment, and I now require order "for the ſame." Then the clerk of the crown, Mr. Fanſhaw, having read the record of the conviction and judgment, the priſoner, holding up his hand, was aſked, "what he could

"notion of one dead in the law, ſhould, as a general, "diſpoſe of the lives of others, not being himſelf maſter "of his own. But the Spaniſh faction, then abſolute at "court, and ſole managers of the king's power no leſs "than his juſtice, did ſo far tender his catholick ma-"jeſty's full ſatisfaction in the procuring of his death, "the only man of note left alive who had helped to "beat them in the year 1588; that no abſurdity lying in "the way of his proſecution, could deter them from "making uſe of his former condemnation; remembring, "withal, how far his wit had puzzled them at Wincheſter, "and how much the jury, who condemn'd him there, "were touch'd in their conſciences; which made it the "leſs probable they ſhould be able to impannel one ſo "wicked as would do it then. Beſides, No peace be-"yond the Line, was a belief ſo rivetted in the opinion "of all, as he could not have been indicted anew, with-"out the king's producing the original articles, by which "his accuſers would have been convinced of malice, or "his prince of folly. Memoirs of King James, p. 108.

"Here juſtice was indeed blind! blindly executing one "and the ſame perſon, upon one and the ſame con-"demnation, for things contradictory; for Sir Walter "Ralegh was condemn'd for being a friend to the Spa-"niard, and loſt his life for being their utter enemy. "Thus kings, when they will do what they pleaſe, "pleaſe not him they ſhould, God; and having made "their power ſubſervient to their will, deprive themſelves "of that juſt power whereby others are ſubſervient to them."

[d] So in the copy here chiefly followed, but in one more ancient, this compariſon is thus turn'd into a metaphor; Sir Walter Ralegh, in his time, was a ſtar; yea, and of ſuch nature as ſhined fair, but out of the neceſſity of ſtate, like ſtars, when they trouble the ſphere, muſt indeed fall.

" ſay, why execution ſhould not be awarded againſt him?" Ralegh told the lords, " his " voice was grown weak by his late ſickneſs, and an ague he had at that inſtant upon him, in " which he was brought thither; therefore (as it appears in another copy of theſe proceedings " before refer'd to) deſired the relief of a pen and ink." But the lord chief juſtice, Sir Henry Montague, telling him " he ſpake audibly enough," he went on to this effect: " That he " hoped the judgment he received to die ſo long ſince, could not now be ſtrained to take " away his life; ſince by his majeſty's commiſſion for his late voyage, it was imply'd to be " reſtor'd, in giving him power as marſhal on the life and death of others; and ſince he " undertook the ſame to honour his ſoveraign, and enrich his kingdom with gold, of the ore " whereof, this hand, ſaid he, hath found and taken in Guiana." Then beginning to mention by what unavoidable and unblameable means the ſaid enterprize miſcarried, the lord chief juſtice interrupted, and told him, " whatever he ſpoke touching his voyage was not to the " purpoſe; alſo that his commiſſion could be of no ſervice to him; that treaſon was not " pardon'd by implication, and that he muſt ſay ſomething elſe to the purpoſe, otherwiſe they " muſt proceed to give execution." [a] Ralegh, then finding whatever he ſhould offer in his own juſtification would be no way to the purpoſe, put himſelf upon the king's mercy; yet gave ſome reaſons, " why he hoped the king would take compaſſion upon him concerning " that judgment which was ſo long paſt, in which both his majeſty was of opinion, and " there were ſome preſent who could witneſs, that he had hard uſage." [b] The lord chief juſtice adviſ'd him to the wiſdom of ſubmiſſion, and told him, " he was called to grant exe- " cution upon the judgment given fifteen years ſince; all which time he had been as a man " dead in the law, but the king, in mercy, ſpared him; that he might think it heavy if " this were done in cold blood; but it was not ſo, for new offences had ſtir'd up his majeſty's " juſtice to revive what the law had formerly caſt upon him. I know, continued he, that you " have been valiant and wiſe, and I doubt not but you retain both theſe virtues, for now you " ſhall have occaſion to uſe them. Your faith hath heretofore been queſtioned, but I am reſolved, " you are a good chriſtian; for your book, which is an admirable work, doth teſtify as much. " I would give you counſel, but I know you can apply unto yourſelf far better than I am able to " give you." Yet, with the good neighbour in the goſpel, he was for pouring ſome oil into his wounds; tho' far was it from yielding the refreſhment he promis'd, by reaſon of the ſeveri- ty wherewith he ſo ſharpened the infuſion. " I give you the oil of comfort, ſaid he, tho' in " reſpect that I am a miniſter of the law, mixed with vinegar." Nay, the judge further gave him, how unneceſſary ſoever he juſt before own'd it to be, one lecture upon ſorrow. " Sorrow, ſaid he, will not avail you in ſome kind; for were you pained, ſorrow would " not eaſe you; were you afflicted, ſorrow would not relieve you; were you tormented, " ſorrow would not content you; and yet the ſorrow for your ſins would be an everlaſting " comfort to you." Then another alſo upon death. " You muſt do as that valiant captain " did, ſaid he, who, perceiving himſelf in danger, ſaid, in defiance of death, Death, thou " expecteſt me; but, maugre thy ſpite, I expect thee. Fear not death too much, nor fear " death too little; not too much, leſt you fail in your hope; nor too little, leſt you die " preſumptuouſly: and here I muſt conclude my prayers to God for it, and that he would " have mercy on your ſoul." So he ended with ſaying, " Execution is granted."

RALEGH then deſir'd, that he might not be cut off ſo ſuddenly; for that he had ſome- thing to do in diſcharge of his conſcience, ſomething to ſatisfy his majeſty, and ſomething the world in: he deſir'd further, that he might be heard at the day of his death; and concluded, with calling on " God to be his judge, before whom he ſhould ſhortly appear, that he was " never diſloyal to his majeſty; which I will juſtify, ſaid he, where I ſhall not fear the face of " any king on earth." Thus the manuſcripts here chiefly followed, conclude; [c] but in the more ancient copy of theſe proceedings, Ralegh's concluſion, to the ſame ſenſe, is thus more copiouſly expreſs'd: " I moſt humbly beſeech your lordſhips, that you will grant me ſome time before

[a] Another Account relates this paſſage thus: " When " Ralegh began to juſtify himſelf for the late voyage, the " lord chief juſtice ſilenced him therein, ſaying, There " was no other matter there in queſtion, but concerning " the judgment of death formerly given againſt him, " which, the king's pleaſure was, upon ſome occaſions beſt " known to himſelf, to have executed, unleſs he could " ſhew good cauſe to the contrary." See the Proceedings againſt Sir Walter Ralegh at Weſtminſter, annexed to Sir T. Overbury's Account of his Arraignment at Wincheſter, 4*to*. 1648, p. 26.

[b] In another copy of this proceeding againſt him at Weſtminſter, which is the old MS. I have before me, as a- bovemention'd, this paſſage is thus expreſſed: " Concerning " my judgment at Wincheſter, I preſume, moſt of you, " that now hear me, are reſolved how that was obtain'd; " and I know that his majeſty was ſo reſolved touching " that trial, that if he had not been anew exaſperated " againſt me, certain I am, I might (if I could by na- " ture) have lived a thouſand and a thouſand years, " before he would have taken the advantage thereof."

[c] In a volume of the Harleyan manuſcripts, 90, C. 7. fol. 439; and another manuſcript among the collections of the late Mr. Granger.

" my execution, that I may ſettle my affairs and my mind more than they yet are; for I have " much to do, both for my reputation, conſcience and loyalty; and I would beſeech the " favour of pen, ink and paper, to expreſs myſelf ſomething thereby, and to diſcharge my- " ſelf of ſome truſt of worldly matters that were put in me; which leiſure, I beſeech you " think, that I crave not for to gain one minute of life; for now being old, ſickly, in diſ- " grace, and certain to go to it, life is weariſome to me. And I do laſtly beſeech your " lordſhips, that, when I come to die, I may have leave to ſpeak freely at my farewell, to " ſatisfy the world only, that I was ever loyal to the king, and a true lover of this com- " monwealth; for this I will ſeal with my blood." So craving their prayers, he was led away to the Gate-houſe, near the Palace-yard.

THE king was all this while retir'd as it were, or at ſome remoteneſs from this tragical ſcene, and, as I have receiv'd it from particular tradition, in Hertfordſhire; as if he would have diverted himſelf not only from the ſight or report, but even the thoughts of it: [a] yet what an effectual and expeditious hand he had in it, may further appear by his ſpecial warrant for the execution; which was produced, ready ſign'd, as if it at Weſtminſter, in a manner, as ſoon as the ſentence was over, being dated the ſame day, and directed to his chancellor, Verulam. Herein, his gracious majeſty, " diſpenſing with the manner of execution according to his former judgment, " and releaſing him of the ſame to be drawn, hang'd and quarter'd, ſays, our pleaſure is, inſtead " thereof, to have the head only of the ſaid Sir Walter Ralegh cut off, at or within our palace of " Weſtminſter: commanding the ſaid chancellor hereupon to direct two ſeveral writs under the " great ſeal; one to the lieutenant of the Tower, or his deputy, for the delivery of Sir Walter " Ralegh to the ſheriffs of Middleſex at the ſaid palace; and the other, to the ſaid ſheriffs for " the receiving the ſaid Sir Walter Ralegh from the ſaid lieutenant, and for executing him there; " for which this to be his warrant and diſcharge, againſt us, our heirs and ſucceſſors for ever." [b]

WE find, about the ſame time, ſome petitions preſented to the king in behalf of Sir Walter Ralegh, which were ſtrengthned with the ſolicitations of ſome perſons in great power and eſteem with his majeſty; but ſhall not wonder at their having no effect with him, to mitigate this peremptory and rigorous doom, if it be true as an author, who had opportunity enough of obſerving his diſpoſition, and abilities ſufficient to give a clear judgment of it, has ſaid thereof, with relation to Sir Walter Ralegh, that " King James ſo far participated of the humour " of a puſillanimous prince, as to pardon any ſooner than thoſe injur'd by himſelf." [c] As for Ralegh, we find not that he harbour'd the leaſt expectation or deſire of a reprieve; for that all the oppreſſions of age, ſickneſs, obloquy, ſpoil and loſs of all his means, beſides the other indignities he now lay under, baniſh'd every wiſh of redreſs in this world, but by that diſſolution which puts an end to all worldly miſeries, appears pretty evident in the letter he ſeems to have written but a ſhort time before his death to the king; in which, he rather acknowledges ſome former tendencies to favour and compaſſion, than deſires any repetition of them, and gives a very good reaſon for his having no further proſpect of any thing ſubſtantial therein, where he ſays, " I have not ſpared my labour, my poor eſtate, and the hourly hazard of " my life; but God hath otherwiſe diſpoſed of all, and now end the days of my hope." But if the days of his hope had ended when he landed at Plymouth, the days of his life had probably been augmented to a much greater number. Not, if it had been prolonged into many other acts, that they might have adorn'd it with ſuch unfading renown, as that one whereby with ſuch univerſal admiration he finiſh'd it. That letter aforeſaid, he concludes with the generous profeſſion of " being in nothing ſo miſerable, as in that I could never meet with an " occaſion, ſays he, wherein to be torn in pieces for your majeſty's ſervice. [d] But his majeſty choſe rather to let his own name and memory be torn in pieces for Ralegh's honour, and not only by all indifferent or impartial judges, but by his own countrymen; [e] and even by antagoniſts

[a] In Camden, alſo it may appear, that the king came not to London to give audience to foreign ambaſſadors now (as in all other parts of his reign) flocking over, till a day or two after Ralegh's death, then he came privately to Whitehall in the evening; but ſeems very reſtleſs about this time; very often in his boots, and hunting to and fro; ſometimes at Oatlands, ſometimes at Theobalds, ſometimes at Hampton-Court; not but he found time to dedicate his Meditations on the Lord's Prayer to his favourite Buckingham, in February following; but how he reconcil'd a certain article in that prayer with the intention of his Declaration aforeſaid againſt Sir Walter Ralegh, about the ſame time publiſh'd, I leave for others to compare. The queen, all this while, lay on her death-bed; nay, even when ſhe lay dead, in March following, and before the ſolemnity of her funerals, the king was ſo buſy in that important affair of his life, the horſe-races at New-Market, that he got a violent fit of ſickneſs thereby; ſo that it was fear'd his favourite diverſion would prove as fatal to him as it was thought a few years after the medicinal applications of that favourite peer aforeſaid did.

antagoniſts to one another in other parts of hiſtory, than ſuffer any mercy to interfere with that ſordid but deceitful, and ſoon after derided purſuit of a profitable alliance with the crown of Spain.

WHETHER any ſuch conditions were offer'd him at this time to lengthen the ſhort line of an uncomfortable exiſtence, which were either ſo extortionate as Ralegh could not comply with them, or ſo baſe and deteſtable as to be worſe than death, the particulars are not come to light; unleſs ſome glimpſes thereof may be diſcerned in that Epigram he wrote a little while before his end, in alluſion to the light of a candle: which is as follows.

Cowards may fear to die, but courage ſtout,
Rather than live in ſnuff, will be put out.

MOREOVER, how ſublimely his thoughts were now ſequeſter'd or elevated from all worldly conſiderations, and with what ſerenity, what ſteadineſs, he did in a manner poſſeſs the joys of a better ſtate before he could be driven to it, is viſible in that poem he wrote about the ſame time, on the pilgrimage his ſoul was ſuddenly to make to the regions of eternity, which concludes with this diſtich:

Of death and judgment, heaven and hell,
Who often thinks, muſt needs die well.

AND that his faith was no leſs ſtedfaſt in the hopes of a reſurrection, we are as convincingly aſſur'd by thoſe verſes which, this laſt night of his life, he probably wrote alſo here, in the Gate-houſe; they being found there in his bible; and, according to the moſt ancient copies I can meet with, pen'd in theſe words:

Even ſuch is Time! who takes in truſt
Our youth, our joys, and all we have;
And pays us but with earth and duſt:
Who, in the dark and ſilent grave,
When we have wander'd all our ways,
Shuts up the ſtory of our days.
But from that earth, that grave and duſt,
The Lord ſhall raiſe me up, I truſt.

THE next morning, being Thurſday the 29th of October, and the lord mayor's day, Sir Walter Ralegh was conducted, by the ſheriffs of Middleſex, to the old Palace-yard in Weſtminſter, where there was a large ſcaffold erected before the parliament-houſe for his execution. He had on, a wrought night-cap under his hat; a ruff band; a black, wrought velvet night-gown over a hair-colour'd ſattin doublet, and a black, wrought waiſt-coat; a pair of black, cut, taffety breeches, and aſh-colour'd ſilk ſtockings. He mounted the ſcaffold with a chearful countenance, and ſaluted the lords, knights, and gentlemen of his acquaintance there preſent. Then proclamation being made by an officer for ſilence, he introduced his ſpeech with informing them, that as he was yeſterday taken out of his bed in a ſtrong fit of a fever, which much weaken'd him, and whoſe untimelineſs forbearing no occaſion or place, he expected it again to day: therefore did firſt implore God, that he would preſerve him from the interruptions thereof at this time, and next, deſir'd the audience, if any diſability of voice or dejection of countenance ſhould appear in him, that they would impute it rather to the diſorder of his body than any diſmaiedneſs of mind. Then pauſing a little, he ſat down, and directed himſelf towards a window, where the lords Arundel, Northampton, Doncaſter, with other nobles were ſitting, and begun his ſpeech. But they being at ſome diſtance from the ſcaffold, he apprehended they did not plainly diſtinguiſh his words, therefore ſaid, he would ſtrain his voice, for that he would willingly have them hear him. To which the lord Arundel anſwer'd,

" laſt part of them was thought both barbarous and illegal." A little further, ſpeaking of the ſame king, he ſays, " His reign, in England, was a continual courſe of mean practices: the firſt condemnation of Sir Walter Ralegh was very black; but the executing him after ſo many years, and after an employment that had been given him, was counted a barbarous ſacrificing him to the Spaniards." Hiſtory of his own Times, vol. 1. 1724, fol. 16 and 17. And a late hiſtorian, who was otherwiſe a great oppoſer of biſhop Burnet, yet agrees with him in this particular; where ſpeaking of the artifices by which king James was prevail'd on to put the gallant Ralegh to death, he ſays, however, he thinks, it might reſult more from want of courage than from cruelty, that " The action was inexcuſable; being not more unjuſt than mean-ſpirited, and one of the greateſt blemiſhes in this reign." See A ſhort View of the Hiſtory of England, &c. By Bevil Higgons, Eſq; 8vo. 1734, p. 234.

they would rather come down to the ſcaffold; which he, and ſome others did. Then Sir Walter Raleigh, having ſaluted them ſeverally, began again, as follows.

His laſt Speech.

" I THANK God, that he has ſent me to die in the light and not in darkneſs. I likewiſe " thank God, that he has ſuffer'd me to die before ſuch an aſſembly of honourable witneſſes, " and not obſcurely in the Tower; where, for the ſpace of thirteen years together, I have " been oppreſs'd with many miſeries. And I return him thanks, that my fever hath not taken " me at this time, as I prayed to him it might not, that I might clear myſelf of ſome ac- " cuſations unjuſtly laid to my charge, and leave behind me the teſtimony of a true heart " both to my king and country.

" THERE are two main points of ſuſpicion that his majeſty hath conceived againſt me, " and which, I conceive, have ſpecially haſtned my coming hither; therefore I deſire to " clear them to your lordſhips, and reſolve you in the truth thereof. The firſt is, that his " majeſty hath been inform'd, I have had ſome plot or confederacy with France, for which " he had ſome reaſons, tho' grounded upon a weak foundation. One was, that when I re- " turn'd to Plymouth, I endeavoured to go to Rochel, which was becauſe I would fain have " made my peace before I came to England. Another reaſon was, that again I would have " bent my courſe to France, upon my laſt intended eſcape from London, being the place " where I might have the beſt means of making ſuch peace, and the beſt ſafeguard during " that terror from above. Theſe, join'd with the coming of the French agent to my houſe " here in London, only to confer about my ſaid voyage, together with the report of my " having a commiſſion from the king of France, might occaſion my being ſo ſuſpected in " this particular, and his majeſty to be ſo diſpleaſed with me. But this I ſay; for a man " to call God to witneſs at any time to a falſhood, is a grievous ſin. To call him as witneſs " to a falſhood at the point of death, when there is no time for repentance, is a crime far " more impious and deſperate; therefore, for me to call that Majeſty to witneſs an untruth, " before whoſe tribunal I am inſtantly to appear, were beyond meaſure ſinful, and without " hope of pardon. I do yet call that great God to witneſs, that, as I hope to ſee him, to " be ſaved by him, and live in the world to come, I never had any plot or intelligence " with the French king; never had any commiſſion from him, nor ſaw his hand or ſeal; " that I never had any practice or combination with the French agent, nor ever knew or " ſaw ſuch a perſon, till I met him in my gallery unlook'd for. If I ſpeak not true, O " Lord, let me never enter into thy kingdom.

" THE ſecond ſuſpicion or imputation was, that his majeſty hath been inform'd, I had " ſpoken diſloyally of him. The only witneſs of this was, a baſe Frenchman, a runnagade, " a chymical fellow, whom I ſoon knew to be perfidious; for being drawn by him into the " action of freeing myſelf at Wincheſter, in which I confeſs my hand was touch'd, he, being " ſworn to ſecrecy over-night, reveal'd it the next morning. 'Tis ſtrange, that ſo mean a " fellow could ſo far encroach himſelf into the favour of the lords; and, gaping after ſome " great reward, could ſo falſly accuſe me of ſeditious ſpeeches againſt his majeſty, and be " ſo credited. But this I here ſpeak, it is no time for me to flatter or to fear princes, I, who " am ſubject only unto death: and for me, who have now to do with God alone, to tell a " lye to get the favour of the king were in vain: and yet, if ever I ſpake diſloyally or " diſhoneſtly of the king, either to this Frenchman or any other; ever intimated the leaſt " thought hurtful or prejudicial of him, the Lord blot me out of the book of life.

" I CONFESS, I did attempt to eſcape, and it was only to ſave my life. I likewiſe confeſs, " that I feigned myſelf to be indiſpoſed at Salisbury; but I hope it was no ſin; for the " prophet David did make himſelf a fool, and ſuffer'd ſpittle to fall upon his beard to eſcape " from the hands of his enemies, and it was not imputed unto him as a ſin: what I did, " was only to prolong time, till his majeſty came, in hopes of ſome commiſeration from " him.

" BUT I forgive that Frenchman; and likewiſe Sir Lewis Stucley, the wrongs he hath done " me with all my heart; for I have received the ſacrament this morning of Mr. Dean, and " I have forgiven all men; but, in charity to others, am bound to caution them againſt him, " and ſuch as he is. For Sir Lewis Stucley, my keeper and kinſman, hath affirmed, that I " ſhould tell him, my lord Carew and my lord of Doncaſter here, did adviſe me to eſcape; " but I proteſt before God, I never told him any ſuch thing; neither did theſe lords adviſe " me to any ſuch matter. It is not likely that I ſhould acquaint two privy-counſellors of " my eſcape; nor that I ſhould tell him, my keeper, it was their advice; neither was there

" any reaſon to tell it him, or he to report it; for it is well known, he left me ſix, eight, " or ten days together alone, to go whither I liſted, while he rode about the country. He " further accus'd me, that I ſhould ſhew him a letter, whereby I did ſignify, that I would " give him ten thouſand pounds to eſcape; but God caſt my ſoul into everlaſting fire if ever " I made ſuch proffer of ten thouſand pounds, or one thouſand pounds; but indeed, I ſhewed " him a letter, that if he would go with me, there ſhould be order taken for the diſcharge " of his debts when he was gone; neither had I one thouſand pounds, for, if I had, I could " have made my peace better with it otherwiſe than by giving it Stucley. Further, he gave " out, when I came to Sir Edward Parham's houſe, who had been a follower of mine, and " gave me good entertainment, I had there received ſome dram of poiſon. When I anſwer'd " that I feared no ſuch thing, for I was well aſſur'd of thoſe in the houſe; and therefore wiſhed " him to have no ſuch thought. Now I will not only ſay, that God is the God of revenge, " but alſo of mercy; and I deſire God to forgive him, as I hope to be forgiven." Then caſting his eye upon his note of remembrance, he went on thus:

" It was told the king, that I was brought perforce into England; and that I did not " intend to return again. Whereas captain Charles Parker, Mr. Treſham, Mr. Leak, and " divers others that knew how I was dealt withal by the common ſoldiers, will witneſs to " the contrary. They were an hundred and fifty of them who mutiny'd againſt me, " and ſent for me to come to them; for unto me they would not come. They kept me " cloſe priſoner in my cabbin, and forced me to take an oath, that I would not go into " England without their conſent, otherwiſe they would have caſt me into the ſea. After I " had taken this oath, I did, by wine, gifts, and fair words, ſo work upon the maſter- " gunner, and ten or twelve of the faction, that I won them to deſiſt from their purpoſes, " and intended, when I returned home, to procure their pardon; in the mean while pro- " poſed, that I would diſpoſe of ſome of them in Ireland; to which they agreed, and would " have gone into the north parts, from which I diſſuaded them, and told them, they were " Red-ſhanks who inhabited there, ſo drew them to the ſouth; and the better to clear myſelf " of them, was forced to get them a hundred and fifty pounds at Kingſale, otherwiſe I had " never got from them.

" There was a report alſo, that I meant not to go to Guiana at all; and that I knew not " of any mine, nor intended any ſuch matter, but only to get my liberty, which I had not " the wit to keep. But it was my full intent to go for gold, for the benefit of his majeſty, " myſelf, and thoſe who went with me, with the reſt of my countrymen: tho' he that knew " the head of the mine, would not diſcover it when he ſaw my ſon was ſlain, but made him- " ſelf away." Then turning to the earl of Arundel, he ſaid, " My lord, you being in the " gallery of my ſhip at my departure, I remember you took me by the hand, and ſaid, you " would requeſt one thing of me; which was, whether I made a good voyage or a bad, that " I would return again into England; which I then promis'd, and gave you my faith I " would." So you did, ſaid his lordſhip, 'tis true, and they were the laſt words I ſaid to " you." Another ſlander was raiſed of me, that I ſhould have gone away from them, and " have left them at Guiana; but there were a great many worthy men, who accompanied me " always, as my ſerjeant-major, and divers others (whom he nam'd) that knew it was none " of my intention. Alſo it hath been ſaid, that I ſtinted them of freſh water; to which I " anſwer, every one was, as they muſt be in a ſhip, furniſh'd by meaſure, and not according " to their appetites. This courſe all ſeamen know muſt be uſed among them, and to this " ſtraight were we driven. Another opinion was held, that I carried with me ſixteen thouſand " pieces of gold; and that all the voyage I intended, was but to gain my liberty, and this " money into my hands: but, as I ſhall anſwer it before God, I had no more in all the " world, directly or indirectly, than one hundred pounds; whereof I gave about forty-five " pounds to my wife. But the ground of this falſe report was, that twenty thouſand pounds " being adventured, and but four thouſand appearing in the ſurveyor's books, the reſt had " my hand to the bills for divers adventures; but, as I hope to be ſaved, I had not a " penny more than one hundred pounds. Theſe are the material points I thought good to " ſpeak of; I am at this inſtant to render my account to God, and I proteſt, as I ſhall " appear before him, this that I have ſpoken is true.

" I will borrow but a little time more of Mr. Sheriff, that I may not detain him too " long; and herein I ſhall ſpeak of the imputation laid upon me through the jealouſy of " the people, that I had been a perſecutor of my lord of Eſſex; that I rejoiced in his death, " and ſtood in a window over-againſt him when he ſuffer'd, and puff'd out tobacco in de" fiance of him; when as, God is my witneſs, that I ſhed tears for him when he died;

" and, as I hope to look God in the face hereafter, my lord of Eſſex did not ſee my face at
" the time of his death; for I was far off, in the armory, where I ſaw him, but he ſaw not " me. 'Tis true, I was of a contrary faction; but I take the ſame God to witneſs, that I " had no hand in his death, nor bare him any ill affection, but always believed it would be " better for me that his life had been preſerved; for after his fall, I got the hatred of thoſe
" who wiſhed me well before: and thoſe who ſet me againſt him, ſet themſelves afterwards
" againſt me, and were my greateſt enemies: and my ſoul hath many times been grieved,
" that I was not nearer to him when he died; becauſe, as I underſtood afterwards, he aſked
" for me at his death, and deſired to have been reconciled to me.

" And now I entreat, that you all will join with me in prayer to that great God of hea" ven, whom I have grievouſly offended, being a man full of all vanity, who has lived a
" ſinful life in ſuch callings as have been moſt inducing to it; for I have been a ſoldier, a " ſailor, and a courtier, which are courſes of wickedneſs and vice; that his Almighty Good-
" neſs will forgive me; that he will caſt away my ſins from me; and that he will receive me
" into everlaſting life: ſo I take my leave of you all, making my peace with God." [a]

Then proclamation being made, that all men ſhould depart the ſcaffold, he prepared himſelf for death, giving away his hat and cap and money to ſome attendants who ſtood near him. When he took leave of the lords and other gentlemen, he intreated the lord Arundel to deſire the king, that no ſcandalous writings to defame him might be publiſh'd after his death. Concluding, I have a long journey to go, therefore muſt take my leave. Then having put off his gown and doublet, he call'd to the headſman to ſhew him the ax, which not being ſuddenly done, he ſaid, I pr'ythee let me ſee it. Doſt thou think that I am afraid of it? Having finger'd the edge of it a little he return'd it, and ſaid, ſmiling, to the ſheriff, This is a ſharp medicine, but it is a ſound cure for all diſeaſes; and having intreated the company to pray to God to aſſiſt and ſtrengthen him, the executioner kneeled down and aſked him forgiveneſs; which Ralegh, laying his hand upon his ſhoulder, granted. Then being aſked, which way he would lay himſelf on the block, he anſwer'd, So the heart be right, it is no matter which way the head lies. As he ſtoop'd to lay himſelf along, and reclined his head, his face being towards the eaſt, the headſman ſpread his own cloak under him. After a little pauſe, he gave the ſign that he was ready for the ſtroke by lifting up his hand, and his head was Beheaded. ſtruck off at two blows, his body never ſhrinking or moving. His head was ſhewed on each ſide of the ſcaffold, and then put into a red leather bag, and, with his velvet night-gown thrown over it, was afterwards conveyed away in a mourning coach of his lady's. His body, as we are told, was buried hard by, in the chancel of St. Margaret's church, near the altar; but his head was long preſerved in a caſe by his widow, for ſhe ſurvived him twenty-nine years, as I have found by ſome anecdotes remaining in the family; and after her death, it was kept alſo by her ſon Carew, with whom it is ſaid to have been buried. [b]

Thus

[a] This laſt ſpeech of Ralgeh's is taken partly from an old MS. copy in the Harleyan library, and another in MS. alſo before me, but, principally, from three of the moſt ancient copies we have of it in print, at the end of Overbury's Narrative of his Arraignment, and in his Remains; each ſupplying ſomething the others are wanting in, yet none varying conſiderably from the reſt, either in form of expreſſion, or matter of fact. From thence alſo, the ſuccceding particulars above of his behaviour at his death are drawn. Sir Walter Ralegh was not content with pronouncing of this ſpeech, but left a ſummary of it, ſigned at this time by his own hand. This we have but one copy of in print, and it is, at the end of his Apology, as follows. Sir Walter Ralegh's Anſwer to ſome Things at his Death. " I did
" never receive any direction from my lord Carew to make " my eſcape, nor did I ever tell Stucley any ſuch thing. I did
" never name my lord Hay and my lord Carew to Stucley
" in other words or ſenſe than as my honourable friends, " among other lords. I did never ſhew unto Stucley any " letter wherein there was 10000*l.* named, or any one " pound; only I told him, that I hoped to procure the " payment of his debts in his abſence. I never had " commiſſion from the French king. I never ſaw the " French king's hand or ſeal in my life. I never had " any plot or practice with the French, directly or in" directly, nor with any other prince or ſtate unknown " to the king. My true intent was, to go to a mine of " gold in Guiana; it was not feign'd; but it is true, that
" ſuch a mine there is, within three miles of St. Thome.
" I never had in my thought to go from Trinidado and " leave my companies to come after to the ſavage iſland,
" as Hatby Fearn hath falſely reported. I did not carry " with me a hundred pieces. I had with me about ſixty, and " brought back near the ſame number. I never ſpake
" to the French Manourie any one diſloyal word or diſho-" nourable ſpeech of the king; nay, if I had not loved
" the king truly, and truſted in his goodneſs, ſomewhat
" too much, I know that I had not now ſuffer'd death.

" Theſe things are moſt true, as there is a God, and " as I am now to appear before his tribunal ſeat; where
" I renounce all mercy and ſalvation if this be not truth.
" At my death, W. Raleigh."

[b] However it was thought by Anthony Wood, as was obſerved in a former note, that the ſaid Carew Ralegh was buried at Weſtminſter in the ſame grave with his father; it is aſſerted, at Weſt-Horſely, in Surrey, which was his ſeat, that the ſaid ſon was buried there. And they have a tradition, that when he was inter'd, the head of Sir Walter Ralegh, which had been kept by him, was then put into the grave with his corpſe. And I have ſeen a letter concerning ſuch of the Raleghs as were baptized or buried at Horſely aforeſaid, written by William Nicholas, Eſq; who reſides upon that eſtate, to a friend; wherein that ingenious gentleman " does verily believe,
" the head he ſaw dug up there in 1703, from the ſide
" of a grave where a Carew Ralegh had been buried,
" was that of Sir Walter Ralegh; there being no bones
" of a body to it, nor room for any, the reſt of that ſide
" of the grave being firm chalk." All we ſhall mention more of Sir Walter Ralegh's head, is, the ſtory remember'd

THUS have we ſeen how Sir Walter Ralegh, after a ſhining and conſpicuous ſeries of actions againſt the enemies of his country, and for the improvement of navigation as well as the enlargement and enrichment of the Britiſh empire, under one ſoveraign, was deprived of his liberty, his eſtate, and his life under another; how Sir Walter Ralegh, who had been one of the greateſt ſcourges of Spain, was made a ſacrifice to it; how the ſervices of Sir Walter Ralegh, I ſay, in camp, in court, by land, by ſea, with ſword and pen, were an honour to queen Elizabeth's reign; and how his ſufferings at Wincheſter, at Weſtminſter, by impriſonment, by law, with ſlander and the ax, were the diſgrace of king James's. Writers vary in their accounts of his age; but the moſt credible hiſtorians inform us, that he was ſixty ſix years old at his execution. [a] Yet was it conjectured, by the extraordinary effuſion of blood from his veins, that he had ſtock and ſtrength enough left of nature to have ſurvived many years. "His death was managed by him, as one author has obſerved, with ſo high and religious "a reſolution, as if a Roman had acted a Chriſtian, or rather a Chriſtian a Roman:" [b] and this is confirm'd by Sir Richard Hutton's evidence, who ſays, "He died in a good and "religious manner; ſpake much, and without any fear of death ſubmitted himſelf to the "block; by his death he gained great reputation in this life, and, by the grace and mercy "of God, remiſſion of his ſins and eternal life hereafter." [c]

AND now, ſince it is time to cloſe the ſcene, "let this glorious and gallant cavalier, whoſe "enemies have confeſs'd he was one of the weightieſt and wiſeſt men that this iſland ever "bred, reſt in his grave, and may his virtues live in poſterity;" [d] whom to inſpire therewith, the felicities of commemoration, however here diſpoſed of, ſeem to have ſignally combin'd; having tranſmitted many ample teſtimonies, how emulous the harmony of record and the ſpirit of communication have been to reſtore thoſe honours to his memory which were torn from his perſon; and make hiſtorical compenſation for ſuch honourable calamities: and that ſo early, that from this ſpeedy growth of his fame, through his extraordinary merits and misfortunes, the learned and judicious Mr. Nathanael Carpenter, who wrote but few years after his death, drew that comprehenſive character which has ſo much engaged the concurrence of all ſucceeding writers; where he ſays, Who hath not known or read of that prodigy of wit and fortune, Sir WALTER RALEGH? A man unfortunate in nothing elſe but in ber'd by Oſborne and Fuller; who tell us, that Mr. Edward Wiemark, a wealthy citizen, great news-monger, and conſtant Paul's-walker, hearing there, the news of Sir Walter Ralegh's death the day he was beheaded, and ſaying, among other things, His head would do very well upon the ſhoulders of Sir Robert Naunton, then ſecretary of ſtate, was complain'd of, and ſummon'd to the privy council; where he pleaded, that he intended no diſreſpect to Mr. Secretary, only ſpake in reference to the old proverb, that Two heads were better than one; ſo for the preſent was diſmiſs'd. Not long after, when rich men were call'd upon for a contribution to St. Paul's cathedral, Wiemark, at the council-table, ſubſcribed a hundred pounds. But Mr. Secretary ſaid, Two hundred are better than one, you know, Mr. Wiemark; which, between fear and charity, he was fain to ſubſcribe.

[b] Oſborne's Memoirs.

[c] See Hutton's Reports, as before. Nor only in proſe, but in verſe we have ſeveral teſtimonies of Sir Walter Ralegh's heroick comportment at his death. I have ſeen three or four epitaphs on him highly extolling the ſame, in print; whereof one ends thus:

Heaven hath his ſoul, the world his fame,
The grave his corpſe, Stucley his ſhame.

But there is an Elegy, written upon Sir Walter Ralegh, by Dr. Henry King, afterwards biſhop of Chicheſter, which, tho' printed among the ſaid prelate's poems in 8*vo*. 1657, has been ſo little known to any who have written of Sir Walter Ralegh, that I chuſe rather to repeat that than any other in this place; and it is as follows.

I will not weep, for 'twere as great a ſin
To ſhed a tear for thee as to have been An actor in thy death: thy life and age
Was but a various ſcene on fortune's ſtage,
With whom thou tugg'ſt and ſtrov'ſt e'en out of breath
In thy long toil; ne'er maſter'd till thy death;
And then, deſpight of trains and cruel wit,
Thou did'ſt at once ſubdue malice and it.
I dare not then ſo blaſt thy memory,
As ſay, I do lament, or pity thee.
Were I to chuſe a ſubject to beſtow
My pity on, he ſhould be one as low
In ſpirit as deſert: that durſt not die,
But rather were content by ſlavery
To purchaſe life. Or I would pity thoſe
Thy moſt induſtrious and friendly foes,
Who, when they thought to make thee ſcandal's ſtory
Lent thee a ſwifter flight to heav'n and glory:
Who thought, by cutting off ſome wither'd days,
Which thou couldſt ſpare them, to eclipſe thy praiſe;
Yet gave it brighter foil, made thy ag'd fame
Appear more white and fair, than foul their ſhame.
And did promote an execution,
Which, but for them, nature and age had done.
Such worthleſs things as theſe were only born
To live on pity's alms, too mean for ſcorn.
Thou dieſt an envied wonder, whoſe high fate
The world muſt ſtill admire, ſcarce imitate!

Among the later poems which have been written upon him, ſince here is not room for Dr. S. Bowden's ingenious verſes inſcrib'd to Miſs RALEGH, who is a direct deſcendant, and now living at Salisbury, I ſhall here recite only the concluſion of major Richardſon Pack's Prologue to Dr. Sewell's Tragedy of Sir Walter Ralegh, as containing a moſt notable admonition to ſucceeding times.

Jealous of virtue that was ſo ſublime,
His country damn'd his merit as a crime.
The traytor's doom did on the patriot wait:
He ſav'd— and then he periſh'd by the ſtate.
A patient MONARCH, too ſecurely wiſe,
Unhappy kings, they ſee with others eyes!
Weakly conſented to the guilty deed,
And made three kingdoms in their CHAMPION bleed.
BRITONS, by this EXAMPLE taught, unite;
Wound not the publick out of private ſpite.
To great atchievements, juſt rewards allow;
Nor tear the laurel from the victor's brow.
Exert your vigor in the nation's cauſe,
But grudge no rival his deſerv'd applauſe.
Safely WE may defy MADRID or ROME,
If no ſly GONDOMAR prevails at HOME.

the greatneſs of his wit and advancement! whoſe eminent worth was ſuch, both in domeſtick policy, foreign expeditions and diſcoveries; in arts and literature, both practic and contemplative, that it might ſeem at once to conquer both example and imitation. [a] But leſt a private judgment ſhould be ſuſpected, more liable to the ignorance of a ſtranger, or the affection of a friend; and that there may be no room left to doubt either of ſuch manifold worth in Sir Walter Ralegh, or that it was all made a ſacrifice of ſtate to the enemies and deceivers of the ſtate, we have reſerved, as moſt convincing, the acknowledgments of an enemy, who made him that ſacrifice, here to conclude with. For king James, ſoon after Ralegh's execution, beginning to ſee how he was, and would be deluded by the Spaniard, made one of his miniſters write to his agent in Spain, to let that ſtate know, they ſhould be look'd upon as the moſt unworthy people in the world, if they did not now act with ſincerity, ſince his majeſty had given ſo many teſtimonies of his; and now of late, by cauſing Sir Walter Ralegh to be put to death, chiefly for the giving them ſatisfaction. Further to let them ſee how, in many actions of late, his majeſty had ſtrained upon the affections of his people, and eſpecially in this laſt concerning Sir Walter Ralegh, who died with a great deal of courage and conſtancy. Laſtly, that he ſhould let them know, how able a man Sir Walter Ralegh was, to have done his majeſty ſervice. Yet, to give them content, he hath not ſpared him; when by preſerving him, he might have given great ſatisfaction to his ſubjects, and had at command, upon all occaſions, as uſeful a man as ſerved any prince in Chriſtendom. THE TRIAL OF Sir WALTER RALEGH, Knt. For HIGH TREASON,

At Winton the 17*th of* November, 1603, 1 Jac. I.

The COMMISSIONERS were,

The Right Honourable Henry Howard, Earl of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain.
Charles Blunt, Earl of Devon.
Lord Henry Howard, afterward Earl of Northampton.
Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury.
Edward Lord Wotton of Morley.
Sir John Stanhope, Vice-Chamberlain.
Lord Chief Juſtice of England, Popham.
Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, Anderſon.
Mr. Juſtice Gawdie.
Mr. Juſtice Warburton, and
Sir William Wade.

FIRST, The Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, was read by the Clerk of the Crown-Office; and the Priſoner bid hold up his Hand:

And then preſently the Indictment, which was in effect as followeth:

THAT he did conſpire, and go about to deprive the King of his Government, to raiſe up Sedition within the Realm, to alter Religion, to bring in the Roman Superſtition, and to procure foreign Enemies to invade the Kingdom. That the Lord Cobham, the 9*th of* June laſt, did meet with the ſaid Sir Walter Ralegh in Durham Houſe, in the Pariſh of St. Martin's in the Fields, and then and there had Conference with him how to advance Arabella Stuart to the Crown and royal Throne of this Kingdom; and that then and there it was agreed, That Cobham ſhould treat with Aremberg, Ambaſſador from the Arch-duke of Auſtria, to obtain of him 600,000 Crowns, to bring to paſs their intended Treaſons. It was agreed, That Cobham ſhould go to Albert the Arch-duke, to procure him to advance the pretended Title of Arabella: From thence, knowing that Albert had not ſufficient Means to maintain his own Army in the Low-Countries, Cobham ſhould go to Spain to procure the King to aſſiſt, and further her pretended Title.

It was agreed, the better to effect all this Conſpiracy, That Arabella ſhould write three Letters, one to the Arch-duke, another to the King of Spain, and a third to the Duke of Savoy; and promiſe there Things; Firſt, To eſtabliſh a firm Peace between England and Spain. Secondly, To tolerate the Popiſh and Roman Superſtition. Thirdly, To be ruled by them in contracting of her Marriage.

And, for the effecting theſe traiterous Purpoſes, Cobham ſhould return by the Iſle of Jerſey, and ſhould there find Sir Walter Ralegh, Captain of the ſaid Iſle, and take Counſel of Ralegh for the diſtributing of the aforeſaid Crowns, as the Occaſion or Diſcontentment of the Subjects ſhould give Cauſe and Way.

And further, That Cobham and his Brother Brook met on the 9*th of* June laſt, and Cobham told Brook all theſe Treaſons: To the which Treaſons Brook gave his Aſſent, and did join himſelf to all theſe; and after, on the Thurſday following,

Cobham and Brook did ſpeak theſe Words; That there would never be a good World in England, till the King (meaning our Soveraign Lord) and his Cubs (meaning his Royal Iſſue) were taken away.

And, the more to diſable and deprive the King of his Crown, and to confirm the ſaid Cobham in his Intents, Ralegh did publiſh a Book, falſly written againſt the moſt juſt and royal Title of the King, knowing the ſaid Book to be written againſt the juſt Title of the King; which Book Cobham after that received of him. Farther, for the better effecting theſe traiterous Purpoſes, and to eſtabliſh the ſaid Brook in his Intent, the ſaid Cobham did deliver the ſaid Book unto him, the 14th of June. And further, the ſaid Cobham, on the 16th of June, for Accompliſhment of the ſaid Conference, and, by the traiterous Inſtigation of Ralegh, did move Brook to incite Arabella to write to the three forenamed Princes to procure them to advance her Title; and that ſhe, after ſhe had obtained the Crown, ſhould promiſe to perform three Things, viz. 1. Peace between England and Spain. 2. To tolerate with Impunity, the Popiſh and Roman Superſtitions. 3. To be ruled by them three, in the contracting of her Marriage.

To theſe Motions, the ſaid Brook gave his Aſſent; and for the better effecting of the ſaid Treaſons, Cobham, on the 17th of June, by the Inſtigation of Ralegh, did write Letters to Count Aremberg, and did deliver the ſaid Letters to one Matthew de Lawrency, to be delivered to the ſaid Count, which he did deliver, for the obtaining of 600,000 Crowns; which Money, by other Letters, Count Aremberg did promiſe to perform the payment of; and this Letter Cobham received the 18th of June. And then did Cobham promiſe to Ralegh, that when he had received the ſaid Money, he would deliver 8000 Crowns to him; to which Motion he did conſent; and afterwards Cobham offered Brook, that after he ſhould receive the ſaid Crowns, he would give to him 10000 thereof; to which Motion Brook did aſſent.

To the Indictment, Sir Walter Ralegh pleaded Not Guilty.

The JURY.

Sir Ralph Conisby, Knt.	Thomas Walker, Eſq;
Sir Thomas Fowler, Knt.	Thomas Whitby, Eſq;
Sir Edward Peacock, Knt.	Thomas Highgate, Gent.
Sir William Rowe, Knt.	Robert Kempthon, Gent.
Henry Goodyer, Eſq;	John Chawkey, Gent.
Roger Wood, Eſq;	Robert Brumley, Gent.

Sir Walter Ralegh was asked, whether he would take Exceptions to any of the Jury.

Ralegh. I know none of them; they are all Chriſtians and honeſt Gentlemen; I except againſt none.

E. Suff. You Gentlemen of the King's learned Council, follow the ſame Courſe as you did the other Day.

Ralegh. My Lord, I pray you, I may anſwer the Points particularly, as they are delivered, by reaſon of the Weakneſs of my Memory and Sickneſs.

Popham, Chief Juſtice. After the King's learned Council have delivered all the Evidence, Sir Walter, you may anſwer particularly to what you will.

Heale, the King's Serjeant at Law. You have heard of Ralegh's bloody Attempts, to kill the King and his royal Progeny, and, in place thereof, to advance one Arabella Stuart. The Particulars of the Indictment are theſe: Firſt, That Ralegh met with Cobham the 9th of June, and had Conference of an Invaſion, of a Rebellion, and an Inſurrection, to be made by the King's Subjects, to depoſe the King, and to kill his Children, poor Babes, that never gave Offence: Here is Blood, here is a new King and Governor. In our King conſiſts all our Happineſs, and the true Uſe of the Goſpel; a Thing, which we all wiſhed to be ſetled after the Death of the Queen. Here muſt be Money to do this, for Money is the Sinew of War Where ſhould that be had? Count Aremberg muſt procure it of Philip King of Spain, 5 or 600,000 Crowns, and out of this Sum, Ralegh muſt have 8000; then there muſt be Friends to effect this. Cobham muſt go to Albert, Arch-duke of Auſtria, from whom Aremberg was Ambaſſador at that time in England. And what then? He muſt perſuade the Duke to aſſiſt the pretended Title of Arabella. From thence Cobham muſt go to the King of Spain, and perſuade him to aſſiſt the ſaid Title. Since the Conqueſt, there was never the like Treaſon. But out of whoſe Head came it? Out of Ralegh's, who muſt alſo adviſe Cobham to uſe his Brother Brook to incite the Lady Arabella to write three ſeveral Letters, as aforeſaid in the Indictment; all this was on the 9th of June. Then three Days after, Brook was acquainted with it: After this, Cobham ſaid to Brook, 'Twill never be well in England, till the King and his Cubs are taken away. Afterwards Ralegh delivered a Book to Cobham, treacherouſly written againſt the Title of the King. It appears, that Cobham took Ralegh, to be either a God, or an Idol. Cobham endeavours to ſet up a new King, or Governor. God forbid, mine Eyes ſhould ever ſee ſo unhappy a Change. As for the Lady Arabella, ſhe, upon my Conſcience, hath no more Title to the Crown than I have; which, before God, I utterly renounce. Cobham, a Man bred in England, hath no Experience abroad. But Ralegh, a Man of great Wit, Military, and a Sword-man. Now whether theſe Things were bred in a hollow Tree, I leave to them to ſpeak of, who can ſpeak far better than myſelf.

Sir Edward Coke, the King's Attorney. I muſt firſt, My Lords, before I come to the Cauſe, give one Caution; becauſe we ſhall often mention Perſons of eminent Places, ſome of them great Monarchs: Whatever we ſay of them, we ſhall but repeat what others have ſaid of them; I mean the capital Offenders in their Confeſſions: We, profeſſing Law, muſt ſpeak reverently of Kings and Potentates. I perceive theſe honourable Lords, and the reſt of this great Aſſembly, are come to hear what hath been ſcattered upon the Wreck of Report. We carry a juſt Mind, to condemn no Man, but upon plain Evidence. Here is Miſchief, Miſchief in ſummo gradu, exorbitant Miſchief. My Speech ſhall chiefly touch theſe three Points; Imitation, Supportation, and Defence.

The Imitation of Evil ever exceeds the Precedent; as on the contrary, Imitation of Good ever comes ſhort. Miſchief cannot be ſupported, but by Miſchief: Yea, it will ſo multiply, that it will bring all to Confuſion. Miſchief is ever underprop'd by Falſhood of foul Practices. And becauſe all theſe things did concur in theſe Treaſons, you ſhall underſtand the Main, as before you did the Bye.

The Treaſon of the Bye, conſiſteth in theſe Points: Firſt, That the Lord Grey, Brook, Markham, and the reſt, intended by Force in the Night, to ſurprize the King's Court; which was a Rebellion in the Heart of the Realm, yea, in the Heart of the Heart, in the Court. They intended to make him, that that is a Soveraign, ſubject to their Power, purpoſing to open the Doors with Muſquets and Calivers, and to take alſo the Prince and Council. Then, under the King's Authority, to carry the King to the Tower, and to make a Stale of the Admiral: When they had the King there, to extort three Things from him. Firſt, A Pardon for all their Treaſons. Secondly, A Toleration of the Roman Superſtition: Which, their Eyes ſhall ſooner fall out, than they ſhall ever ſee; for the King hath ſpoken theſe Words in the hearing of many, I will loſe the Crown and my Life, before ever I will alter Religion. And Thirdly, To remove Counſellors: In the room of the Lord Chancellor, they would have placed one Watſon a Prieſt, abſurd in Humanity, and ignorant in Divinity. Brook, of whom I will ſpeak nothing, Lord Treaſurer; the great Secretary muſt be Markham, Oculus Patriæ. A Hole muſt be found in my Lord Chief Juſtice's Coat. Grey muſt be Earl Marſhal, and Maſter of the Horſe, becauſe he would have a Table in the Court: Marry, he would advance the Earl of Worceſter to a higher Place. All this cannot be done without a Multitude. Therefore Watſon the Prieſt telleth a reſolute Man, That the King was in Danger of Puritans and Jeſuits; ſo to bring him in blindfold into the Action; ſaying, That the King is no King till he be crowned, therefore every Man might right his own Wrongs: But he is Rex Natus, his Dignity deſcends as well as yours, my Lords. Then Watſon impoſeth a blaſphemous Oath, That they ſhould ſwear to defend the King's Perſon, to keep ſecret what was given them in Charge, and ſeek all Ways and Means to advance the Catholick Religion. Then they intend to ſend for the Lord Mayor and the Aldermen, in the King's Name, to the Tower, leſt they ſhould make any Reſiſtance, and then to take Hoſtages of them; and to enjoin them to provide for them Victuals and Munition. Grey, becauſe the King removed before Midſummer, had a further Reach, to get a Company of Sword-men to aſſiſt the Action: Therefore he would ſtay, till he had obtain'd a Regiment from Oſtend or Auſtria. So you ſee, theſe Treaſons were like Sampſon's Foxes, which were joined in their Tails, tho' their Heads were ſevered.

Ralegh. You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray remember, I am not charged with the Bye, being the Treaſon of the Prieſt.

Attorney. You are not: My Lords, you ſhall obſerve three Things in the Treaſons. Firſt, They had a Watch-word (the King's Safety); their Pretence was Bonum in ſe, their Intent was Malum in ſe. Secondly, They avouched Scripture; both the Prieſts had, Scriptum eſt; perverting and ignorantly miſtaking the Scriptures. Thirdly, They avouched the Common Law to prove, That he was no King till he was crowned, alledging a Statute of 13 Eliz. This, by way of Imitation, hath been the Courſe of all Traytors.

In the 20th of Edward II, Iſabella the Queen, and the Lord Mortimer, gave out, That the King's Perſon was not ſafe, for the Good of the Church and Commonwealth.

The Biſhop of Carliſle did preach on this Text, My Head is grieved; meaning by the Head, the King; that when the Head began to be negligent, the People might reform what is amiſs.

In the 3d of Henry IV, Sir Roger Claringdon, accompanied with two Prieſts, gave out, that Richard II. was alive, when he was dead.

Edward III. cauſed Mortimer's Head to be cut off, for giving Counſel to murther the King.

The 3d of Henry VII. Sir Henry Stanley found the Crown in the Duſt, and ſet it on the King's Head. When Fitzwater and Garret told him, that Edward V. was alive, he ſaid, If he be alive, I will aſſiſt him: But this coſt him his Head.

Edmund de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, killed a Man in the Reign of King Henry VII, for which the King would have him hold up his Hand at the Bar, and then pardoned him. Yet he took ſuch Offence thereat, that he ſent to the Noblemen, to help to reform the Commonwealth; and then ſaid, he would go to France and get Power there. Sir Roger Compton knew all the Treaſon, and diſcovered Windon and others, that were attainted.

He ſaid, there was another Thing that would be ſtood upon, namely, that they had but one Witneſs; then he vouched one Appleyard's Caſe (Temp. Eliz.) a Traytor in Norfolk, who ſaid a Man muſt have two Accuſers. Helmes was the Man that accuſed him; but Mr. Juſtice Catlin ſaid, that that Statute was not in force at that Day; his Words were, Thruſt her into the Ditch.

Then he went on ſpeaking of Accuſers, and made this Difference: An Accuſer is a Speaker by Report; when a Witneſs is he, that upon his Oath ſhall ſpeak his Knowledge of any Man.

A third ſort of Evidence there is likewiſe, and this is held more forcible than either of the other two; and that is, when a Man, by his Accuſation of another, ſhall, by the ſame Accuſation, alſo condemn himſelf, and make himſelf liable to the ſame Fault and Puniſhment: This is more forcible than many Witneſſes. So then, ſo much by way of Imitation. Then he defined Treaſon: There is Treaſon in the Heart, in the Hand, in the Mouth, in Conſummation; comparing that in Corde to the Root of a Tree; in Ore, to the Bud; in Manu, to the Bloſſom; and that which is in Conſummatione, to the Fruit.

Now I come to your Charge, you of the Jury: The Greatneſs of Treaſon is to be conſidered in theſe two Things, Determinatione finis, and Electione mediorum. This Treaſon excelleth in both, for that it was to deſtroy the King and his Progeny. Theſe Treaſons are ſaid to be Crimen læſæ Majeſtatis; this goeth farther, and may be termed Crimen extirpandæ Regiæ Majeſtatis & totius Progeniei ſuæ. I ſhall not need, my Lords, to ſpeak any thing concerning the King, nor of the Bounty and Sweetneſs of his Nature, whoſe Thoughts are innocent, whoſe Words are full of Wiſdom and Learning, and whoſe Works are full of Honour; altho' it be a true Saying, Nunquam nimis, quod nunquam ſatis. But to whom do you bear Malice? To the Children?

Ralegh. To whom ſpeak you this? You tell me News I never heard of.

Attorney. Oh Sir, do I; I will prove you the notoriouſeſt Traytor, that ever came to the Bar. After you have taken away the King, you would alter Religion: As you Sir Walter Ralegh have followed them of the Bye in Imitation; for I will charge you with the Words.

Ralegh. Your Words cannot condemn me, my Innocency is my Defence: Prove one of theſe Things wherewith you have charged me, and I will confeſs the whole Indictment; and that I am the horribleſt Traytor that ever lived, and worthy to be crucified with a thouſand thouſand Torments.

Attorney. Nay, I will prove all: Thou art a Monſter; thou haſt an Engliſh Face, but a Spaniſh Heart. Now you muſt have Money: Aremberg was no ſooner in England (I charge thee Ralegh) but thou incitedſt Cobham to go unto him, and to deal with him for Money, to beſtow on diſcontented Perſons, to raiſe Rebellion in the Kingdom.

Ralegh. Let me anſwer for myſelf.

Attorney.

Attorney. Thou ſhalt not.

Ralegh. It concerneth my Life.

Lord Chief Juſtice Popham. Sir Walter Ralegh, Mr. Attorney is but yet in the General; but when the King's Council have given the Evidence wholly, you ſhall anſwer every Particular.

Attorney. Oh! do I touch you?

Lord Cecil. Mr. Attorney, when you have done with this general Charge, do you not mean to let him anſwer to every Particular?

Attorney. Yes, when we deliver the Proofs to be read. Ralegh procured Cobham to go to Aremberg, which he did by his Inſtigation: Ralegh ſupped with Cobham before he went to Aremberg; after Supper, Ralegh conducted him to Durham Houſe; from whence Cobham went with Lawrency, a Servant of Aremberg's, unto him, and went in by a Back-way. Cobham could never be quiet until he had entertain'd this Motion, for he had four Letters from Ralegh. Aremberg anſwered, the Money ſhould be performed, but knew not to whom it ſhould be diſtributed. Then Cobham and Lawrency came back to Durham Houſe, where they found Ralegh. Cobham and Ralegh went up, and left Lawrency below, where they had ſecret Conference in a Gallery, and after Cobham and Lawrency departed from Ralegh. Your Jargon was Peace! What is that? Spaniſh Invaſion, Scotiſh Subverſion. And again, you are not a fit Man to take ſo much Money for procuring of a lawful Peace, for Peace procured by Money is diſhonourable. Then Cobham muſt go to Spain, and return by Jerſey, where you were Captain: And then, becauſe Cobham had not ſo much Policy, or at leaſt Wickedneſs, as you, he muſt have your Advice for the diſtribution the Money. Would you have deſpoſed ſo good a King, lineally deſcended of Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter of Edward IV: Why then muſt you ſet up another? I think you meant to make Arabella a titular Queen, of whoſe Title I will ſpeak nothing; but ſure you meant to make her a Stale: Ah good Lady! you could mean her no good.

Ralegh. You tell me News, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. Oh Sir! I am the more large, becauſe I know with whom I deal: For we have to deal to-day with a Man of Wit.

Ralegh. Did I ever ſpeak with this Lady?

Attorney. I will track you out before I have done; Engliſhmen will not be led by Perſuaſion of Words, but they muſt have Books to perſuade.

Ralegh. The Book * was written by a Man of your Profeſſion, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. I would not have you impatient.

Ralegh. Methinks you fall out with yourſelf; I ſay nothing.

Attorney. By this Book, you would perſuade Men, that he is not the lawful King. Now let us conſider ſome Circumſtances: My Lords, you know my Lord Cobham (for whom we all lament, and rejoice; lament in that his Houſe, which hath ſtood ſo long unſpotted, is now ruinated: Rejoice, in that his Treaſons are revealed) is neither Politician no Sword-man; Ralegh was both, united in the Cauſe with him, and therefore Cauſe of his Deſtruction. Another Circumſtance is, the ſecret contriving of it. Humphry Stafford claimed Sanctuary for Treaſon, Ralegh in his Machiavilian Policy hath made a Sanctuary for Treaſon. He muſt talk with none but Cobham, becauſe (ſaith he) one Witneſs can never condemn me. For Brook ſaid unto Sir Griffith Markham, take heed how you do make my Lord Cobham acquainted; for whatſoever he knoweth, Ralegh the Witch will get it out of him. As ſoon as Ralegh was examined on one Point of Treaſon concerning my Lord Cobham, he wrote to him thus; I have been examined of you, and confeſſed nothing. Further, you ſent to him by your truſty Francis Kemiſh, that one Witneſs could not condemn; and therefore bad his Lordſhip be of good Courage. Came this out of Cobham's Quiver? No: But out of Ralegh's Machiavelian and Deviliſh Policy. Yea, but Cobham did retract it: Why then did you urge it? Now then ſee the moſt horrible Practices that ever came out of the bottomleſs Pit of the loweſt Hell. After that Ralegh had Intelligence that Cobham had accuſed him, he endeavoured to have Intelligence from Cobham, which he had gotten by young Sir John Payton: But I think it was the Error of his Youth.

Ralegh. The Lords told it me, or elſe I had not been ſent to the Tower.

Attorney. Thus Cobham, by the Inſtigation of Ralegh, entred into theſe Actions: So that the Queſtion will be, Whether you are not the principal Traytor, and he would nevertheleſs have entred into it? Why did Cobham retract all that ſame? Firſt, Becauſe Ralegh was ſo odious, he thought he ſhould fare the worſe for his ſake. 2*dly*, He thought thus with himſelf, if he be free, I ſhall clear myſelf the better. After this, Cobham asked for a Preacher to confer with, pretending to have Dr. Andrews; but indeed, he meant not to have him, but Mr. Galloway, a worthy and reverend Preacher, who can do more with the King (as he ſaid) than any other; that he, ſeeing his conſtant Denial, might inform the King thereof. Here he plays with the Preacher. If Ralegh could perſuade the Lords, that Cobham had no Intent to travel, then he thought all ſhould be well. Here is Forgery. In the Tower, Cobham muſt write to Sir Thomas Vane, a worthy Man, That he meant not to go into Spain; which Letter Ralegh deviſed in Cobham's Name.

Ralegh. I will waſh my Hands of the Indictment, and die a true Man to the King.

Attorney. You are the abſoluteſt Traytor that ever was.

Ralegh. Your Phraſes will not prove it, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. Cobham writeth a Letter to my Lord Cecil, and doth will Mellis, his Man, to lay it in a Spaniſh Bible, and to make as tho' he found it by chance. This was after he had Intelligence with this Viper; then he was falſe.

Lord Cecil. You mean a Letter intended to me; I never had it.

Attorney. No, my Lord, you had it not. You, my Maſters of the Jury, reſpect not the Wickedneſs and Hatred of the Man, reſpect his Cauſe; if he be guilty, I know you will have Care of it, for the Preſervation of the King, the Continuance of the Goſpel authoriſed, and the Good of us all.

Ralegh. I do not hear yet, that you have ſpoken one Word againſt me; here is no Treaſon of mine done. If my Lord Cobham be a Traytor, what is that to me?

Attorney. All that he did, was by thy Inſtigation, thou Viper; for I Thou thee, thou Traytor.

Ralegh. It becometh not a Man of Quality and Virtue, to call me ſo: But I take Comfort in it, it is all you can do.

Attorney. Have I anger'd you?

Ralegh. I am in no Caſe to be angry?

* This Book was intitled, A Defence of the Queen's Proceedings, againſt Mary Queen of Scotland. Written by one Robert Snag. See the Arraignment of Sir Walter Ralegh. By Sir Thomas Overbury, 4to. 1648.

C. J.

C. J. Popham. Sir Walter Ralegh, Mr. Attorney ſpeaketh out of the Zeal of his Duty, for the Service of the King, and you for your Life; be valiant on both ſides.

Now they proceed to the reading the Proofs.

The Lord Cobham's Examination read.

" He confeſſeth he had a Paſport to go into Spain, " intending to go to the Arch-duke, to confer " with him about theſe Practices; and becauſe " he knew the Arch-duke had not Money to " pay his own Army, from thence he meant to go " to Spain, to deal with the King for the 600,000 " Crowns, and to return by Jerſey; and that no- " thing ſhould be done, until he had ſpoken with " Sir Walter Ralegh, for diſtribution of the Money " to them which were diſcontented in England. " At the firſt beginning, he breathed out Oaths " and Exclamations againſt Ralegh, calling him " Villain and Traytor; ſaying, he had never en- " tered into theſe Courſes, but by his Inſtigation, " and that he would never let him alone.

Here Mr. Attorney willed the Clerk of the Crown-Office, to read over theſe laſt Words again (he would never let him alone.)

The Lord Cobham's Examination.

" Beſides, he ſpake of Plots and Invaſions: Of " the Particulars whereof he could give no Ac- " count, tho' Ralegh and he had conferred of them, " becauſe he was (as he ſaid) confounded with " them. Further, he ſaid, he was afraid of Ra- " legh, that when he ſhould return by Jerſey, that " he would have him and the Money to the King. " Being examined of Sir Arthur Gorge, he freed " him, ſaying, They never durſt truſt him; but " Sir Arthur Savage they intended to uſe, becauſe " they thought him a fit Man.

Ralegh. Let me ſee the Examination: This is abſolutely all the Evidence can be brought againſt me; poor Shifts! You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray you underſtand this: This is that which muſt either condemn, or give me Life; which muſt free me, or ſend my Wife and Children to beg their Bread about the Streets. This is what muſt prove me a notorious Traytor, or true Subject to the King. Let me ſee my Accuſation, that I may make my Anſwer.

Clerk of the Council. I did read it, and ſhew you all the Examinations.

Ralegh. At my firſt Examination at Windſor, my Lords aſked me, what I knew of Cobham's Practice with Aremberg; I anſwered negatively: And as concerning Arabella, I proteſt before God, I never heard one Word of it. If that be proved, let me be guilty of a thouſand Treaſons. It is a ſtrange thing you will impute that to me, when I never heard ſo much as the Name of Arabella Stuart, but only the Name of Arabella.

After being examined, I told my Lords, that I thought my Lord Cobham had Conference with Aremberg, I ſuſpected his viſiting of him: For after he departed from me at Durham Houſe, I ſaw him paſs by his own Stairs, and paſſed over to St. Mary-Saviours, where I knew Lawrency a Merchant, and a Follower of Aremberg, and therefore likely to go unto him. My Lord Cecil asked my Opinion concerning Lawrency; I ſaid, That if you do not apprehend Lawrency, it is dangerous, he will fly; if you do apprehend him, you ſhall give my Lord Cobham Notice thereof. I was asked likewiſe, Who was the greateſt Man with my Lord Cobham? I anſwered, I knew no Man ſo great with him, as young Wyat of Kent.

As ſoon as Cobham ſaw my Letter to have diſcovered his Dealing with Aremberg, in his Fury he accuſed me; but before he came to the Stair-foot he repented him, and ſaid, he had done me wrong. When he came to the End of his Accuſation, he added, That if he had brought this Money to Jerſey, that I would have delivered him and the Money to the King. Mr. Attorney, You ſaid this never came out of Cobham's Quiver, he is a ſimple Man: Is he ſo ſimple? No: He hath Diſpoſitions of his own, he will not eaſily be guided by others, but when he has once taken Head in a Matter, he is not eaſily drawn from it; he is no Babe. But it is ſtrange for me to deviſe with Cobham, that he ſhould go to Spain, to perſuade the King to disburſe ſo much Money, he being a Man of no Love in England, and I having reſigned my Room of chiefeſt Command, the Wardenſhip of the Stannaries: Is it not ſtrange for me, to make myſelf Robin Hood, or a Kett, or a Cade; I knowing England to be in better Eſtate to defend itſelf than ever it was. I knew Scotland united, Ireland quieted, Denmark aſſured, which before was ſuſpected. I knew, that having loſt a Lady whom Time had ſurpriſed, we had now an active King, a lawful Succeſſor. The State of Spain was not unknown to me. I had written a Diſcourſe, which I had intended to preſent unto the King, againſt Peace with Spain. I knew the Spaniards had ſix Repulſes, three in Ireland, and three at Sea, and once in 1588 at Cales, by my Lord Admiral. I knew he was diſcouraged and diſhonoured. I knew the King of Spain to be the proudeſt Prince living; but now he cometh creeping to the King my Maſter, for Peace. I knew, whereas before he had in his Ports ſix or ſeven ſcore Sail of Ships, he hath now but ſix or ſeven. I knew of twenty-five Millions he had from his Indies, he hath ſcarce one left. I knew him ſo poor, that the Jeſuits in Spain, who were wont to have ſuch large Allowance, were fain to beg at the Church-door. Was it ever read or heard, that any Prince ſhould diſburſe ſo much Money, without a ſufficient Pawn? I knew her own Subjects, the Citizens of London, would not lend her Majeſty Money, without Lands in Mortgage. I knew the Queen did not lend the States Money, without Fluſhing, Brill, and other Towns for a Pawn. And can it be thought, he would let Cobham have ſo great a Sum?

I never came to the Lord Cobham's, but about Matters of his Profit, as the ordering of his Houſe, paying of his Servants Board-wages, &c. I had of his when I was examined, four thouſand Pounds worth of Jewels for a Purchaſe; a Pearl of three thouſand Pounds, and a Ring worth five hundred Pounds: If he had had a Fancy to run away, he would not have left ſo much to have purchaſed a Leaſe in Fee-farm. I ſaw him buy three hundred Pounds worth of Books, to ſend to his Library at Canterbury, and a Cabinet of thirty Pounds to give to Mr. Attorney, for drawing the Conveyances; and God in Heaven knoweth, not I, whether he intended to travel. But for that Practice with Arabella, or Letters to Aremberg, or any Diſcourſe with him, or in what Language he ſpake unto him; if I knew any of theſe things, I would abſolutely confeſs the Indictment, and acknowledge myſelf worthy a thouſand Deaths.

Cobham's ſecond Examination read.

" The Lord Cobham being required to ſubſcribe to " an Examination, there was ſhewed a Note under " Ralegh's Hand, the which when he had peruſed, " he pauſed, and after brake forth into theſe " Speeches: Oh Villain! Oh Traytor! I will now

" tell you all the Truth: And then ſaid, His Pur" poſe was to go into Flanders and into Spain, for
" the obtaining the aforeſaid Money, and that Ralegh
" had appointed to meet him in Jerſey as he return" ed home, to be adviſed of him about the Diſtri-
" bution of the Money.

Popham, Lord Chief Juſtice. When Cobham anſwered to the Interrogatories, he made ſcruple to ſubſcribe; and being urged to it, he ſaid, if he might hear me affirm, that a Perſon of his Degree ought to ſet his Hand, he would; I lying then at Richmond, for fear of the Plague, was ſent for, and I told he ought to ſubſcribe; otherwiſe it were a Contempt of a high Nature: *Then he ſubſcribed. The Lords queſtioned with him further, and he ſhewed them a Letter, as I thought written to me, but it was indeed written to my Lord Cecil: He deſired to ſee the Letter again, and then ſaid, Oh Wretch! Oh Traytor! Whereby I perceived you had not performed that Truſt he had repoſed in you.

Ralegh. He is as paſſionate a Man as lives, for he hath not ſpared the beſt Friends he hath in England in his Paſſion. My Lords, I take it, he that hath been examined, hath ever been asked at the Time of his Examination, if it be according to his meaning, and then to ſubſcribe. Methinks, my Lords, when he accuſes a Man, he ſhould give ſome Account and Reaſon of it; it is not ſufficient to ſay, we talked of it. If I had been the Plotter, would not I have given Cobham ſome Arguments, whereby to perſuade the King of Spain, and anſwer his Objections. I knew Weſtmorland and Bothwell, Men of other Underſtandings than Cobham, were ready to beg their Bread.

Sir Thomas Fowler, one of the Jury. Did Sir Walter Ralegh write a Letter to my Lord before he was examined concerning him, or not?

Attorney. Yes.

Lord Cecil. I am in great Diſpute with myſelf, to ſpeak in the Caſe of this Gentleman: A former Dearneſs between me and him tied ſo firm a Knot of my Conceit of his Virtues, now broken by a Diſcovery of his Imperfections. I proteſt, did I ſerve a King that I knew would be diſpleaſed with me for ſpeaking, in this Caſe I would ſpeak, whatever came of it: But ſeeing he is compacted of Piety and Juſtice, and one that will not miſlike any Man for ſpeaking a Truth, I will anſwer your Queſtion.

Sir Walter Ralegh was ſtaid by me at Windſor, upon the firſt News of Copley, that the King's Perſon ſhould be ſurpriſed by my Lord Grey, and Mr. George Brook; when I found Brook was in, I ſuſpected Cobham, then I doubted Ralegh to be a Partaker. I ſpeak not this, that it ſhould be thought, I had greater Judgment than the reſt of my Lords, in making this haſte to have him examined; Ralegh following to Windſor, I met with him upon the Terrace, and willed him, as from the King, to ſtay, ſaying, The Lords had ſomething to ſay to him: Then he was examined, but not concerning my Lord Cobham, but of the ſurpriſing Treaſon; my Lord Grey was apprehended, and likewiſe Brook; by Brook we found, that he had given Notice to Cobham of the ſurpriſing Treaſon as he delivered it to us, but with as much Sparingneſs of a Brother as he might: We ſent for my Lord Cobham to Richmond, where he ſtood upon his Juſtification, and his Quality; ſometimes being froward, he ſaid he was not bound to ſubſcribe, wherewith we made the King acquainted. Cobham ſaid, if my Lord Chief Juſtice would ſay it were a Contempt, he would ſubſcribe; whereof being reſolved, he ſubſcribed. There was a Light given to Aremberg, that Lawrency was examined; but that Ralegh knew that Cobham was examined, is more than I know.

Ralegh. If my Lord Cobham had truſted me in the Main, was not I as fit a Man to be truſted in the Bye?

Lord Cecil. Ralegh did by Letters acquaint us, that my Lord Cobham had ſent Lawrency to Aremberg, when he knew not he had any Dealings with him.

Lord H. Howard. It made for you, if Lawrency had been only acquainted with Cobham, and not with you. But you knew his whole Eſtate, and were acquainted with Cobham's Practice with Lawrency; and it was known to you before, that Lawrency depended on Aremberg.

Attorney. 1. Ralegh proteſteth againſt the ſurpriſing Treaſon. 2. That he knew not of the Matter touching Arabella. I would not charge you, Sir Walter, with a Matter of Falſhood: You ſay, you ſuſpected the Intelligence that Cobham had with Aremberg, by Lawrency.

Ralegh. I thought it had been no other Intelligence, but ſuch as might be warranted.

Attorney. Then it was but lawful Suſpicion. But to that whereas you ſaid, That Cobham had accuſed you on Paſſion, I anſwer three Ways. 1. I obſerved when Cobham ſaid, Let me ſee the Letter again, he pauſed, and when he did ſee that Count Aremberg was touched, he cried out, O Traytor! O Villain! now will I confeſs the whole Truth. 2. The Accuſation of a Man on Hear-ſay, is nothing: Would he accuſe himſelf on Paſſion, and ruinate his Cauſe and Poſterity, out of Malice to accuſe you? 3. Could this be out of Paſſion? Mark the manner of it: Cobham had told this at leaſt two Months before to his Brother Brook, You are Fools, you are on the Bye, Ralegh and I are on the Main, we mean to take away the King and his Cubs; this he delivered two Months before. So mark the Manner and the Matter; he would not turn the Weapon againſt his own Boſom, and accuſe himſelf to accuſe you.

Ralegh. Hath Cobham confeſſed that?

Lord Chief Juſtice. This is ſpoken by Mr. Attorney, to prove that Cobham's Speech came not out of Paſſion.

Ralegh. Let it be proved that Cobham ſaid ſo.

Attorney. Cobham ſaith, he was a long time doubtful of Ralegh, that he would ſend him and the Money to the King. Did Cobham fear leſt you would betray him in Jerſey? Then of neceſſity there muſt be Truſt between you. No Man can betray a Man, but he that is truſted, in my underſtanding. This is the greateſt Argument to prove, that he was acquainted with Cobham's Proceedings. Ralegh hath a deeper Reach than to make himſelf, as he ſaid, Robin Hood, a Ket, or Cade; yet I never heard that Robin Hood was a Traytor; they ſay he was an Out-law. And whereas he ſaith, that our King is not only more wealthy and potent than his Predeceſſors, but alſo more politick and wiſe, ſo that he could have no Hope to prevail: I anſwer, There is no King ſo potent, wiſe, and active, but he may be overtaken through Treaſon. Whereas you ſay, Spain is ſo poor; diſcourſing ſo largely thereof, it had been better for you to have kept in Guiana, than to have been ſo well acquainted with the State of Spain. Beſides, if you could have brought Spain and Scotland to have joined, you might have had hope to prevail. For his ſix Overthrows, I anſwer; he hath the more Malice, becauſe Repulſes breed deſire of Revenge. Then you ſay, you never talked with Cobham but about Leaſes, and letting Lands, and ordering his Houſe; I never knew you Clerk of the Kitchen, &c. If you had fallen on your Knees at firſt, and confeſſed the Treaſon, it had been better for you. You ſay, he meant to have given me a Cabinet of thirty Pounds; perhaps he thought by thoſe means, to have anticipated me therewith. But you ſay, all theſe are Circumſtances. I anſwer, all this Accuſation in Circumſtance is true: Here now I might appeal to my Lords, that you take hold of this, that he ſubſcribed not to the Accuſation.

* This Aſſertion among others, in this Account of the Trial, ſhews the groſs Partiality and Falſhood of the Perſon, who took and publiſhed it; for in all the Narratives thereof, it appears, that Cobham would never ſubſcribe the Accuſation of Sir Walter Ralegh, which had been extorted from him by the Lords, through his Fear and other Paſſions.

Lord H. Howard. Cobham was not then preſſed to ſubſcribe.

Attorney. His Accuſation being teſtified by the Lords, is of as great Force, as if he had ſubſcribed. Ralegh ſaith again, if the Accuſer be alive, he muſt be brought Face to Face to ſpeak, and alledges 25 Edw. III, That there muſt be two ſufficient Witneſſes that muſt be brought Face to Face before the accuſed, and alledgeth 10, and 13 Eliz.

Ralegh. You try me by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, if you proceed only by the Circumſtances, without two Witneſſes.

Attorney. This is a treaſonable Speech.

Ralegh. Evertere hominem juſtum in cauſa ſua, injuſtum eſt: Good my Lords, let it be proved, either by the Laws of the Land, or by the Laws of God, that there ought not to be two Witneſſes appointed; yet I will not ſtand to defend this Point in Law, if the King will have it ſo; it is no rare thing to be falſly accuſed. A Judge condemned a Woman in Sarum, for killing her Husband, on the Teſtimony of one Witneſs; afterwards his Man confeſſed the Murder, when ſhe was executed. Who after, being touch'd in Conſcience for the Judgment, was uſed to ſay, Quod nunquam de hoc facto animam in vita ſua purgaret. It is alſo commanded by the Scripture, Deut. xvii. In ore duorum aut trium teſtium, &c. and xix. Non ſtabit unus teſtis contra aliquem, &c.

If Chriſt requireth it, as it appeareth, Mat. xviii. If by the Statute, Civil Law, and God's Word, it be required that there muſt be two Witneſſes at the leaſt; bear with me if I deſire one.

I would not deſire to live, if I were privy to Cobham's Proceedings: I had been a Slave, a Villain, a Fool, if I had endeavoured to ſet up Arabella, and refuſed ſo gracious a Lord and Soveraign. But urge your Proofs.

Lord Chief Juſtice. You have offered Queſtions on divers Statutes, all which mention two Accuſers in Caſe of Indictments; you have deceived yourſelf, for the Laws of 25 Ed. III. and 5 Ed. VI. are repeal'd. It ſufficeth now, if there be Proofs made either under Hand, or by Teſtimony of Witneſſes, or by Oaths; it needs not the Subſcription of the Party, ſo there be Hands of credible Men, to teſtify the Examination.

Ralegh. It may be an Error in me, and if thoſe Laws be repeal'd, yet I hope the Equity of thoſe Laws remains ſtill; but if you affirm it, it muſt be a Law to Poſterity; the Proof of the Common Law is by Witneſs and Jury; let Cobham be here, let him ſpeak it: Call my Accuſer before my Face, and I have done.

Attorney. Scientia ſceleris eſt mera Ignorantia: You have read the Letter of the Law, but underſtand it not. Here was your Anchor-hold, and your Rendezvous; you truſt to Cobham; either Cobham muſt accuſe you, or not accuſe you; if he did, then it would not hurt you, becauſe he is but one Witneſs; if he did not, then you are ſafe.

Ralegh. If ever I read a Word of the Law, or Statute before I was Priſoner in the Tower, God confound me.

Attorney. Now I come to prove the Circumſtances of the Accuſation to be true. Cobham confeſſed he had a Paſport to travel, hereby intending to preſent Overtures to the Arch-duke, and from thence to go to Spain, and there to have Conference with the King for Money: You ſay, he promiſed to come Home by Jerſey, to make merry with you and your Wife.

Ralegh. I ſaid, in his Return from France, not Spain.

Attorney. Further, in his Examination, he ſaith, Nothing could be ſet down for the Diſtribution of the Money to the Diſcontented, without Conference with Ralegh. You ſaid, It ſhould have been for Procurement of Peace, but it was for raiſing Rebellion. Further, Cobham ſaith, He would never have entred into theſe Courſes, but by your Inſtigation, and that you would never let him alone. Your Scholar was not apt enough to tell us all the Plots; that is enough for you to do, that are his Maſter: You intended to truſt Sir Arthur Savage, whom I take to be an honeſt and true Gentleman, but not Sir Arthur Gorge.

Ralegh. All this is but one Accuſation of Cobham's, I hear no other thing; to which Accuſation he never ſubſcribed, nor avouched it. I beſeech you, my Lords, let Cobham be ſent for, charge him on his Soul, on his Allegiance to the King; if he affirm it, I am guilty.

Lord Cecil. It is the Accuſation of my Lord Cobham, it is the Evidence againſt you; muſt it not be of Force without his Subſcription? I deſire to be reſolved by the Judges, Whether by the Law it is not a forcible Argument of Evidence.

The Judges. My Lord, it is.

Ralegh. The King, at his Coronation, is ſworn In omnibus Judiciis ſuis Æquitatem, non Rigorem Legis obſervare: By the Rigour and Cruelty of the Law, it may be a forcible Evidence.

Lord Chief Juſtice. That is not the Rigour of the Law, but the Juſtice of the Law; elſe when a Man hath made a plain Accuſation, by Practice, he might be brought to retract it again.

Ralegh. Oh my Lord! you may uſe Equity.

Lord Chief Juſtice. That is from the King; you are to have Juſtice from us.

Anderſon. The Law is, if the Matter be proved to the Jury, they muſt find you guilty; for Cobham's Accuſation is not only againſt you, there are other things ſufficient.

Lord Cecil. Now that Sir Walter Ralegh is ſatisfied, that Cobham's Subſcription is not neceſſary; I pray you Mr. Attorney go on.

Ralegh. Good Mr. Attorney be patient, and give me Leave.

Lord Cecil. An unneceſſary Patience is a Hindrance; let him go on with his Proofs, and then refel them.

Ralegh. I would anſwer particularly.

Lord Cecil. If you would have a Table, and Pen and Ink, you ſhall.

Then Paper and Ink was given him.

Here the Clerk of the Crown read the Letter which the Lord Cobham did write in July, which was to the Effect of his former Examination, further ſaying, I have diſcloſed all; to accuſe any falſely, were to burthen my own Conſcience.

Attorney.

Attorney. Read Copley's Confeſſion the 8th of June, he ſaith, He was offered 1000 Crowns to be in this Action.

Here Watſon's Additions were read.

The great Maſs of Money from the Count was impoſſible, &c.

Brook's Confeſſion read.

There have Letters paſſed, ſaith he, between Cobham and Aremberg, for a great Sum of Money, to aſſiſt a ſecond Action, for the ſurprizing of his Majeſty.

Attorney. It is not poſſible it was of Paſſion; for it was in Talk before three Men being ſeverally examined, who agreed in the Sum to be beſtowed on diſſaffected Perſons. That Grey ſhould have 12000 Crowns, and Ralegh ſhould have 8000, or 10000 Crowns.

Cobham's Examination, July 18.

If the Money might be procured (ſaith he) then a Man may give Penſions. Being aſked, if a Penſion ſhould not be given to his Brother Brook, he denied it not.

Lawrency's Examination.

Within five Days after Aremberg arrived, Cobham reſorted unto him. That Night that Cobham went to Aremberg with Lawrency, Ralegh ſupped with him.

Attorney. Ralegh muſt have his Part of the Money, therefore now he is a Traytor. The Crown ſhall never ſtand one Year on the Head of the King (my Maſter) if a Traytor may not be condemned by Circumſtances. For if A tells B, and B tells C, and C D, &c. you ſhall never prove Treaſon by two Witneſſes.

Ralegh's Examination was read.

" He confeſſeth Cobham offered him 8000 " Crowns, which he was to have for the Further- " ance of the Peace, between England and Spain; " and that he ſhould have it within three Days. " To which, he ſaid, he gave this Anſwer, When " I ſee the Money, I will tell you more; for I " had thought it had been one of his ordinary idle " Conceits, and therefore made no Account thereof.

Ralegh. The Attorney hath made a long Narration of Copley, and the Prieſts, which concerns me nothing; neither know I how Cobham was altered. For he told me, If I would agree to further the Peace, he would get me 8000 Crowns. I aſked him, Who ſhall have the reſt of the Money? He ſaid, I will offer ſuch a Nobleman (who was not named) ſome of the Money. I ſaid, He will not be perſuaded by you, and will extremely hate you for ſuch a Motion. Let me be pinched to Death with hot Irons, if ever I knew there was any Intention to beſtow the Money on diſcontented Perſons. I had made a Diſcourſe againſt the Peace, and would have printed it: if Cobham changed his mind, if the Prieſts, if Brook had any ſuch Intent, what is that to me? They muſt anſwer for it. He offered me the Money before Aremberg came, that is difference of Time.

Serj. Philips. Ralegh confeſſeth the Matter, but avoideth it, by diſtinguiſhing of Times. You ſaid, it was offered you before the coming of Aremberg; which is falſe. For you being examined whether you ſhould have ſuch Money of Cobham, or not: You ſaid, Yea; and that you ſhould have it within two or three Days. Nemo moriturus preſumitur mentiri.

Lord Henry Howard. Alledge me any Ground or Cauſe, wherefore you gave ear to my Lord Cobham for receiving Penſions, in Matters you had not to deal with?

Ralegh. Could I ſtop my Lord obham's Mouth?

Lord Cecil. Sir Walter Ralegh preſſeth, that my Lord Cobham ſhould be brought Face to Face. If he asks things of Favour and Grace, they muſt come only from him that can give them. If we ſit here as Commiſſioners, how ſhall we be ſatisfied, whether he ought to be brought, unleſs we hear the Judges ſpeak?

Lord Chief Juſtice. This thing cannot be granted; for then a Number of Treaſons ſhould flouriſh: The Accuſer may be drawn by Practice, whilſt he is in Perſon.

Judge Gaudy. The Statute you ſpeak of, concerning two Witneſſes, in Caſe of Treaſon, is found to be inconvenient; therefore by another Law it was taken away.

Ralegh. The common Trial of England is by Jury and Witneſſes.

Lord Chief Juſtice. No, by Examination: If three conſpire a Treaſon, and they all confeſs it; here is never a Witneſs, yet they are condemned.

Judge Warburton. I marvel, Sir Walter, that you being of ſuch Experience and Wit, ſhould ſtand on this Point; for ſo, many Horſe-ſtealers may eſcape, if they may not be condemned without Witneſſes. If one ſhould ruſh into the King's Privy-Chamber, whilſt he is alone, and kill the King (which God forbid) and this Man be met coming with his Sword drawn all bloody; ſhall not he be condemned to Death? My Lord Cobham hath, perhaps, been laboured withal; and to ſave you, his old Friend, it may be that he will deny all that which he hath ſaid.

Ralegh. I know not how you conceive the Law.

Lord Chief Juſtice. Nay, we do not conceive the Law, but we know the Law.

Ralegh. The Wiſdom of the Law of God, is abſolute and perfect, Hæc fac, & vives, &c. But now by the Wiſdom of the State, the Wiſdom of the Law is uncertain. Indeed where the Accuſer is not to be had conveniently, I agree with you; but here my Accuſer may, he is alive, and in the Houſe. Suſanna had been condemned, if Daniel had not cried out: Will you condemn an innocent Iſraelite, without Examination or Knowledge of the Truth? Remember it is abſolutely the Commandment of God; if a falſe Witneſs riſe up, you ſhall cauſe him to be brought before the Judges; if he be found falſe, he ſhall have the Puniſhment which the Accuſed ſhould have had. It is very ſure, for my Lord to accuſe me is my certain Danger, and may be a means to excuſe himſelf.

Lord Chief Juſtice. There muſt not ſuch a Gap be opened for the Deſtruction of the King, as would be, if we ſhould grant this. You plead hard for yourſelf, but the Laws plead as hard for the King. I did never hear that Courſe to be taken in a Caſe of Treaſon, as to write to one another, or ſpeak to one another, during the Time of their Impriſonment. There hath been Intelligence between you, and what underhand Practices there may be, I know not. If the Circumſtances agree not with the Evidence, we will not condemn you.

Ralegh. The King deſires nothing but the Knowledge of the Truth, and would have no Advantage taken by Severity of the Law. If ever we had a gracious King, now we have! I hope, as he is, ſuch are his Miniſters. If there be but a Trial of five Marks at the Common Law, a Wia Witneſs muſt be depoſed. Good my Lords, let my Accuſer come Face to Face, and be depoſed.

Lord Chief Juſtice. You have no Law for it: God forbid any Man ſhould accuſe himſelf, upon his Oath.

Attorney. The Law preſumes, a Man will not accuſe himſelf to accuſe another. You are an odious Man: For Cobham thinks his Cauſe the worſe, that you are in it. Now you ſhall hear of ſome Stirs to be raiſed in Scotland.

Part of Copley's Examination.

" Alſo Watſon told me, that a ſpecial Perſon " told him that Aremberg offered to him a thou- " ſand Crowns to be in that Action; and that " Brook ſaid, the Stirs in Scotland came out of Ra- " legh's Head. "

Ralegh. Brook hath been taught his Leſſon.

Lord H. Howard. This Examination was taken before me; Did I teach him his Leſſon?

Ralegh. I proteſt before God, I meant it not by any Privy-Counſellor; but, becauſe Money is ſcant, he will juggle on both Sides.

Ralegh's Examination.

" The way to invade England, were to begin " with Stirs in Scotland.

Ralegh. I think ſo ſtill: I have ſpoken it to divers of the Lords of the Council, by way of Diſcourſe and Opinion.

Attorney. Now let us come to thoſe Words of Deſtroying the King and his Cubs.

Ralegh. O barbarous! if they, like unnatural Villains, ſhould uſe thoſe Words, ſhall I be charged with them? I will not hear it; I was never falſe to the Crown of England. I have ſpent 40000 Crowns of mine own, againſt the Spaniſh Faction, for the Good of my Country. Do you bring the Words of theſe helliſh Spiders, Clark, Watſon, and others, againſt me?

Attorney. Thou haſt a Spaniſh Heart, and thy ſelf art a Spider of Hell; for thou confeſſeſt the King to be a moſt ſweet and gracious Prince, and yet haſt conſpired againſt him.

Watſon's Examination read.

" He ſaid, that George Brook told him twice, " that his Brother, the Lord Cobham, ſaid to him, " That you are but on the Bye, but Ralegh and I " are on the Main.

Brook's Examination read.

" Being ask'd what was meant by this Jargon " the Bye and the Main, he ſaid, That the Lord " Cobham told him, that Grey and others, were in " the Bye, he and Ralegh were on the Main. Be- " ing ask'd what Expoſition his Brother made of " theſe Words, he ſaid, he is loth to repeat it. " And after ſaith, by the Main, was meant, the " taking away of the King and his Iſſue. And " thinks on his Conſcience, it was infuſed into his " Brother's Head by Ralegh.

Cobham's Examination read.

Being ask'd, if ever he had ſaid, It will never be well in England, till the King and his Cubs were taken away. He ſaid, He had anſwered before, and that he would anſwer no more to that Point.

Ralegh. I am not named in all this: There is a Law of two Sorts of Accuſers, one of his own Knowledge, another by Hear-ſay.

Earl of Suffolk. See the Caſe of Arnold.

Lord Chief Juſtice. It is the Caſe of Sir William Thomas, and Sir Nicholas Arnold.

Ralegh. If this may be, you will have any Man's Life in a Week.

Attorney. Ralegh ſaith, That Cobham was in a Paſſion when he ſaid ſo. Would he tell his Brother any thing of Malice againſt Ralegh, whom he loved as his Life?

Ralegh. Brook never loved me; until his Brother had accuſed me, he ſaid nothing.

Lord Cecil. We have heard nothing that might lead us to think, that Brook accuſed you, he was only in the Surpriſing Treaſon; for by accuſing you, he ſhould accuſe his Brother.

Ralegh. He doth not care much for that.

Lord Cecil. I muſt judge the beſt. The Accuſation of his Brother was not voluntary; he pared every thing, as much as he could, to ſave his Brother.

Cobham's Examination read.

" He ſaith, he had a Book written againſt the " Title of the King, which he had of Ralegh, and " that he gave it to his Brother: Ralegh ſaid, it " was fooliſhly written.

Attorney. After the King came within twelve Miles of London, Cobham never came to ſee him, and intended to travel without ſeeing the Queen, and the Prince. Now in this Diſcontentment, you gave him the Book, and he gave it to his Brother.

Ralegh. I never gave it him, he took it off my Table. For I well remember, a little before that time, I received a Challenge from Sir Amias Preſton, and for that I did intend to anſwer it, I reſolved to leave my Eſtate ſettled, therefore laid out all my looſe Papers, amongſt which was this Book.

Lord Howard. Where had you this Book?

Ralegh. In the old Lord-Treaſurer's Study, after his Death.

Lord Cecil. Did you ever ſhew or make known the Book to me?

Ralegh. No, my Lord.

Lord Cecil. Was it one of the Books which was left to me or my Brother?

Ralegh. I took it out of the Study in my Lord Treaſurer's Houſe in the Strand.

Lord Cecil. After my Father's deceaſe, Sir Walter Ralegh deſired to ſearch for ſome Coſmographical Deſcriptions of the Indies, which he thought were in his Study, and were not to be had in print; which I granted, and would have truſted Sir Walter Ralegh as ſoon as any Man; tho' ſince, for ſome Infirmities, the Bands of my Affection to him have been broken; and yet, reſerving my Duty to the King my Maſter, which I can by no means diſpenſe with, by God, I love him, and have a great Conflict within myſelf: But I muſt needs ſay, Sir Walter uſed me a little unkindly, to take the Book away without my Knowledge; nevertheleſs I need make no Apology in Behalf of my Father, conſidering how uſeful and neceſſary it is for Privy-Counſellors, and thoſe in his Place, to intercept and keep ſuch kind of Writings; for whoſoever ſhould then ſearch his Study, may in all likelihood find all the notorious Libels that were writ againſt the late Queen; and whoſoever ſhould rumage my Study, or at leaſt my Cabinet, may find ſeveral againſt the King, our ſoveraign Lord, ſince his Acceſſion to the Throne.

Ralegh. This Book was in Manuſcript, and the late Lord Treaſurer had wrote in the Beginning of it with his own Hands theſe Words, This is the Book of Robert Snagg. And I do own, as my Lord Cecil has ſaid, that I believe they may alſo find in my Houſe, almoſt all the Libels, that have been writ againſt the late Queen.

Attorney. You were no Privy-Counſellor, and I hope never ſhall be.

Lord Cecil. He was not a ſworn Counſellor of State, but he has been called to Conſultations.

Ralegh. I think it a very ſevere Interpretation of the Law, to bring me within Compaſs of Treaſon for this Book, writ ſo long ago, of which nobody had read any more than the Heads of the Chapters, and which was burnt by Brook without my Privity; admitting I had delivered the ſame to my Lord Cobham, without allowing or approving, but diſcommending it, according to Cobham's firſt Accuſation. And put the Caſe I ſhould come to my Lord Cecil, as I have often done, and find a Stranger with him, with a Packet of Libels, and my Lord ſhould let me have one or two of them to peruſe, This I hope is no Treaſon.

Attorney. I obſerve there was Intelligence between you and Cobham in the Tower; for after he ſaid, It was againſt the King's Title, he denied it again.

Sir William Wade. Firſt my Lord Cobham confeſſeth it, and after he had ſubſcribed it, he revoked it again: To me he always ſaid, That the Drift of it was againſt the King's Title.

Ralegh. I proteſt before God, and all his Works, I gave him not the Book.

Nota. Sir Robert Wroth ſpeaketh, or whiſpereth ſomething ſecretly.

Attorney. My Lords, I muſt complain of Sir Robert Wroth; he ſays, this Evidence is not material.

Sir Robert Wroth. I never ſpake the Words.

Attorney. Let Mr. Serjeant Philips teſtify, whether he heard them.

Lord Cecil. I will give my Word for Sir Robert Wroth.

Sir Robert Wroth. I will ſpeak as truly as you, Mr. Attorney, for, by God, I never ſpake it.

Lord Chief Juſtice. Wherefore ſhould this Book be burnt?

Ralegh. I burned it not.

Serj. Philips. You preſented your Friend with it, when he was diſcontented. If it had been before the Queen's Death, it had been a leſs matter; but you gave it him preſently when he came from the King, which was the time of his Diſcontentment.

Ralegh. Here is a Book ſuppoſed to be Treaſonable; I never read it, commended it, or deliver'd it, nor urged it.

Attorney. This is cunning.

Ralegh. Every thing that doth make for me is cunning, and every thing that maketh againſt me is probable.

Attorney. Lord Cobham ſaith, that Kemiſh came to him with a Letter torn, and did wiſh him not to be diſmay'd, for one Witneſs could not hurt him.

Ralegh. This poor Man hath been cloſe Priſoner theſe eighteen Weeks; he was offered the Rack to make him confeſs. I never ſent any ſuch Meſſage by him; I only writ to him, to tell him what I had done with Mr. Attorney; having of his, at that time, a great Pearl, and a Diamond.

Lord H. Howard. No Circumſtance moveth me more, than this, Kemiſh was never on the Rack; the King gave Charge, that no Rigour ſhould be uſed.

Commiſſioners. We proteſt before God, there was no ſuch Matter intended, to our Knowledges.

Ralegh. Was not the Keeper of the Rack ſent for, and he threatned with it?

Sir William Wade. When Mr. Sollicitor and my ſelf examined Kemiſh, we told him he deſerved the Rack, but did not threaten him with it.

Commiſſioners. It was more than we knew.

Cobham's Examination read.

" He ſaid, Kemiſh brought him a Letter from " Ralegh, and that Part which was concerning the " Lords of the Council, was rent out; that he was " examined, and cleared him of all; and that the " Lord H. Howard ſaid, becauſe he was diſcon- " tent, he was fit to be in the Action. And fur- " ther, that Kemiſh ſaid to him from Ralegh, that " he ſhould be of good Comfort, for one Witneſs " could not condemn a Man for Treaſon.

Lord Cecil. Cobham was asked whether and when he heard from you; he ſaid, every Day.

Ralegh. Kemiſh added more, I never bad him ſpeak theſe Words.

Nota. Mr. Attorney here offered to interrupt him.

Lord Cecil. It is his laſt Diſcourſe. Give him leave Mr. Attorney.

Ralegh. I am accuſed concerning Arabella, concerning Money out of Spain. My Lord Chief Juſtice ſaith, a Man may be condemned with one Witneſs, yea without any Witneſs. Cobham is guilty of many things, Conſcientia mille Teſtes. He hath accuſed himſelf, what can he hope for but Mercy? My Lords, vouchſafe me this Grace. Let him be brought, being alive, and in the Houſe; let him avouch any of theſe things, I will confeſs the whole Indictment, and renounce the King's Mercy.

Lord Cecil. Here hath been a touch of the Lady Arabella Stuart, a near Kinſwoman of the King's. Let us not ſcandal the Innocent by Confuſion of Speech: She is as innocent of all theſe Things as I, or any Man here; only ſhe received a Letter from Cobham, to prepare her; which ſhe laugh'd at, and immediately ſent it to the King. So far was ſhe from Diſcontentment, that ſhe laugh'd him to ſcorn. But you ſee how far the Count of Aremberg did conſent.

The Lord Admiral (Nottingham) being by in a Standing, with the Lady Arabella, ſpake to the Court.

The Lady doth here proteſt upon her Salvation, that ſhe never dealt in any of theſe things, and ſo ſhe willed me to tell the Court.

Lord Cecil. The Lord Cobham wrote to my Lady Arabella, to know if he might come to ſpeak with her, and gave her to underſtand, that there were ſome about the King, that laboured to diſgrace her; ſhe doubted it was but a Trick. But Brook ſaith, his Brother moved him to procure Arabella to write Letters to the King of Spain: But he ſaith, he never did.

Ralegh. The Lord Cobham hath accuſed me, you ſee in what manner he hath forſworn it. Were it not for his Accuſation, all this were nothing. Let him be asked, if I knew of the Letter which

Lawren-

Lawrency brought to him from Aremberg. Let me ſpeak for my Life, it can be no hurt for him to be brought; he dares not accuſe me. If you grant me not this Favour, I am ſtrangely uſed. Campian was not denied to have his Accuſers Face to Face.

Lord Chief Juſtice. Since he muſt needs have Juſtice, the acquitting of his old Friend may move him to ſpeak otherwiſe than the Truth.

Ralegh. If I had been the Infuſer of all theſe Treaſons into him. You Gentlemen of the Jury, mark this: He ſaid, I have been the Cauſe of all his Miſeries, and the Deſtruction of his Houſe; and that all Evil hath happened unto him, by my wicked Counſel; if this be true, whom hath he Cauſe to accuſe, and be revenged on, but on me? And I know him to be as revengeful, as any Man on Earth.

Attorney. He is a Party, and may not come, the Law is againſt it.

Ralegh. It is a Toy to tell me of Law, I deſy ſuch Law, I ſtand on the Fact.

Lord Cecil. I am afraid my often ſpeaking (who am inferior to my Lords here preſent) will make the World think, I delight to hear myſelf talk. My Affection to you, Sir Walter Ralegh, was not extinguiſhed, but ſlaked, in regard of your Deſerts. You know the Law of the Realm (to the which your Mind doth not conteſt) that my Lord Cobham cannot be brought.

Ralegh. He may be, my Lord.

Lord Cecil. But dare you challenge it?

Ralegh. No.

Lord Cecil. You ſay, that my Lord Cobham, your main Accuſer, muſt come to accuſe you. You ſay, he hath retracted: I ſay many Particulars are not retracted. What the Validity of all this is, is merely left to the Jury. Let me ask you this: If my Lord Cobham will ſay, you were the only Inſtigator of him to proceed in the Treaſons, dare you put yourſelf on this?

Ralegh. If he will ſpeak it before God and the King, that ever I knew of Arabella's Matter, or the Money out of Spain, or of the Surpriſing Treaſon; I put myſelf on it, God's Will and the King's be done with me.

Lord H. Howard How if he ſpeak things equivalent to what you have ſaid?

Ralegh. Yes, in a main Point.

Lord Cecil. If he ſay, you have been the Inſtigator of him to deal with the Spaniſh King, had not the Council cauſe to draw you hither?

Ralegh. I put myſelf on it.

Lord Cecil. Then, Sir Walter Ralegh, call upon God, and prepare yourſelf; for I do verily believe, my Lords will prove this. Excepting your Faults (I call them no worſe) by God, I am your Friend. The Heat and Paſſion in you, and the Attorney's Zeal in the King's Service, makes me ſpeak this.

Ralegh. Whoſoever is the Workman, it is reaſon he ſhould give Account of his Work to the Work-maſter. But let it be proved, that he acquainted me with any of his Conferences with Aremberg: He would ſurely have given me ſome Account.

Lord Cecil. That follows not. If I ſet you on Work, and you give me no Account, am I therefore innocent?

Attorney. For the Lady Arabella I ſaid, ſhe was never acquainted with the Matter. Now that Ralegh had Conference in all theſe Treaſons, it is manifeſt; the Jury hath heard the Matter. There is one Dyer, a Pilot, that being in Lisbon, met with a Portugal Gentleman, who asked him if the King of England was crowned yet? To whom he anſwered, I think not yet, but he ſhall be ſhortly. Nay, ſaith the Portugal Gentleman, that ſhall he never be, for his Throat will be cut by Don Ralegh and Don Cobham, before he be crowned.

Dyer was called and ſworn, and delivered this Evidence.

Dyer. I came to a Merchant's Houſe in Lisbon, to ſee a Boy that I had there; there came in a Gentleman into the Houſe, and enquiring what Countryman I was, I ſaid an Engliſhman: Whereupon he asked me, if the King was crowned? And I anſwered, that I hoped he ſhould be ſo ſhortly. Nay, ſaith he, he ſhall never be crowned, for Don Ralegh and Don Cobham will cut his Throat ere that Day come.

Ralegh. What infer you upon this?

Attorney. That your Treaſon hath Wings.

Ralegh. If Cobham did practiſe with Aremberg, how could it not but be known in Spain? Why did they name the Duke of Buckingham with Jack Straw's Treaſon, and the Duke of York with Jack Cade, but that it was to countenance his Treaſon?

Conſider, you Gentlemen of the Jury, there is no Cauſe ſo doubtful, which the King's Council cannot make good againſt the Law. Conſider my Diſability, and their Ability: They prove nothing againſt me, only they bring the Accuſation of my Lord Cobham, which he hath lamented and repented as heartily, as if it had been for a horrible Murther. For he knew, that all this Sorrow which ſhould come to me, is by his means. Preſumptions muſt proceed from precedent or ſubſequent Facts. I have ſpent 40000 Crowns againſt the Spaniard. I had not purchaſed forty Pounds a Year. If I had died in Guiana, I had not left 300 Marks a Year to my Wife and Son. I that have always condemned the Spaniſh Faction, methinks it is a ſtrange Thing, that now I ſhould affect it. Remember what St. Auſtin ſays, Sic judicate tanquam ab alio mox judicandi; unus judex, unum tribunal. If you would be contented, on Preſumptions, to be delivered up to be ſlaughtered, to have your Wives and Children turned into the Streets to beg their Bread; if you would be contented to be ſo judged, judge ſo of me.

Serj. Philips. I hope to make this ſo clear, as that the Wit of Man ſhall have no Colour to anſwer it. The Matter is Treaſon in the higheſt Degree, the End to deprive the King of his Crown. The particular Treaſons are theſe: Firſt, To raiſe up Rebellion; and, to effect that, to procure Money; to raiſe up Tumults in Scotland, by divulging a treaſonable Book againſt the King's Right to the Crown; the Purpoſe, to take the Life of his Majeſty and his Iſſue. My Lord Cobham confeſſeth Sir Walter Ralegh to be guilty of all theſe Treaſons. The Queſtion is, Whether he be guilty as joining with him, or inſtigating of him? The Courſe to prove this, was by my Lord Cobham's Accuſation. If that be true, he is guilty; if not, he is clear. So, whether Cobham ſay true, or Ralegh? That is the Queſtion. Ralegh hath no Anſwer, but the Shadow of as much Wit, as the Wit of Man can deviſe. He uſeth his bare Denial; the Denial of a Defendant muſt not move the Jury. In the Star-chamber, or in the Chancery, for matter of Title, if the Defendant be called in Queſtion, his Denial on his Oath is no Evidence to the Court to clear him, he doth it in propria Cauſa. Therefore much leſs in Matters of Treaſon. Cobham's Teſtification againſt him before then, and ſince, hath been largely diſcourſed.

Ralegh.

Ralegh. If Truth be conſtant, and Conſtancy be in Truth, Why hath he forſworn that, that he hath ſaid? You have not proved any one Thing by direct Proofs, but all by Circumſtances.

Attorney. Have you done? The King muſt have the laſt.

Ralegh. Nay, Mr. Attorney, he which ſpeaketh for his Life, muſt ſpeak laſt. Falſe Repetitions and Miſtakings muſt not mar my Cauſe. You ſhould ſpeak ſecundum allegata & probata. I appeal to God and the King, in this Point, Whether Cobham's Accuſation be ſufficient to condemn me.

Attorney. The King's Safety, and your Clearing, cannot agree. I proteſt, before God, I never knew a clearer Treaſon.

Ralegh. I never had Intelligence with Cobham ſince I came to the Tower.

Attorney. Go too, I will lay thee upon thy Back, for the confidenteſt Traytor that ever came at a Bar. Why ſhould you take 8000 Crowns for a Peace?

Lord Cecil. Be not ſo impatient, good Mr. Attorney, give him leave to ſpeak.

Attorney. If I may not be patiently heard, you will encourage Traytors, and diſcourage us. I am the King's ſworn Servant, and muſt ſpeak; if he be guilty, he is a Traytor; if not, deliver him.

Nota. Here Mr. Attorney ſat down and would ſpeak no more, until the Commiſſioners urged and intreated him: After much ado he went on, and made a long Repetition of all the Evidence, for the Direction of the Jury; and at the repeating of ſome things, Sir Walter Ralegh interrupted him, and ſaid, He did him Wrong.

Attorney. Thou art the moſt vile and execrable Traytor that ever lived.

Ralegh. You ſpeak indiſcreetly, barbarouſly and uncivilly.

Attorney. I want Words ſufficient to expreſs thy viperous Treaſons.

Ralegh. I think you want Words indeed, for you have ſpoken one Thing half a dozen times.

Attorney. Thou art an odious Fellow, thy Name is hateful to all the Realm of England for thy Pride.

Ralegh. It will go near to prove a meaſuring Caſt between you and me, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. Well, I will now make it appear to the World, that there never lived a viler Viper upon the Face of the Earth than thou; and therewithal drew a Letter out of his Pocket, ſaying further, My Lords, you ſhall ſee, this is an Agent, that hath writ a Treatiſe againſt the Spaniard, and hath ever ſo deteſted him; this is he, that hath ſpent ſo much Money againſt him in Service; and yet you ſhall all ſee, whether his Heart be not wholly Spaniſh. The Lord Cobham, who, of his own Nature was a good and honourable Gentleman, till overtaken by this Wretch, now finding his Conſcience heavily burthened with ſome Courſes, which the Subtilty of this Traytor had drawn him into, my Lords, he could not be at reſt with himſelf, nor quiet in his Thoughts, until he was eaſed of that heavy Weight; out of which Paſſion of his Mind, and Diſcharge of his Duty to his Prince, and his Conſcience to God, taking it upon his Salvation, that he wrote nothing but the Truth, with his own Hands he wrote this Letter. Now, Sir, you ſhall ſee whether you had Intelligence with Cobham, within four Days before he came to the Tower. If he be wholly Spaniſh, that deſired a Penſion of 1500 Pounds a Year from Spain, that Spain by him might have Intelligence, then Ralegh is a Traytor. He hath taken an Apple, and pinned a Letter unto it, and threw it into my Lord Cobham's Window; the Contents whereof were this; It is doubtful whether we ſhall be proceeded with or no, perhaps you ſhall not be tried. This was to get a Retractation. Oh! it was Adam's Apple, whereby the Devil did deceive him. Further he wrote thus, Do not as my Lord of Eſſex did; take heed of a Preacher; for by his Perſuaſion he confeſſed, and made himſelf guilty. I doubt not, but this Day, God ſhall have as great a Conqueſt by this Traytor, and the Son of God ſhall be as much glorified, as when it was ſaid, Viciſti Galilæe; you know my meaning. What tho' Cobham retracted, yet he could not reſt nor ſleep, until he had confirmed it again. If this be not enough to prove him a Traytor, the King my Maſter ſhall not live three Years to an end.

Nota. Here Mr. Attorney produced the Lord Cobham's Letter (writ to the Commiſſioners the Night before Ralegh's Trial, viz. Nov. 16.) and as he read it, inſerted ſome Speeches.

I have thought it fit, to ſet down this to my Lords, wherein I profeſs on my Soul, to write nothing but the Truth. I am come now near to the Period of my Time, therefore I confeſs the Truth before God, and his Angels. Ralegh, four Days before I came to the Tower, cauſed an Apple (Eve's Apple) to be thrown in at my Chamber-window; the Effect of it was to intreat me to right the Wrong that I had done him, in ſaying, That I ſhould have come home by Jerſey; which under my Hand to him, I have retracted. His firſt Letter I anſwered not, which was thrown in the ſame manner, wherein he prayed me to write him a Letter, which I did. He ſent me Word, that the Judges were at Mr. Attorney's Houſe, and that there was good Hope the Proceedings againſt us ſhould be ſtaid; he ſent me another Time a little Tobacco. At Aremberg's coming, Ralegh dealt with me, to procure him a Penſion of 1500 Pounds a Year, for which he promiſed that no Action ſhould be againſt Spain, but he would give Knowledge before-hand. He told me the States had Audience with the King. (Ah, is not this a Spaniſh Heart in an Engliſh Body?) He hath been the original Cauſe of my Ruin; for I had no dealing with Aremberg, but by his Inſtigation. He hath been alſo the Cauſe of my Diſcontentment; he adviſed me, not to be overtaken with Preachers, as Eſſex was, and that the King would better allow of a conſtant Denial, than to accuſe any.

Attorney. O damnable Atheiſt! he hath learned ſome Text of Scripture, to ſerve his own Purpoſe, but falſly alledged. He counſels him, not to be counſelled by Preachers, as Eſſex was: He died the Child of God, God honoured him at his Death; Thou waſt by when he died, Et Lupus & turpes inſtant morientibus Urſæ. He died indeed for his Offence. The King himſelf ſpake theſe Words; He that ſhall ſay Eſſex died not for Treaſon, is puniſhable.

Ralegh. You have heard a ſtrange Tale of a ſtrange Man; now he thinks he hath Matter enough to deſtroy me; but the King, and all of you ſhall witneſs by our Deaths, which of us was the Ruin of the other. I bid a poor Fellow throw in the Letter at his Window, written to this Purpoſe, You know you have undone me, now write three Lines to juſtify me. In this I will die, that he hath done me Wrong: Why did not he acquaint me with his Treaſons, if I acquainted him with my Diſpoſitions?

Attorney.

Attorney. But what ſay you now of the Letter, and the Penſion of 1500 l. per Annum?

Ralegh. I ſay, that Cobham is a baſe diſhonourable poor Soul.

Attorney. Is he baſe? I return it into thy Throat, on his behalf: But for thee, he had been a good Subject.

Lord Chief Juſtice. I perceive thou art not ſo clear a Man, as you have proteſted all this while; for you ſhould have diſcovered theſe Matters to the King.

Nota. Here Ralegh pulled a Letter out of his Pocket, which the Lord Cobham had written to him (but a few Days before he wrote that above to the Lords) and deſired my Lord Cecil to read it, becauſe he only knew his Hand; the Effect of it was as followeth.

Cobham's Letter of Juſtification to Ralegh.

" Seeing my ſelf ſo near my End, for the Diſ-" charge of my own Conſcience, and freeing my
" ſelf from your Blood, which elſe will cry Ven" geance againſt me: I proteſt upon my Salvation,
" I never practiſed with Spain by your Procure" ment; God ſo comfort me in this my Afflic-" tion, as you are a true Subject for any thing that " I know. I will ſay, as Daniel, Purus ſum à " ſanguine hujus. So God have Mercy on my " Soul, as I know no Treaſon by you.

Ralegh. Now I wonder how many Souls this Man hath! He damns one in this Letter, and another in that.

Here was much ado; Mr. Attorney alledged, that his laſt Letter was politickly and cunningly urged from the Lord Cobham, and that the firſt was ſimply the Truth; and that leſt it ſhould ſeem doubtful, that the firſt Letter was drawn from my Lord Cobham by Promiſe of Mercy, or Hope of Favour, the Lord Chief Juſtice willed, that the Jury might herein be ſatisfied. Whereupon the Earl of Devonſhire delivered, that the ſame was merely voluntary, and not extracted from the Lord Cobham, upon any Hopes or Promiſe of Pardon.

Nota. This was the laſt Evidence; whereupon a Marſhal was ſworn, to keep the Jury private. The Jury departed, and ſtaid not a quarter of an Hour, but returned, and gave their Verdict Guilty.

Serj. Hele demanded Judgment againſt the Priſoner.

Clerk of the Crown. Sir Walter Ralegh, Thou haſt been indicted, arraigned, and pleaded not guilty, for all theſe ſeveral Treaſons; and for Trial thereof, haſt put thy ſelf upon thy Country; which Country are theſe, who have found thee Guilty. What canſt thou ſay for thyſelf, why Judgment and Execution of Death, ſhould not paſs againſt thee?

Ralegh. My Lords, The Jury have found me Guilty. They muſt do as they are directed. I can ſay nothing, why Judgment ſhould not proceed. You ſee whereof Cobham hath accuſed me. You remember his Proteſtations, that I was never Guilty. I deſire the King ſhould know of the Wrongs done unto me, ſince I came hither.

Lord Chief Juſtice. You have had no Wrong, Sir Walter.

Ralegh. Yes, of Mr. Attorney. I deſire, my Lords, to remember three things to the King. 1. I was accuſed to be a Practiſer for Spain: I never knew, that my Lord Cobham meant to go thither; I will ask no Mercy at the King's Hands, if he will affirm it. 2. I never knew of the Practice with Arabella. 3. I never knew of my Lord Cobham's Practice with Aremberg, nor of the ſurpriſing Treaſon.

Lord Chief Juſtice. In my Conſcience I am perſuaded, that Cobham hath accuſed you truly. You cannot deny, but that you were dealt with, to have a Penſion to be a Spy for Spain; therefore you are not ſo true to the King, as you have proteſted yourſelf to be.

Ralegh. I ſubmit my ſelf to the King's Mercy; I know his Mercy is greater than my Offence. I recommend my Wife, and Son, of tender Years, unbrought up, to his Compaſſion.

Lord Chief Juſtice. I had thought I ſhould never have ſeen this Day, to have ſtood in this Place, to give Sentence of Death againſt you; becauſe I thought it impoſſible, that one of ſo great Parts ſhould have fallen ſo grievouſly. God hath beſtowed on you many Benefits. You had been a Man fit, and able, to have ſerved the King in good Place. You had brought yourſelf into a good State of Living: If you had entered into a good Conſideration of your Eſtate, and not ſuffered your own Wit to have entrapped yourſelf, you might have lived in good Comfort. It is beſt for Man not to ſeek to climb too high, leſt he fall; nor yet to creep too low, leſt he be trodden on. It was the Poſie of the wiſeſt and greateſt Counſellor of his Time, in England, In medio ſpatio mediocria firma locantur. You might have lived well with 3000 l. a Year, for ſo I have heard your Revenues to be. I know nothing might move you to be diſcontented; but, if you had been down, you know Fortune's Wheel, when it is turned about, riſeth again. I never heard, that the King took away any thing from you, but the Captainſhip of the Guard, which he did with good Reaſons, to have one of his own Knowledge, whom he might truſt in that Place. You have been taken for a wiſe Man, and ſo have ſhewed Wit enough this Day. Again, for Monopolies for Wine, &c. If the King had ſaid, It is a Matter that offends my People, ſhould I burthen them for your particular good? I think, you could not well take it hardly, that his Subjects were eaſed, tho' by your private Hindrance. Two Vices have lodged chiefly in you; one is an eager Ambition; the other corrupt Covetouſneſs. Ambition, in deſiring to be advanced to equal Grace and Favour, as you have been before-time; that Grace you had then, you got not in a Day or Year. For your Covetouſneſs, I am ſorry to hear that a Gentleman of your Wealth ſhould become a baſe Spy for the Enemy, which is the vileſt of all other; wherein, on my Conſcience, Cobham hath ſaid true: By it you would have increaſed your Living 1500 l. a Year. This Covetouſneſs is like a Canker, that eats the Iron-place where it lives. Your Caſe being thus, let it not grieve you, if I ſpeak a little out of Zeal, and Love, to your Good. You have been taxed by the World, with the Defence of moſt heatheniſh, and blaſphemous Opinions, which I liſt not to repeat, becauſe Chriſtian Ears cannot endure to hear them, nor the Authors and Maintainers of them be ſuffered to live in any Chriſtian Common-wealth. You know what Men ſaid of Harpool. You ſhall do well before you go out of the World, to give Satisfaction therein, and not to die with theſe Imputations on you. Let not any Devil perſuade you to think, there is no Eternity in Heaven; if you think thus, you ſhall find Eternity in Hell-fire. In the firſt Accuſation of my Lord Cobham, I obſerved his manner of ſpeaking: I proteſt before the Living God, I am perſuaded he ſpoke nothing but the Truth. You wrote, that he ſhould not in any caſe confeſs any thing to a Preacher, telling him an Example of my Lord of Eſſex, that noble Earl that is gone; who, if he had not been carried away with others, had lived in Honour to this Day among us. He confeſſed his Offences, and obtained Mercy of the Lord; for I am verily perſuaded in my Heart, he died a worthy Servant of God. Your Conceit of not confeſſing any thing, is very inhuman and wicked. In this World is the Time of confeſſing, that we may be abſolved at the Day of Judgment. You have ſhewed a fearful Sign of denying God, in adviſing a Man not to confeſs. It now comes in my mind, why you may not have your Accuſer Face to Face; for ſuch a one is eaſily brought to retract, when he ſeeth there is no Hope of his own Life. It is dangerous that any Traytors ſhould have any Acceſs one to another, or Conference; when they ſee themſelves muſt die, they will think it beſt to ſee their Fellow live, that he may commit the like Treaſon again, and ſo in ſome ſort ſeek Revenge.

Now it reſteth to pronounce the Judgment, which I wiſh you had not been this Day to have received of me: For, if the Fear of God in you had been anſwerable to your other great Parts, you might have lived to have been a ſingular good Subject. I never ſaw the like Trial, and I hope, I ſhall never ſee the like again.

The JUDGMENT.

But ſince you have been found Guilty of theſe horrible Treaſons, the Judgment of the Court is, that you ſhall be had from hence to the Place whence you came, there to remain until the Day of Execution; and from thence you ſhall be drawn upon a Hurdle through the open Streets, to the Place of Execution, there to be hanged and cut down alive, and your Body ſhall be opened, your Heart and Bowels plucked out, and your Privy-Members cut off and thrown into the Fire, before your Eyes; then your Head to be ſtrucken off from your Body, which ſhall be divided into four Quarters, to be diſpoſed of at the King's Pleaſure: And God have Mercy upon your Soul.

HOW unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my ſelf, to undertake a work of this mixture; mine own reaſon, though exceeding weak, hath ſufficiently reſolved me. For had it been begotten then with my firſt dawn of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it ſelf to my younger years; and before any wound received, either from fortune or time: I might yet well have doubted, that the darkneſs of age and death would have covered over both it and me, long before the performance. For, beginning with the creation, I have proceeded with the Hiſtory of the World; and laſtly purpoſed (ſome few ſallies excepted) to confine my diſcourſe, within this our renowned iſland of Great Britain. I confeſs that it had better ſorted with my diſability, the better part of whoſe times are run out in other travels; to have ſet together (as I could) the unjointed and ſcattered frame of our Engliſh affairs, than of the univerſal: in whom had there been no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempeſtuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But thoſe inmoſt, and ſoul-piercing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured: with the deſire to ſatisfy thoſe friends, which I have tried by the fire of adverſity; the former enforcing, the latter perſwading; have cauſed me to make my thoughts legible, and my ſelf the ſubject of every opinion, wiſe or weak.

To the world I preſent them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have others that were (fortune changing) ſped much better in any age. For, proſperity and adverſity have evermore tied and untied vulgar affections. And as we ſee it in experience, That dogs do always bark at thoſe they know not; and that it is in their nature to accompany one another in thoſe clamours: ſo is it with the inconſiderate multitude. Who, wanting that virtue which we call honeſty in all men, and that eſpecial gift of God which we call charity in chriſtian men; condemn, without hearing; and wound, without offence given; led thereunto by uncertain report only; [a] which his majeſty truly acknowledgeth for the author of all lyes. [b] Blame no man (ſaith Siracides*) before thou have inquired the matter: underſtand firſt, and then reform righteouſly. Rumor, res ſine teſte, ſine judice, maligna, fallax; rumour is without witneſs, without judge, malicious and deceivable.* This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave S. Auguſtine argument to affirm, That he feared the praiſe of good men, and deteſted that of the evil. [c] And herein no man hath given a better rule, than this of Seneca; Conſcicntiæ ſatisfacimus: nihil in famam laboremus; ſequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis. Let us ſatisfy our own conſciences, and not trouble our ſelves with fame: be it never ſo ill, it is to be deſpiſed ſo we deſerve well.

For my ſelf, if I have in any thing ſerved my country, and priſed it before my private: the general acceptation can yield me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair ſun-ſhine day to a ſea-man after ſhipwreck; and the contrary, no other harm than an outragious tempeſt after the port attained. I know that I loſt the love of many, for my fidelity towards her, whom I muſt ſtill honour in the duſt; though further than the defence of her excellent perſon I never perſecuted any man. Of thoſe that did it, and by what device they did it: he that is the ſupreme judge of all the world, hath taken the account; ſo as for this kind of ſuffering, I muſt ſay with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themſelves fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them: I can neither envy at ſuch their purchaſed glory, nor much lament mine own miſhap in that kind; but content my ſelf to ſay with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars.

To labour other ſatisfaction, were an effect of phrenzy, not of hope: ſeeing it is not truth, but opinion, that can travel the world without a paſs-port. For were it otherwiſe; and were there not as many internal forms of the mind, as there are external figures of men; there were then ſome poſſibility, to perſwade by the mouth of one advocate, even equity alone.

But ſuch is the multiplying and extenſive virtue of dead earth, and of that breath-giving life which God hath caſt upon ſlime and duſt: as that among thoſe that were, of whom we read and hear, and among thoſe that are, whom we ſee and converſe with; every one hath received a ſeveral picture of face, and every one a diverſe picture of mind: every one a form apart, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein nature ſo much triumpheth, as in diſſimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found ſo great diverſity of opinions; ſo ſtrong a contrariety of inclinations; ſo many natural and unnatural; wiſe, fooliſh; manly, and childiſh affections and paſſions in mortal men. For it is not the viſible faſhion and ſhape of plants, and of reaſonable creatures, that makes the difference, of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the formal and internal.

And though it hath pleaſed God, to reſerve the art of reading men's thoughts to himſelf: yet, as the fruit tells the name of the tree; ſo do the outward works of men (ſo far as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to gueſs at the reſt. Nay, it were not hard to expreſs the one by the other, very near the life; did not craft in many, fear in the moſt, and the world's love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compaſs it hath, to qualify and mask over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be alſo true, Nemo poteſt diu perſonam ferre fictam: cito in naturam ſuam reſidunt, quibus veritas non ſubeſt. No Man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour: the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long diſſemble their own natures. Neither can any man (ſaith Plutarch) ſo change himſelf, but that his heart may be ſometimes ſeen at his tongue's end.

In this great diſcord and diſſimilitude of reaſonable creatures, if we direct our ſelves to the multitude; Omnis honeſtæ rei malus judex eſt vulgus, The common people are evil judges of honeſt things, and whoſe wiſdom (ſaith Eccleſiaſtes) is to be deſpiſed; if to the better ſort; every underſtanding hath a peculiar judgment, by which it both cenſureth other men, and valueth it ſelf. And therefore unto me it will not ſeem ſtrange, though I find theſe my worthleſs papers torn with rats: ſeeing the ſlothful cenſurers of all ages, have not ſpared to tax the reverend fathers of the church, with ambition; the ſevereſt men to themſelves, with hypocriſy; the greateſt lovers of juſtice, with popularity; and thoſe of the trueſt valour and fortitude, with vain-glory. [a] But of theſe natures, which lie in wait to find fault, and to turn good into evil, ſeeing [b] Solomon complained long ſince: and that the very age of the world renders it every day after other more malicious; I muſt leave the profeſſors to their eaſy ways of reprehenſion, than which there is nothing of more facility.

To me it belongs in the firſt part of this preface, following the common and approved cuſtom of thoſe who have left the memories of time paſt to after-ages; to give, as near as I can, the ſame right to hiſtory which they have done. Yet ſeeing therein I ſhould but borrow other men's words; I will not trouble the reader with the repetition. True it is, that among many other benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all human knowledge, that it hath given us life in our underſtanding, ſince the world it ſelf had life and beginning, even to this day: yea it hath triumphed over time, which, beſides it, nothing but eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledge over the vaſt and devouring ſpace of ſo many thouſands of years, and given ſo fair and piercing eyes to our mind; that we plainly behold living now, as if we had lived then, that great world, *Magni Dei ſapiens opus, the wiſe work (*ſaith Hermes) of a great God, as it was then, when but new to it ſelf. By it I ſay it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with waters, and again re-peopled: how kings and kingdoms have flouriſhed and fallen; and for what virtue and piety God made proſperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the leaſt debt which we owe unto hiſtory, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead anceſtors; and, out of the depth and darkneſs of the earth, delivered us their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of hiſtory a policy no leſs wiſe than eternal; by the compariſon and application of other men's fore-paſſed miſeries, with our own like errors and ill deſervings.

But it is neither of examples the moſt lively inſtruction, nor the words of the wiſeſt men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet ſo wrought in our blind and ſtupified minds; as to make us remember, that the infinite eye and wiſdom of God doth pierce through all our pretences; as to make us remember, That the juſtice of God doth require none other accuſer, than our own conſciences: which neither the falſe beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacify the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the leaſt kind, cover from his knowledge. And ſo much did that heathen wiſdom confeſs, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (ſaith Euripides) having in his life committed wickedneſs, think he can hide it from the everlaſting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat God's judgments in particular, upon thoſe of all degrees, which have played with his mercies; would require a volume apart: for the ſea of examples hath no bottom. The marks, ſet on private men, are with their bodies caſt into the earth; and their fortunes, written only in the memories of thoſe that lived with them: ſo as they who ſucceed, and have not ſeen the fall of others, do not fear their own faults. God's judgments upon the greater and greateſt, have been left to poſterity; firſt, by thoſe happy hands which the Holy Ghoſt hath guided; and ſecondly, by their

virtue, who have gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to point far off, and to ſpeak of the converſion of angels into devils for ambition: or of the greateſt and moſt glorious kings, who have gnawn the graſs of the earth with beaſts, for pride and ingratitude towards God: or of that wiſe working of Pharaoh, when he ſlew the infants of Iſrael, ere they had recovered their cradles: or of the policy of Jezebel, in covering the murder of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the law; with many thouſands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopeleſs proof, that far-off examples would not be left to the ſame far-off reſpects, as heretofore? For who hath not obſerved, what labour, practice, peril, bloodſhed, and cruelty, the kings and princes of the world have undergone, exerciſed, taken on them, and committed; to make themſelves and their iſſues maſters of the world? And yet hath Babylon, Perſia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the reſt, no fruit, flower, graſs, nor leaf, ſpringing upon the face of the earth, of thoſe ſeeds: No; their very roots and ruins do hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta ſunt, vel manu hominum everruntur, vel ſtando & durando deficiunt; All that the hand of man can make, is either overturn'd by the hand of man, or at length by ſtanding and continuing conſumed. The reaſons of thoſe ruins, are diverſly given by thoſe that ground their opinions on ſecond cauſes. All kingdoms and ſtates have fallen (ſay the politicians) by outward and foreign force, or by inward negligence and diſſenſion, or by a third cauſe ariſing from both. Others obſerve, That the greateſt have ſunk down under their own weight; of which Livy hath a touch: Eo crevit, ut magnitudino laboret ſua: Others, That the divine providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath ſet down the date and period of every eſtate, before their firſt foundation and erection. But hereof I will give my ſelf a day over to reſolve.

For ſeeing the firſt books of the following ſtory, have undertaken the diſcourſe of the firſt kings and kingdoms: and that it is impoſſible for the ſhort life of a preface, to travel after and overtake far-off antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the preſent, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own kings, and their neighbour princes: who having beheld, both in divine and human letters, the ſucceſs of infidelity, injuſtice, and cruelty; have (notwithſtanding) planted after the ſame pattern.

True it is, that the judgments of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more ſtrange) the affection of any one man ſtirred up alike with examples of like nature: But every one is touched moſt, with that which moſt nearly ſeemeth to touch his own private; or otherwiſe beſt ſuteth with his apprehenſion. but the judgments of God are for ever unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long proceſs of time, and won to give his bleſſing in one age, to that which he hath curſed in another. Wherefore thoſe that are wiſe, or whoſe wiſdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to diſcern the bitter fruits of irreligious policy, as well among thoſe examples that are found in ages removed far from the preſent, as in thoſe of latter times. And that it may no leſs appear by evident proof, than by aſſeveration, That ill doing hath always been attended with ill ſucceſs; I will here, by way of preface, run over ſome examples, which the work enſuing hath not reached.

Among our kings of the Norman race, we have no ſooner paſſed over the violence of the Norman conqueſt, than we encounter with a ſingular and moſt remarkable example of God's juſtice, upon the children of Henry

the first. For that king, when both by force, craft, and cruelty, he had dispossess'd, over-reach'd, and lastly made blind and destroyed his elder brother Robert duke of Normandy, to make his own sons lords of this land: God cast them all, male and female, nephews and nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottom of the sea, with above a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were noble, and of the king dearly beloved.

To pass over the rest, till we come to Edward the second; it is certain, that after the murder of that king, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did again break out; and that so often, and in such abundance, as all our princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) died of the same disease. And although the young years of Edward the third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious: yet in that he afterwards caused his own uncle the earl of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his brother's redemption, whom the earl as then supposed to be living (the king making that to be treason in his uncle, which was indeed treason in himself, had his uncle's intelligence been true;) this, I say, made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to have it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

The cruelty, the secret and unsearchable judgment of God revenged, on the grand-child of Edward the third: and so it fell out, even to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried under the ruins of those buildings, of which the mortar had been tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his counsellors, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet he always took himself for over-wise to be taught by examples. The earls of Huntington and Kent, Montague and Spencer, who thought themselves as great politicians in those days, as others have done in these: hoping to please the king, and to secure themselves, by the murder of Gloceſter; died soon after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and far more shamefully than did that duke. And as for the king himself (who in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his greatness, cannot be excused, as the disavowing himself by breach of faith, charters, pardons, and patents) he was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his cousin-german and vassal, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the fourth.

This king, whose title was weak, and his obtaining the crown traiterous: who brake faith with the lords at his landing, protesting to intend only the recovery of his proper inheritance; brake faith with Richard himself; and brake faith with all the kingdom in parliament, to whom he swore that the deposed king should live. After that he had enjoyed this realm some few years, and in that time had been set upon on all sides by his subjects, and never free from conspiracies and rebellions: he saw (if souls immortal see and discern any things after the bodies death) his grand-child Henry the sixth, and his son the prince, suddenly, and without mercy, murdered; the possession of the crown (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race; and by the issues of his enemies worn and enjoyed: enemies, whom by his own practice he supposed that he had left no less powerless, than the succession of the kingdom questionless; by entailing the same upon his own issues by parliament. And out of doubt, human reaſon could have judged no otherwiſe, but that theſe cautious proviſions of the father, ſeconded by the valour and ſignal victories of his ſon Henry the fifth, had buried the hopes of every competitor, under the deſpair of all reconqueſt and recovery. I ſay, that human reaſon might ſo have judged: were not this paſſage of Caſaubon alſo true; Dies, hora, momentum, evertendis dominationibus ſufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus eſſe fundatæ; a day, an hour, a moment, is enough to overturn the things, that ſeemed to have been founded and rooted in adamant.

Now for Henry the ſixth, upon whom the great ſtorm of his grandfather's grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard the grandchild of Edward: although he was generally eſteemed for a gentle and innocent prince; yet as he refuſed the daughter of Armaignac, of the houſe of Navarre, the greateſt of the princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) and married the daughter of Anjou (by which he loſt all that he had in France) ſo in condeſcending to the unworthy death of his uncle of Gloceſter, the main and ſtrong pillar of the houſe of Lancaſter; he drew on himſelf and this kingdom the greateſt joint-loſs and diſhonour, that ever it ſuſtained ſince the Norman conqueſt. Of whom it may truly be ſaid, which a counſellor of his own ſpake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il eſtoit un fort gentil prince; mais ſon reigne eſt advenu en une fort mauvais temps: That he was a very gentle prince; but his reign happened in a very unfortunate ſeaſon.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolk were the practiſers and contrivers of the duke's death: Buckingham and Suffolk, becauſe the duke gave inſtructions to their authority, which otherwiſe under the queen had been abſolute; the queen, in reſpect of her perſonal wound, ſpretæque injuria formæ, becauſe Gloceſter diſſwaded her marriage. But the fruit was anſwerable to the ſeed; the ſucceſs to the counſel. For after the cutting down of Gloucaſter, York grew up ſo faſt, as he dared to diſpute his right, both by arguments and arms; in which quarrel, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greateſt number of their adherents, were diſſolved. And although for his breach of oath by ſacrament, it pleaſed God to ſtrike down York: yet his ſon the earl of March, following the plain path which his father had trodden out, deſpoiled Henry the father, and Edward the ſon, both of their lives and kingdoms. And what was the end now of that politick lady the queen, other than this, That ſhe lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: That ſhe lived to look on, while her husband the king, and her only ſon the prince, were hewen in ſunder; while the crown was ſet on his head that did it. She lived to ſee her ſelf deſpoiled of her eſtate, and of her moveables: and laſtly, her father, by rendring up to the crown of France, the earldom of Provence and other places, for the payment of fifty thouſand crowns for her ranſom, to become a ſtark beggar. And this was the end of that ſubtilty, which [a] Siracides calleth fine, but unrighteous: for other fruit hath it never yielded ſince the world was.

And now came it to Edward the fourth's turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaſter were rooted up; one only earl of Richmond excepted: whom alſo he had once bought of the duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward ſuch a plantation, as could any way promiſe it ſelf ſtability. For this Edward the king (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the ſlaughter, which Gloceſter, Dorſet, Haſtings, and others, made of Edward the prince in his own preſence: of which tragical actors, there was not one that eſcaped the judgment of God in the ſame kind. And he, which (beſides the execution of his brother of Clarence, for none other offence than he himſelf had formed in his own imagination) inſtructed Gloceſter to kill Henry the ſixth, his predeceſſor; taught him alſo by the ſame art to kill his own ſons and ſucceſſors Edward and Richard. For thoſe kings, which have ſold the blood of others at a low rate; have but made the market for their own enemies, to buy of theirs at the ſame price.

To Edward the fourth ſucceeded Richard the third, the greateſt maſter in miſchief of all that fore-went him: who although, for the neceſſity of his tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to perform in his own perſon, than all the reſt; yet he ſo well fitted every affection that play'd with him, as if each of them had but acted his own intereſt. For he wrought ſo cunningly upon the affections of Haſtings and Buckingham, enemies to the queen and to all her kindred; as he eaſily allured them to condeſcend, that Rivers and Grey, the king's maternal uncle and half-brother, ſhould (for the firſt) be ſevered from him: ſecondly, he wrought their conſent to have them impriſoned: and laſtly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their heads ſevered from their bodies. And having now brought thoſe his chief inſtruments to exerciſe that common precept, which the devil hath written on every poſt; namely, [a] To depreſs thoſe whom they had grieved, and to deſtroy thoſe whom they had depreſs'd; he urged that argument ſo far and ſo forcibly, as nothing but the death of the young king himſelf, and of his brother, could faſhion the concluſion. For he cauſed it to be hammered into Buckingham's head, That whenſoever the king, or his brother, ſhould have able years to exerciſe their power; they would take a moſt ſevere revenge of that cureleſs wrong, offered to their uncle and brother, Rivers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reaſoning with Haſtings, whoſe fidelity to his maſter's ſons was without ſuſpect: and yet the devil, who never diſſwades by impoſſibility, taught him to try him. And ſo he did. But when he found by Catesby, who ſounded him, that he was not fordable; he firſt reſolved to kill him ſitting in council: wherein having failed with his ſword; he ſet the hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And becauſe nothing elſe could move his appetite, he cauſed his head to be ſtricken off, before he eat his dinner. A greater judgment of God, than this upon Haſtings, I have never obſerved in any ſtory. For the ſelf-ſame day that the earl Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without trial of law, or offence given) by Haſtings's advice executed at Pomfret: I ſay, Haſtings himſelf in the ſame day, and (as I take it) in the ſame hour, in the ſame lawleſs manner had his head ſtricken off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perſwaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And having received the earldom of Hereford for reward, beſides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the king's only ſon; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his truſtieſt ſervant; he had his head ſevered from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his peers. And what ſucceſs had Richard himſelf after all theſe miſchiefs and murders, policies and counterpolicies to chriſtian Religion: and after ſuch time, as with a moſt mercileſs hand he had preſſed out the breath of his nephews and natural lords; other than the proſperity of ſo ſhort a life, as it took end, ere himſelf could well look over and diſcern it? The great outcry of innocent blood, obtaining at God's hands the effuſion of his; who became a ſpectacle of ſhame and diſhonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruel king, Henry the ſeventh cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate inſtrument of God's juſtice. A politick prince he was, if ever there were any; and who by the engine of his wiſdom, beat down and overturned as many ſtrong oppoſitions, both before and after he wore the crown, as ever king of England did: I ſay by his wiſdom, becauſe as he ever left the reins of his affections in the hands of his profit, ſo he always weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than ſo much as cannot be denied it in all human actions. He had well obſerved the proceedings of Loys the eleventh, whom he followed in all that was royal or royal-like, but he was far more juſt, and begun not their proceſſes, whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his ſervants, and therein exceeding wiſe; for whatſoever himſelf gave, he himſelf received back the thanks and the love, knowing it well that the affections of men (purchaſed by nothing ſo readily as by benefits) were trains that better became great kings, than great ſubjects. On the contrary, in whatſoever he grieved his ſubjects, he wiſely put it off on thoſe, that he found fit miniſters for ſuch actions. Howſoever, the taking off of Stanley's head, who ſet the crown on his, and the death of the young earl of Warwick, ſon to George duke of Clarence, ſhews, as the ſucceſs alſo did, that he held ſomewhat of the errors of his anceſtors, for his poſſeſſion in the firſt line ended in his grand-children, as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for king Henry the eighth: if all the pictures and patterns of a mercileſs prince were loſt in the world, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the ſtory of this king. For how many ſervants did he advance in haſte (but for what virtue no man could ſuſpect) and with the change of his fancy ruined again; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more deſert gave he abundant flowers, from whence to gather honey, and in the end of harveſt burnt them in the hive? How many wives did he cut off, and caſt off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many princes of the blood (whereof ſome of them for age could hardly crawl towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common chronicles have kept the account) did he execute? Yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to have given his account to God for the abundance of blood already ſpilt: he impriſoned the duke of Norfolk the father, and executed the earl of Surrey the ſon; the one, whoſe deſervings he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, and the king's ſervice; the other, never having committed any thing worthy of his leaſt diſpleaſure: the one exceeding valiant and adviſed; the other, no leſs valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But beſides the ſorrows which he heaped upon the fatherleſs, and widows at home; and beſides the vain enterpriſes abroad, wherein it is thought that he conſumed more treaſure, than all our victorious kings did in their ſeveral conqueſts: what cauſeleſs and cruel wars did he make upon his own nephew king James the fifth? What laws and wills did he deviſe, to eſtabliſh this kingdom in his own iſſues? Uſing his ſharpeſt weapons pons to cut off, and cut down thoſe branches, which ſprang from the ſame root that himſelf did. And in the end (notwithſtanding theſe his ſo many irreligious proviſions) it pleaſed God to take away all his own, without increaſe; though, for themſelves in their ſeveral kinds, all princes of eminent virtue. For theſe words of Samuel to Agag, king of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy ſword hath made other women childleſs: ſo ſhall thy mother be childleſs among other women. And that blood which the ſame king Henry affirmed, that the cold air of Scotland had frozen up in the north, God hath diffuſed by the ſun-ſhine of his grace: from whence his majeſty now living, and long to live, is deſcended. Of whom I may ſay it truly, that if all the malice of the world were infuſed into one eye: yet could it not diſcern in his life, even to this day, any one of thoſe foul ſpots, by which the conſciences of all the fore-named princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent blood on the ſword of his juſtice, with which the moſt that forewent him, have ſtained both their hands and fame. And for this crown of England; it may truly be avowed, that he hath received it even from the hand of God, and hath ſtayed the time of putting it on, howſoever he were provoked to haſten it: that he never took revenge of any man that ſought to put him beſide it: that he refuſed the aſſiſtance of her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever princeſs did: that his majeſty entered not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the ordinary gate, which his own right ſet open; and into which, by a general love and obedience, he was received. And howſoever his majeſty's preceding title to this kingdom, was preferred by many princes (witneſs the treaty at Cambray in the year 1559;) yet he never pleaſed to diſpute it, during the life of that renowned lady, his predeceſſor; no, notwithſtanding the injury of not being declared heir, in all the time of her long reign.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulneſs to God for the uniting of the northern parts of Britany to the ſouth; to wit, of Scotland to England; which, though they were ſevered but by ſmall brooks and banks, yet by reaſon of the long continued war, and the cruelties exerciſed upon each other, in the affection of the nations, they were infinitely ſevered. This, I ſay, is not the leaſt of God's bleſſings which his majeſty hath brought with him unto this land: No, put all our petty grievances together, and heap them up to their height, they will appear but as a mole-hill, compared with the mountain of this concord. And if all the hiſtorians ſince then, have acknowledged the uniting of the red roſe and the white, for the greateſt happineſs (Chriſtian religion excepted) that ever this kingdom received from God, certainly the peace between the two lions of gold and gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, beſides the ſparing of our Britiſh blood, heretofore and during the difference ſo often and abundantly ſhed, the ſtate of England is more aſſured, the kingdom more enabled to recover her ancient honour and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, polices and conqueſts. It is true that hereof we do not yet find the effect. But had the duke of Parma, in the year 1588, joined the army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the ſouth-coaſt; and had his majeſty at the ſame time declared himſelf againſt us in the north: it is eaſy to divine what had become of the liberty of England; certainly we would then without murmur have bought this union at a far greater price than it hath ſince coſt us.

It is true, that there was never any commonweal or kingdom in the world, wherein no man had cauſe to lament. Kings live in the world, and not above it. They are not infinite to examine every man's cauſe, or to relieve every man's wants. And yet, in the latter (though to his own prejudice) his majeſty hath had more compaſſion of other men's neceſſities, than of his own coffers. Of whom it may be ſaid, as of [a] Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem Cordis: which if other men do not underſtand with Pineda to be meant by liberality, but by latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better ſpoken of his majeſty, than of any king that ever England had; who, as well in divine as human underſtanding, hath exceeded all that forewent him, by many degrees.

I could ſay much more of the king's majeſty, without flattery, did I not fear the imputation of preſumption, and withal ſuſpect, that it might befal theſe papers of mine (though the loſs were little) as it did the pictures of queen Elizabeth, made by unskilful and common painters; which, by her own commandment, were knock'd in pieces and caſt into the fire. For ill artiſts, in ſetting out the beauty of the external; and weak writers, in deſcribing the virtues of the internal, do often leave to poſterity, of well-formed faces a deformed memory; and of the moſt perfect and princely minds, a moſt defective repreſentation. It may ſuffice, and there needs no other diſcourſe, if the honeſt reader but compare the cruel and turbulent paſſages of our former kings, and of other their neighbour princes (of whom for that purpoſe I have inſerted this brief diſcourſe) with his majeſty's temperate, revengeleſs, and liberal diſpoſition: I ſay, that if the honeſt reader weigh them juſtly, and with an even hand; and withal, but beſtow every deformed child on his true parent, he ſhall find, that there is no man which hath ſo juſt cauſe to complain, as the king himſelf hath.

Now as we have told the ſucceſs of the trumperies and cruelties of our own kings, and other great perſonages; ſo we find, that God is every-where the ſame God. And as it pleaſed him to puniſh the uſurpation, and unnatural cruelty of Henry I, and of our Edward III, in their children for many generations; ſo dealt he with the ſons of Loys Debonaire, the ſon of Charles the great, or Charlemagne. For after ſuch time as Debonaire of France had torn out the eyes of Bernard his nephew, the ſon of Pepin, the eldeſt ſon of Charlemagne, and heir of the empire, and then cauſed him to die in priſon, as did our Henry to Robert his elder brother; there followed nothing but murders upon murders, poiſonings, impriſonments, and civil war, till the whole race of that famous emperor was extinguiſhed.

And though Debonaire, after he had rid himſelf of his nephew by a violent death; and of his baſtard brothers by a civil death (having incloſed them with ſure guard, all the days of their lives, within a monaſtery) held himſelf ſecure from all oppoſition: yet God raiſed up againſt him (which he ſuſpected not) his own ſons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him priſoner, and to depoſe him; his own ſons, with whom (to ſatisfy their ambition) he had ſhared his eſtate, and given them crowns to wear, kingdoms to govern, during his own life. Yea, his eldeſt ſon Lothaire (for he had four, three by his firſt wife, and one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cauſe of his depoſition, that he had uſed violence towards his brothers and kinſmen; and that he had ſuffer'd his nephew (whom he might have deliver'd) to be ſlain, [b] eo quod, ſaith the text, fratribus &

propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiſerit: becauſe he uſed violence to his brothers and kinſmen, and ſuffered his nephew to be ſlain whom he might have delivered.

Yet did he that which few kings do; namely, repent him of his cruelty. For among many other things, which he performed in the general aſſembly of the ſtates, it follows, [a] Poſt hæc autem palam ſe erraſſe confeſſus; & imitatus imperatoris Theodoſii exemplum, pœnitentiam ſpontaneam ſuſcepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem geſſerat. After this he did openly confeſs himſelf to have erred; and following the example of the emperor Theodoſius, he underwent voluntary penance as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done againſt Bernard, his own nephew.

This he did, and it was praiſe-worthy. But the blood that is unjuſtly ſpilt, is not again gathered up from the ground by repentance. Theſe medicines, miniſtred to the dead, have but dead rewards.

This king, as I have ſaid, had four ſons. To Lothaire his eldeſt he gave the kingdom of Italy; as Charlemagne, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the empire. To Pepin the ſecond ſon he gave the kingdom of Aquitaine: to Loys, the kingdom of Bavier; and to Charles, whom he had by a ſecond wife, called Judith, the remainder of the kingdom of France. But this ſecond wife, being a mother-in-law to the reſt, perſwaded Debonaire to caſt his ſon Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles: which, after the death of his ſon Pepin, he proſecuted to effect, againſt his grand-child bearing the ſame name. In the mean while, being invaded by his ſon Loys of Bavier, he dies for grief.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bavier, and Charles, afterwards call'd the Bald, and their nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, join in league againſt the emperor Lothaire, their eldeſt brother. They fight near to Auxerre the moſt bloody battel that ever was ſtrucken in France: in which, the marvellous loſs of nobility, and men of war, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Humes, to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes, to enter upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by treaſon ſeizeth upon his nephew Pepin; kills him in a cloyſter; Carloman rebels againſt his father Charles the Bald; the father burns out the eyes of his ſon Carloman; Bavier invades the emperor Lothaire, his brother; Lothaire quits the empire; he is aſſailed and wounded to the heart by his own conſcience, for his rebellion againſt his father and for his other cruelties, and dies in a monaſtery. Charles the Bald, the uncle, oppreſſeth his nephews, the ſons of Lothaire, he uſurpeth the empire, to the prejudice of Loys of Bavier, his elder brother; Bavier's armies and his ſon Carloman are beaten; he dies of grief; and the uſurper Charles is poiſoned by Zedekias a Jew, his phyſician; his ſon Loys le Beque dies of the ſame drink. Beque had Charles the Simple, and two baſtards, Loys and Carloman; they rebel againſt their brother, but the eldeſt breaks his neck, the younger is ſlain by a wild boar; the ſon of Bavier had the ſame ill deſtiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a window in ſporting with his companions. Charles the Groſs becomes lord of all that the ſons of Debonaire held in Germany, wherewith not contented, he invades Charles the Simple; but being forſaken of his nobility, of his wife, and of his underſtanding, he dies a diſtracted beggar. Charles the Simple is held in wardſhip by Eudes, major of the palace; then by Robert, the brother of Eudes; and, laſtly, being taken by the earl of Vermandois, he is forced to die in the priſon of Peron: Loys, the ſon of Charles the Simple, breaks his neck in chaſing a wolf; and of the two ſons

of this Loys, the one dies of poiſon, the other in the priſon of Orleans; after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a ſtranger to the French, makes himſelf king.

Theſe miſerable ends had the iſſues of Debonaire, who, after he had once apparelled injuſtice with authority, his ſons and ſucceſſors took up the faſhion; and wore that garment ſo long without other proviſions, as when the ſame was torn from their ſhoulders, every man deſpiſed them as miſerable and naked beggars. The wretched ſucceſs they had (ſaith a learned French-man) ſhews, que en ceſte mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu ou de la juſtice: That in the death of that prince, to wit, of Bernard, the ſon of Pepin, the true heir of Charlemagne, men had more medling than either God or juſtice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certain that Francis I, one of the worthieſt kings (except for that fact) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himſelf, after he had commended the deſtruction of the proteſtants of Mirandol and Cabrieres, to the parliament of Provence; which poor people were thereupon burnt, and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true, that the ſaid king Francis repented himſelf of the fact, and gave charge to Henry, his ſon, to do juſtice upon the murderers; threatning his ſon with God's judgments, if he neglected it. But this unſeaſonable care of his, God was not pleaſed to accept for payment. For, after Henry himſelf was ſlain in ſport by Montgomery, we all may remember what became of his four ſons, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which, although three of them became kings, and were married to beautiful and virtuous ladies; yet were they, one after another, caſt out of the world, without ſtock or ſeed. And notwithſtanding their ſubtilty and breach of faith, with all their maſſacres upon thoſe of the religion, and great effuſion of blood, the crown was ſet upon his head, whom they all laboured to diſſolve; the proteſtants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more ſtrong cities than ever they had.

Let us now ſee, if God be not the ſame God in Spain, as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no farther back than to Don Pedro of Caſtile: in reſpect of which prince, all the tyrants of Sicily, our Richard III, and the great Evan Vaſilowick of Muſcovy, were but petty ones: this Caſtilian, of all chriſtian and heathen kings, having been the moſt mercileſs. For beſides thoſe of his own blood and nobility, which he cauſed to be ſlain in his own court and chamber; as Sancho Ruis, the great maſter of Calatrava, Ruis Gonſales, Alphonſo Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom he cut in pieces, and caſt into the ſtreets, denying him Chriſtian burial: I ſay, beſides theſe, and the ſlaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonſo Gomes, and the great commander of Caſtile; he made away the two infants of Arragon, his couſin-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquerques, Nugnes de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Guttiere his great treaſurer, and all his kindred; and a world of others. Neither did he ſpare his two youngeſt brothers, innocent princes: whom, after he had kept in cloſe priſon from their cradles, till one of them had lived ſixteen years, and the other fourteen, he murdered them there. Nay, he ſpared not his mother, nor his wife, the lady Blanch of Bourbon. Laſtly, as he cauſed the archbiſhop of Toledo, and the dean, to be killed, of purpoſe to enjoy their treaſures; ſo did he put to death [a] Mahomet Aben Alhamar, king of Barbary, with thirty-ſeven of his nobility, that came unto him for ſuccour, with a great ſum of money, to levy (by his favour) ſome companies of ſoldiers to return withal. Yea, he would needs aſſiſt the hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old king; inſomuch as pope Urban declared him an enemy both to God and man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his kingdom, and reeſtabliſhed by the valour of the Engliſh nation, led by the famous duke of Lancaſter: he was ſtabbed to death by his younger brother the earl of Aſtramara, who diſpoſſeſſed all his children of their inheritance; which, but for the father's injuſtice and cruelty, had never been in danger of any ſuch thing.

If we can parallel any man with this king, it muſt be duke John of Burgoigne; who, after his traiterous murder of the duke of Orleans, cauſed the conſtable of Armagnac, the chancellor of France, the biſhops of Conſtance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend church-men, the earl of gran Pre, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the officers of juſtice, of the chamber of accompts, treaſury and requeſt (with ſixteen hundred others to accompany them) to be ſuddenly and violently ſlain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have maſtered France: he was ſoon after ſtrucken with an axe in the face, in the preſence of the [a] Dauphin; and, without any leiſure to repent his miſdeeds, preſently ſlain. Theſe were the lovers of other men's miſeries, and miſery found them out.

Now for the kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry VII, Henry VIII, queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the firſt; and the firſt that laid the foundation of the preſent Auſtrian greatneſs. For this king did not content himſelf to hold Arragon by the uſurpation of his anceſtor, and to faſten thereunto the kingdom of Caſtile and Leon, which Iſabel his wife held by ſtrong hand, and his aſſiſtance, from her own niece, the daughter of the laſt Henry; but moſt cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right: he alſo caſt his own niece out of the kingdom of Navarre; and, contrary to faith, and the promiſe that he made to reſtore it, fortified the beſt places, and ſo waſted the reſt, as there was no means left for any army to invade it. This king, I ſay, that betrayed alſo Ferdinand and Frederick, kings of Naples, princes of his own blood, and by double alliance tied unto him, ſold them unto the French; and with the ſame army, ſent for their ſuccour under Gonſalvo, caſt them out; and ſhared their kingdom with the French, whom afterwards he moſt ſhamefully betrayed.

This wiſe and politick king, who ſold heaven and his own honour, to make his ſon, the prince of Spain, the greateſt monarch of the world, ſaw him die in the flower of his years; and his wife, great with child with her untimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldeſt daughter, married unto Don Alphonſo, prince of Portugal, beheld her firſt husband break his neck in her preſence; and, being with child by her ſecond, died with it. A juſt judgment of God upon the race of John, father to Alphonſo, now wholly extinguiſhed, who had not only left many diſconſolate mothers in Portugal, by the ſlaughter of their children; but had formerly ſlain, with his own hand, the ſon and only comfort of his aunt, the lady Beatrix, dutcheſs of Viſeo. The ſecond daughter of Ferdinand, married, to the archduke Philip, turned fool, and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, beſtowed on king Henry VIII, he ſaw caſt off by the king, the mother of many troubles in England; and the mother of a daughter, that, in her unhappy zeal, ſhed a world of innocent blood; loſt Calais to the French; and died heart-broken without increaſe.

To conclude, all thoſe kingdoms of Ferdinand have maſters of a new name; and, by a ſtrange family, are governed and poſſeſs'd.

Charles V, ſon to the archduke Philip, in whoſe vain enterpriſes upon the French, upon the Almaines, and other princes and ſtates, ſo many multitudes of Chriſtian ſoldiers, and renowned captains, were conſumed, who gave the while a moſt perilous entrance to the Turks, and ſuffered Rhodes, the key of chriſtendom, to be taken, was, in concluſion, chaſed out of France; and, in a ſort, out of Germany; and left to the French, Metz, Toul, and Verdun, places belonging to the empire; ſtole away from Inſpruck, and ſcaled the Alps by torch-light, purſued by duke Maurice; having hoped to ſwallow up all thoſe dominions, wherein he concocted nothing ſave his own diſgraces. And having, after the ſlaughter of ſo many millions of men, no one foot of ground in either, [a] he crept into a cloyſter, and made himſelf a penſioner of an hundred thouſand duckets by the year to his ſon Philip, from whom he very ſlowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance.

His ſon again, king Philip II, not ſatisfied to hold Holland and Zealand (wreſted by his anceſtors from Jaqueline, their lawful princeſs) and to poſſeſs in peace many other provinces of the Netherlands, perſwaded by that miſchievous cardinal of Granvil, and other Romiſh tyrants; not only forgot the moſt remarkable ſervices done to his father the emperor, by the nobility of thoſe countries; not only forgot the preſent made him upon his entry of forty millions of florins, called the [b] Noval aid; nor only forgot that he had twice moſt ſolemnly ſworn to the general ſtates, to maintain and preſerve their ancient rights, privileges, and cuſtoms, which they had enjoyed under their thirty-five earls before him, conditional princes of thoſe provinces; but beginning firſt to conſtrain them, and enthral them by the Spaniſh inquiſition, and then to impoveriſh them by many new deviſed and intolerable impoſitions: he, laſtly, by ſtrong hand and main force, attempted to make himſelf not only an abſolute monarch over them, like unto the kings and ſoveraigns of England and France; but, Turk-like, to tread under his feet all their national and fundamental laws, privileges, and ancient rights. To effect which, after he had eaſily obtained from the pope a diſpenſation of his former oaths (which diſpenſation was the true cauſe of the war and blood-ſhed ſince then;) and, after he had tried what he could perform, by dividing of their own nobility under the government of his baſe ſiſter Margaret of Auſtria, and the cardinal Granvil, he employed that moſt mercileſs Spaniard Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo, duke of Alva, followed with a powerful army of ſtrange nations, by whom he firſt ſlaughter'd that renowned captain the earl of Egmont, prince of Gavare; and Philip Montmorency, earl of Horn, made away Montague, and the marquis of Bergues; and cut off in thoſe ſix years (that Alva governed) of gentlemen and others, eighteen thouſand and ſix hundred, by the hands of the hangman, beſides all his other barbarous murders and maſſacres. By whoſe miniſtry, when he could not yet bring his affairs to their wiſhed ends, having it in his hope to work that by ſubtilty, which he had failed to perform by force: he ſent for governor his baſtard brother Don John of Auſtria, a prince of great hope, and very gracious to thoſe people. But he, uſing the ſame papal advantage that his predeceſſors had done, made no ſcruple to take oath upon the Holy Evangeliſts, to obſerve the treaty made with the general ſtates; and to diſcharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, and other ſtrangers, therein garriſoned. Towards whoſe pay and paſsport, the Netherlands ſtrained themſelves to make payment of ſix hundred thouſand pounds. Which monies received, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed the citadels of Antwerp and Namure, not doubting (being unſuſpected by the ſtates) to have poſſeſſed himſelf of all the maſtering places of thoſe provinces; for whatſoever he overtly pretended, he held in ſecret a contrary council with the ſecretary Eſcovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, miniſters of the Spaniſh tyranny, formerly practiſed, and now again intended. But let us now ſee the effect and end of this perjury, and of all other the duke's cruelties. Firſt for himſelf, after he had murdered ſo many of the nobility, executed (as aforeſaid) eighteen thouſand ſix hundred in ſix years; and moſt cruelly ſlain man, woman and child, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden, and other places; and after he had conſumed thirty-ſix millions of treaſure in ſix years, notwithſtanding his Spaniſh vaunt, that he would ſuffocate the Hollanders in their own butter-barrels and milk-tubs, he departed the country no otherwiſe accompanied, than with the curſe and deteſtation of the whole nation, leaving his maſter's affairs in a ten-fold worſe eſtate, than he found them at his firſt arrival. For Don John, whoſe haughty conceit of himſelf, overcame the greateſt difficulties; though his judgment were over-weak to manage the leaſt; what wonders did his fearful breach of faith bring forth, other than the king his brother's jealouſy and diſtruſt, together with the untimely death that ſeized him, even in the flower of his youth. And for Eſcovedo's ſharp-witted ſecretary, who, in his own imagination, had conquered for his maſter both England and the Netherlands; being ſent into Spain upon ſome new project, he was at the firſt arrival, and before any acceſs to the king, by certain ruffians, appointed by Anthony Peres, (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodging. Laſtly, if we conſider the king of Spain's carriage, his council, and ſucceſs in this buſineſs; there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred millions, and the lives of above four hundred thouſand Chriſtians, for the loſs of all thoſe countries; which, for beauty, gave place to none; and, for revenue, did equal his Weſt-Indies; for the loſs of a nation, which moſt willingly obeyed him; and who at this day, after forty years wars, are, in deſpite of all his forces, become a free eſtate, and far more rich and powerful than they were, when he firſt began to impoveriſh and oppreſs them.

Oh, by what plots, by what forſwearings, betrayings, oppreſſions, impriſonments, tortures, poiſonings, and under what reaſons of ſtate and politic ſubtilty, have theſe fore-named kings, both ſtrangers, and of our own nation, pulled the vengeance of God upon themſelves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent miniſters! and in the end have brought thoſe things to paſs for their enemies, and ſeen an effect ſo directly contrary to all their own counſels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themſelves; and the other never have ſucceeded, if no ſuch oppoſition had ever been made. God hath ſaid it and performed it ever: Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum, I will deſtroy the wiſdom of the wiſe.

But what of all this? And to what end do we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead: ſeeing the world is the ſame that it hath been; and the children of the preſent time will ſtill obey their parents? It is in the preſent time, that all the wits of the world are exerciſed. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawful; and either we hope to hold them for ever, or at leaſt we hope, there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For, as we are content to forget our own experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledge, in all things that concern our ſelves; or perſwade our ſelves, that God hath given us letters patent, to purſue all our irreligious affections with a non obſtante: ſo we neither look behind us what hath been, nor before us what ſhall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body: we are by it joined to the earth; we are compounded of earth; and we inhabit it. The heavens are high, far off, and unſearchable; we have ſenſe and feeling of corporal things, and of eternal grace, but by revelation. No marvel then that our thoughts are alſo earthly: and it is leſs to be wondered at, that the words of worthleſs men cannot cleanſe them; ſeeing their doctrine and inſtruction, whoſe underſtanding the Holy Ghoſt vouchſafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For as the prophet Iſaiah cried out long agone, Lord, who hath believed our reports? And out of doubt, as Iſaiah complained then for himſelf and others; ſo are they leſs believed every day after other. For although religion, and the truth thereof, be in every man's mouth, yea, in the diſcourſe of every woman, who, for the greateſt number, are but [a] Idols of vanity; what is it other than an univerſal diſſimulation? We profeſs that we know God, but by works we deny him. For beatitude doth not conſiſt in the knowledge of divine things, but in a divine life; for the devils know them better than men. Beatitudo non eſt divinorum cognitio, ſed vita divina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private contention, the paſſionate diſpute, the perſonal hatred, and the perpetual war, maſſacres, and murders, for religion among Chriſtians; the diſcourſe whereof hath ſo occupied the world, as it hath well-near driven the practice thereof out of the world. Who would not ſoon reſolve, that took knowledge but of the religious diſputations among men, and not of their lives which diſpute, that there were no other thing in their deſires, than the purchaſe of heaven; and that the world it ſelf were but uſed as it ought, and as an inn or place, wherein to repoſe our ſelves in paſſing on towards our celeſtial habitation? When, on the contrary, beſides the diſcourſe and outward profeſſion, the ſoul hath nothing but hypocriſy. We are all (in effect) become comedians in religion; and while we act in geſture and voice, divine virtues, in all the courſe of our lives we renounce our perſons, and the parts we play. For charity, juſtice, and truth, have but their being in terms, like the philoſophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wiſdom, which Salomon defineth to be the School-miſtreſs of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we give it our good word; but the ſame which is altogether exerciſed in the ſervice of the world, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchaſe and obtain honour, with the many reſpects which attend it.

Theſe indeed be the marks, which (when we have bent our conſciences to the higheſt) we all ſhoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our own; the care our own in this life, the peril our own in the future: and yet when we have gathered the greateſt abundance, we our ſelves enjoy no more thereof, than ſo much as belongs to one man. For the reſt; He that had the greateſt wiſdom, and the greateſt ability that ever man had, hath told us that this is the uſe: [b] When goods increaſe (ſaith Salomon) they alſo increaſe that eat them; and what good cometh to the owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for thoſe that devour the reſt, and follow us in fair weather; they again forſake us in the firſt tempeſt of misfortune, and ſteer away before the ſea and wind; leaving us to the malice of our deſtinies. Of theſe, among a thouſand examples, I will take but one out of maſter Dannet, and uſe his own words: Whilſt the emperor Charles the fifth, after the reſignation of his eſtates, ſtayed at Vluſhing for wind, to carry him his laſt journey into Spain; he conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinand's ambaſſadour, till the deep of the night. And when Seldius ſhould depart, the emperor calling for ſome of his ſervants, and no body anſwering him (for thoſe that attended upon him, were ſome gone to their lodgings, and all the reſt aſleep) the emperor took up the candle himſelf, and went before Seldius to light him down the ſtairs; and ſo did, notwithſtanding all the reſiſtance that Seldius could make. And when he was come to the ſtairs foot, he ſaid thus unto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the emperor, when he ſhall be dead and gone, That him, whom thou haſt known in thy time invironed with ſo many mighty armies, and guards of ſoldiers, thou haſt alſo ſeen alone, abandoned, and forſaken, yea even of his own domeſtick ſervants, &c. I acknowledge this change of fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of God; which I will by no means go about to withſtand.

But you will ſay that there are ſome things elſe, and of greater regard than the former. The firſt, is the reverend reſpect that is held of great men, and the honour done unto them by all ſorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward love for their juſtice and piety, accompany the outward worſhip given to their places and power; without which what is the applauſe of the multitude, but as the outcry of an herd of animals, who, without the knowledge of any true cauſe, pleaſe themſelves with the noiſe they make? For ſeeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to diſtinguiſh virtue and fortune: the moſt impious (if proſperous) have ever been applauded; the moſt virtuous (if unproſperous) have ever been deſpiſed. For as fortune's man rides the horſe, ſo fortune her ſelf rides the man. Who, when he is deſcended and on foot: the man taken from his beaſt, and fortune from the man; a baſe groom beats the one, and a bitter contempt ſpurns at the other, with equal liberty.

The ſecond, is the greatning of our poſterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behind us. Certainly, of thoſe which conceive that their ſouls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be ſaid of them, which Lactantius ſpake of certain heathen philoſophers, [a] quod ſapientes ſunt in re ſtulta. For when our ſpirits immortal ſhall be once ſeparate from our mortal bodies, and diſpoſed by God: there remaineth in them no other joy of their poſterity which ſucceed, than there doth of pride in that ſtone, which ſleepeth in the wall of a king's palace; nor any other ſorrow for their poverty, than there doth of ſhame in that, which beareth up a beggar's cottage. [b] Neſciunt mortui, etiam ſancti, quid agunt vivi, etiam eorum filii; quia animæ mortuorum rebus viventium non interſunt. The dead, though holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their own children; for the ſouls of thoſe departed, are not converſant with their affairs that remain. And if we doubt of Saint Auguſtine, we cannot of Job; who tells us, [c] That we know not if our ſons ſhall be honourable: neither ſhall we underſtand concerning them, whether they ſhall be of low degree. Which Eccleſiaſtes alſo confirmeth: [d] Man walketh in a ſhadow, and diſquieteth himſelf in vain: he heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who ſhall gather them. The living (ſaith he) know that they ſhall die, but the dead know nothing at all. For who can ſhew unto man, what ſhall be after him under the ſun? He therefore accounteth it among the reſt of worldly vanities, to labour and travel in the world, not knowing after death, whether a fool or a wiſe man ſhould enjoy the fruits thereof: which made me (ſaith he) endeavour even to abhor mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whoſe bleſſed or ſorrowful eſtates after death God hath reſerved? man's knowledge lying but in his hope; ſeeing the prophet Eſay confeſſeth of the elect, [a] That Abraham is ignorant of us, and Iſrael knows us not. But hereof we are aſſured, that the long and dark night of death: of whoſe following day we ſhall never behold the dawn (till his return that hath triumphed over it) ſhall cover us over, till the world be no more. After which, and when we ſhall again receive organs glorified and incorruptible, the ſeats of angelical affections: in ſo great admiration ſhall the ſouls of the bleſſed be exerciſed, as they cannot admit the mixture of any ſecond or leſs joy; nor any return of forgone and mortal affection, towards friends, kindred or children. Of whom whether we ſhall retain any particular knowledge, or in any ſort diſtinguiſh them: no man can aſſure us; and the wiſeſt men doubt. But on the contrary; if a divine life retain any of thoſe faculties, which the ſoul exerciſed in a mortal body; we ſhall not at that time ſo divide the joys of heaven, as to caſt any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remain in the world. No; be their eſtates greater than ever the world gave, we ſhall (by the difference known unto us) even deteſt their conſideration. And whatſoever comfort ſhall remain of all forepaſt, the ſame will conſiſt in the charity, which we exerciſed living: and in that piety, juſtice, and firm faith, for which it pleaſed the infinite mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing, and neglect them, as unneceſſary and vain? Certainly no. For that infinite wiſdom of God, which hath diſtinguiſhed his angels by degrees: which hath given greater and leſs light and beauty to heavenly bodies: which hath made differences between beaſts and birds: created the eagle and the fly, the cedar and the ſhrub: and among ſtones, given the faireſt tincture to the ruby, and the quickeſt light to the diamond; hath alſo ordained kings, dukes or leaders of the people, magiſtrates, judges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to poſterity, for a mark and enſign of the virtue and underſtanding of their anceſtors: ſo, ſeeing [b] Siracides preferreth death before beggary: and that titles, without proportionable eſtates, fall under the miſerable ſuccour of other men's pity; I account it fooliſhneſs to condemn ſuch a care: provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raiſe not our own buildings out of other men's ruins. For as [c] Plato doth firſt prefer the perfection of bodily health; ſecondly, the form and beauty; and thirdly, Divitias nulla fraude quæſitas: ſo Jeremy cries, [d] Woe unto them that erect their houſes by unrighteouſneſs, and their chambers without equity: and Eſay the ſame, [e] Woe to thoſe that ſpoil, and were not ſpoiled. And it was out of the true wiſdom of Solomon, that he commandeth us, [f] not to drink the wine of violence; not to lie in wait for blood; and not to ſwallow them up alive, whoſe riches we covet: for ſuch are the ways (ſaith he) of every one that is greedy of gain.

And if we could afford our ſelves but ſo much leiſure as to conſider; That he, which hath moſt in the world, hath, in reſpect of the world, nothing in it: and that he, which hath the longeſt time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, ſetting it either by that which is paſt when we were not, or by that time which is to come in which we ſhall abide for ever: I ſay, if both, to wit our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not out of any excellency of underſtanding, that we ſo much priſe the one, which hath

(in effect) no being: and ſo much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coveting thoſe mortal things of the world, as if our ſouls were therein immortal, and neglecting thoſe things which are immortal, as if our ſelves after the world were but mortal.

But let every man value his own wiſdom, as he pleaſeth. Let the rich man think all fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the revenger eſteem all negligent, that have not trodden down their oppoſites; the politician, all groſs, that cannot merchandize their faith: yet when we once come in ſight of the port of death, to which all winds drive us; and when by letting fall that fatal anchor, which can never be weighed again, the navigation of this life takes end: Then it is, I ſay, that our own cogitations (thoſe ſad and ſevere cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our health and felicity) return again, and pay us to the uttermoſt for all the pleaſing paſſages of our lives paſt. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our ſelves can no longer exerciſe cruelty towards others: and it is only then, that we are ſtrucken through the ſoul with this terrible ſentence, [a] That God will not be mock'd. For if, according to St. Peter, The righteous ſcarcely be ſaved: and that God ſpared not his angels: where ſhall thoſe appear, who, having ſerved their appetites all their lives, preſume to think, that the ſevere commandments of the All-powerful God were given but in ſport; and that the ſhort breath, which we draw when death preſſeth us, if we can but faſhion it to the ſound of Mercy (without any kind of ſatisfaction or amends) is ſufficient? O quam multi, ſaith a reverend father, cum hac ſpe ad æternos labores & bella deſcendunt: I confeſs that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have it ſaid, that we ended well: for we all deſire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what ſhall we call a diſeſteeming, an oppoſing, or (indeed) a mocking of God; if thoſe men do not oppoſe him, diſeſteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for God, to ask him forgiveneſs at leiſure, with the remainder and laſt drawing of a malicious breath? For what do they otherwiſe, that die this kind of well-dying, but ſay unto God as followeth? We beſeech thee, O God, that all the falſehoods, forſwearings, and treacheries of our lives paſt, may be pleaſing unto thee; that thou wilt for our ſakes (that had no leiſure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impoſſible) and forget to be a juſt God; that thou wilt love injuries and oppreſſions, call ambition wiſdom, and charity fooliſhneſs. For I ſhall prejudice my ſon (which I am reſolved not to do) if I make reſtitution; and confeſs my ſelf to have been unjuſt (which I am too proud to do) if I deliver the oppreſſed. Certainly, theſe wiſe worldlings have either found out a new God; or have made one: and in all likelihood ſuch a leaden one, as Lewis the eleventh wore in his cap; which, when he had cauſed any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kiſs it: beſeeching it to pardon him this one evil act more, and it ſhould be the laſt; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practice of a Cardinal and a falſified ſacrament, he cauſed the earl of Armagnac to be ſtabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be uſed towards a leaden, but not towards the ever-living God. But of this compoſition are all the devout lovers of the world, that they fear all that is dureleſs and ridiculous: they fear the plots and practices of their oppoſites, and their very whiſperings: they fear the opinions of men which beat but upon ſhadows: they flatter and forſake the proſperous and unproſperous, be they friends or kings: yea they dive under water, like ducks, at every pebble-ſtone, that's but thrown towards them by a powerful hand: and on the contrary, they ſhew an obſtinate and giant-like valour, againſt the terrible judgments of the All-powerful God: yea, they ſhew themſelves gods againſt God, and ſlaves towards men; towards men whoſe bodies and conſciences are alike rotten.

Now for the reſt: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poor and oppreſſed, whom we account wretched: we ſhall find the happineſs of the one, and the miſerable eſtate of the other, ſo tied by God to the very inſtant, and both ſo ſubject to interchange (witneſs the ſudden downfall of the greateſt princes, and the ſpeedy upriſing of the meaneſt perſons) as the one hath nothing ſo certain, whereof to boaſt; nor the other ſo uncertain, whereof to bewail it ſelf. For there is no man ſo aſſured of his honour, of his riches, health or life; but that he may be deprived of either or all, the very next hour or day to come. Quid veſper vehat, incertum eſt; What the evening will bring with it, is uncertain. And yet ye cannot tell (ſaith Saint James) what ſhall be to morrow. [a] To day he is ſet up, and to morrow he ſhall not be found? for he is turned into duſt, and his purpoſe periſheth. And although the air which compaſſeth adverſity, be very obſcure: yet therein we better diſcern God, than in that ſhining light which enviroeth worldly glory; through which, for the clearneſs thereof, there is no vanity which eſcapeth our ſight. And let adverſity ſeem what it will; to happy men, ridiculous, who make themſelves merry at other men's misfortunes; and to thoſe under the croſs, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is paſt, to the very inſtant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For be it that we have lived many years, and (according to Solomon) in them all we have rejoyced; or be it that we have meaſured the ſame length of days, and therein have evermore ſorrowed: yet looking back from our preſent being, we find both the one and the other, to wit, the joy and the woe, ſailed out of ſight; and death, which doth purſue us and hold us in chace, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro eſt, mors tenet: Whatſoever of our age is paſt, death holds it. So as whoſoever he be, to whom fortune hath been a ſervant, and the time a friend: let him but take the account of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleaſures paſt) and truly examine what it hath reſerved, either of beauty and youth, or foregone delights; what it hath ſaved, that it might laſt, of his deareſt affections, or of whatever elſe the amorous ſpring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and he ſhall find, that all the art which his elder years have, can draw no other vapour out of theſe diſſolutions, than heavy, ſecret, and ſad ſighs. He ſhall find nothing remaining, but thoſe ſorrows, which grow up after our faſt-ſpringing youth; overtake it, when it is at a ſtand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither: in ſo much as looking back from the very inſtant time, and from our now being; the poor, diſeaſed, and captive creature, hath as little ſenſe of all his former miſeries and pains; as he, that is moſt bleſs'd in common opinion, hath of his fore-paſt pleaſures and delights. For whatſoever is caſt behind us, is juſt nothing: and what is to come, deceitful hope hath it. Omnia quæ ventura ſunt, in incerto jacent. Only thoſe few black ſwans I muſt except, who having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear; and embrace both, as neceſſary guides to endleſs glory.

[a] Jam. 4. 14.

For

For my ſelf, this is my conſolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the ſorrows of this life, are but of two ſorts: whereof the one hath reſpect to God; the other, to the world. In the firſt, we complain to God againſt our ſelves, for our offences againſt him; and confeſs, Et tu juſtus es in omnibus quæ venerunt ſuper nos; And thou, O Lord, art juſt in all that hath befallen us. In the ſecond, we complain to our ſelves againſt God, as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, anſwering our appetites; or for taking them again from us, having had them: forgetting that humble and juſt acknowledgment of Job, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken. To the firſt of which St. Paul hath promiſed bleſſedneſs; to the ſecond, death. And out of doubt he is either a fool or ungrateful to God, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how mean ſoever his eſtate be, that the ſame is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how ſharp ſoever his afflictions be, that the ſame are yet far leſs, than thoſe which are due unto him. And if an heathen wiſe man call the adverſities of the world, but trituta vivendi, the tributes of living: a wiſe Chriſtian man ought to know them, and bear them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them manlike, and reſolvedly; and not as thoſe whining ſoldiers do, qui gementes ſequuntur Impeperatorem.

For ſeeing God, who is the author of all our tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their diſtribution, been partial to the moſt mighty princes of the world; That gave unto Darius the part of the greateſt emperor, and the part of the moſt miſerable beggar, a beggar begging water of an enemy, to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, and in the ſame day the footſtool of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had alſo played, being taken by Sapores) that made Belliſarius play the moſt victorious captain, and laſtly the part of a blind beggar; of which examples many thouſands may be produced: why ſhould other men, who are but as the leaſt worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to reſolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theatre, is but as the change of garments on the leſs. For when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin; the players are all alike. Now if any man, out of weakneſs, prize the paſſages of this world otherwiſe (for ſaith Petrarch, Magni ingenii eſt revocare mentem a ſenſibus) it is by reaſon of that unhappy fantaſy of ours, which forgeth in the brains of man all the miſeries (the corporal excepted) whereunto he is ſubject: therein it is, that misfortune and adverſity work all that they work. For ſeeing death, in the end of the play, takes from all, whatſoever fortune or force takes from any one: it were a fooliſh madneſs in the ſhipwreck of worldly things, where all ſinks but the ſorrow, to ſave it. That were, as Seneca ſaith, Fortunæ ſuccumbere, quod triſtius eſt omni fato; To fall under fortune, of all other the moſt miſerable deſtiny.

But it is now time to ſound a retreat; and to deſire to be excuſed of this long purſuit: and withal, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the picture of time paſt (which we call Hiſtory) in ſo large a table, may alſo be accepted in place of a better reaſon.

The examples of divine providence, every-where found (the firſt divine hiſtories being nothing elſe but a continuation of ſuch examples) have perſwaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so near, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implieth the other: creation, inferring providence (for what father forsaketh the child that he hath begotten? and providence presupposing creation) yet many of those that have seemed to excel in worldly wisdom, have gone about to disjoin this coherence; the Epicure denying both creation and providence, but graning that the world had a beginning; the Aristotelian granting providence, but denying both the creation and the beginning.

Now although this doctrine of faith, touching the creation in time (for by faith we understand, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a work for Aristotle's rotten ground to bear up, upon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the defences and fortresses of all his verbal doctrine: yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the world's beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary, even in the judgment of natural reason, wherein he believed, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no less strange, that those men, which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than terms in the rest) have so retrench'd their minds from the following and overtaking of truth, and so absolutely subjected themselves to the law of those philosophical principles; as all contrary kind of teaching, in the search of causes, they have condemned either for phantastical, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of heathen philosophers, are undoubted grounds and principles indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reason hath built any thing so strong against it self, as the same reason can hardly assail it, much less batter it down: the same in every question of nature, and finite power, may be approved for a fundamental law of human knowledge. For saith [a] Charron, in his book of wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'authorite que l'autre, si la raison n'on fait la difference; Every human proposition hath equal authority, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the upright and impartial judgment of man give a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And to this purpose it was well said of [b] Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine ullo judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their own wisdom, who without any judgment approve the invention of those that forewent them; and suffer themselves, after the manner of beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which sloth and dulness, ignorance is now become so powerful a tyrant: as it hath set true philosophy, physick, and divinity, in a pillory; and written over the first, Contra negantem principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my self, I shall never be perswaded, that God hath shut up all light of learning within the lantern of Aristotle's brains: or that it was ever said unto him, as unto Esdras, Accendam in corde tuo lucernam intellectus: that God hath given invention but to the heathen; and that they only have invaded nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same nature having consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these, and these be the causes of these and these effects, time hath taught us; and not reason: and so hath experience, without art. The cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the philosopher, that sour runnet doth coagulate her milk into a curd. But if we ask a reason of this cause, why the sourness

doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar philoſophy, to ſatisfy this and many other like vulgar queſtions. But man, to cover his ignorance in the leaſt things, who cannot give a true reaſon for the graſs under his feet, why it ſhould be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet diſcover the way and reaſon of nature's working, in thoſe which are far leſs noble creatures than himſelf; who is far more noble than the heavens themſelves: Man (ſaith [a] Salomon) that can hardly diſcern the things that are upon the earth, and with great labour find out the things that are before us; that hath ſo ſhort a time in the world, as he no ſooner begins to learn, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his underſtanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the eſſence of his own ſoul, and which the wiſeſt of the naturaliſts (if Ariſtotle be he) could never ſo much as define, but by the action and effect, telling us what it works (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any elſe, doth know, but God that created it (for though I were perfect, yet I know not my ſoul, ſaith Job.) Man, I ſay, that is but an idiot in the next cauſe of his own life, and in the cauſe of all the actions of his life, will (notwithſtanding) examine the art of God in creating the world; of God, who (ſaith [b] Job) is ſo excellent as we know him not; and examine the beginning of the work, which had end before mankind had a beginning of being. He will diſable God's power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the moths of the air for a cauſe; caſt the work on neceſſity or chance; beſtow the honour thereof on nature; make two powers, the one to be the author of the matter, the other of the form; and laſtly, for want of a workman, have it eternal: which latter opinion Ariſtotle, to make himſelf the author of a new doctrine, brought into the world: and his ſectators have maintained it; parati ac conjurati, quos ſequantur, Philoſophorum animis invictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or ſoon after, Moſes, Zoroaſter, Muſæus, Orpheus, Linus, Animenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Meliſſus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whoſe opinions are exquiſitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the neceſſity of invincible reaſon, one eternal and infinite Being, to be the parent of the univerſal. Horum omnium ſententia quamvis ſit incerta, eodem tamen ſpectat, ut Providentiam unam eſſe conſentiant: ſive enim Natura, ſive Æther, ſive Ratio, ſive mens, ſive fatalis neceſſitas, ſive divina Lex; idem eſſe quod a nobis dicitur Deus. All theſe mens opinions (ſaith [c] Lactantius) though uncertain, come to this, That they agree upon one Providence; whether the ſame be Nature, or Light, or Reaſon, or underſtanding, or deſtiny, or divine Ordinance; that it is the ſame which we call God. Certainly, as all the rivers in the world, though they have divers riſings, and divers runnings; though they ſometimes hide themſelves for a while under ground, and ſeem to be loſt in ſea-like lakes; do at laſt find, and fall into the great ocean: ſo after all the ſearches that human capacity hath; and after all philoſophical contemplation and curioſity; in the neceſſity of this infinite power, all the reaſon of man ends and diſſolves it ſelf.

As for others; and firſt touching thoſe, which conceive the matter of the world to have been eternal, and that God did not create the world ex nihilo, but ex materia præexiſtente: the ſuppoſition is ſo weak, as is hardly worth the anſwering. For (ſaith [d] Euſebias) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere. They ſeem unto me, which affirm this, to give part of the work to God, and part to fortune. Inſomuch as if God had not found this firſt matter by chance, he had neither been Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the univerſal. For were the matter or chaos, eternal: it then follows, That either this ſuppoſed matter did fit it ſelf to God; or God, accommodate himſelf to the matter. For the firſt; it is impoſſible, that things without ſenſe could proportion themſelves to the workman's will. For the ſecond; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an artificer he applied himſelf, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted upon.

But let it be ſuppoſed, That this matter had been made by any power, not omnipotent and infinitely wiſe: I would gladly learn how it came to paſs, that the ſame was proportionable to his intention, that was omnipotent and infinitely wiſe; and no more, nor no leſs, than ſerved to receive the form of the univerſal. For, had it wanted any thing of what was ſufficient; then muſt it be granted, That God created out of nothing ſo much of new matter, as ſerved to finiſh the work of the world: or had there been more of this matter, than ſufficed; then did God diſſolve and annihilate whatſoever remained and was ſuperfluous. And thus muſt every reaſonable ſoul confeſs, That it is the ſame work of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing; and by the ſame art and power, and by none other, can thoſe things, or any part of that eternal matter, be again changed into nothing; by which thoſe things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to ſay that this matter was the cauſe of it ſelf; this, of all other, were the greateſt idiotiſm. For, if it were the cauſe of it ſelf at any time; then there was alſo a time when it ſelf was not: at which time of not being, it is eaſy enough to conceive, that it would neither produce it ſelf, nor any thing elſe. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impoſſible, Nihil autem ſeipſum præcedit, neque ſeipſum componit corpus; There is nothing that doth precede it ſelf, neither do bodies compound themſelves.

For the reſt; Thoſe that feign this matter to be eternal, muſt of neceſſity confeſs, that infinite cannot be ſeparate from eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite form, but that the firſt matter was finite, the form which it received proves it. For concluſion of this part; whoſoever will make choice, rather to believe in eternal deformity, or in eternal dead matter, than in eternal light and eternal life: let eternal death be his reward. For it is a madneſs of that kind, as wanteth terms to expreſs it. For what reaſon of man (whom the curſe of preſumption hath not ſtupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of ſhadow, quia comprehenſio eſt intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it ſelf, either for matter or form; yea for as many worlds (if ſuch had been God's will) as the ſea hath ſands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation, than the workman's will. Yea reaſon it ſelf finds it more eaſy for infinite power, to deliver from it ſelf a finite world, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a fool and duſt, to change the form of matter made to his hands. They are Dionyſius's words, Deus in una exiſtentia omnia præhabet: and again, Eſſe omnium eſt ipſa divinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, cauſaliter, or in better terms, non tanquam forma, ſed tanquam cauſa univerſalis. Neither hath the world univerſal cloſed up all of God: For the moſt parts of his works (ſaith [a] Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wiſdom be opened, by the glorious work of the world:

which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, that we ſeldom entitle God, the all-ſhewing, or the all-willing, but the all-mighty; that is, infinitely able.

But now for thoſe, who from that ground, That out of nothing, nothing is made, infer the world's eternity; and yet not ſo ſalvage therein, as thoſe are, which give an eternal being to dead matter: it is true, if the word [nothing] be taken in the affirmative; and the making, impoſed upon natural agents and finite power; that out of nothing, nothing is made. But ſeeing their great Doctor Ariſtotle himſelf confeſſeth, Quod omnes antiqui decreverunt quaſi quoddam rerum principium, ipſumque infinitum; That all the ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the ſame to be infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, [a] Principium ejus eſt nullum, ſed ipſum omnium cernitur eſſe principium, ac omnia complecti ac regere. It is ſtrange that this philoſopher, with his followers, ſhould rather make choice out of falſhood, to conclude falſly; than out of truth, to reſolve truly. For if we compare the world univerſal, and all the unmeaſurable orbs of heaven, and thoſe marvellous bodies of the ſun, moon, and ſtars, with ipſum infinitum: it may truly be ſaid of them all, which himſelf affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui deſtruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in God's power. And therefore Anaximander, Meliſſus, and Empedocles, call the world univerſal; but particulam univerſitatis & infinitatis; A parcel of that which is the univerſality and the infinity it ſelf; and Plato, but a ſhadow of God. But the other, to prove the world's eternity, urgeth this maxim; That, A ſufficient and effectual cauſe being granted, an anſwerable effect thereof is alſo granted: inferring, that God being for ever a ſufficient and effectual cauſe of the world, the effect of the cauſe ſhould alſo have been for ever; to wit, the world univerſal. But what a ſtrange mockery is this in ſo great a maſter, to confeſs a ſufficient and effectual cauſe of the world (to wit, an almighty God) in his antecedent: and the ſame God to be a God reſtrained in his concluſion; to make God free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when; For this were impiouſly to reſolve of God, as of natural neceſſity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor underſtanding; which cannot but work matter being preſent; as fire, to burn things combuſtible.

Again, he thus diſputeth, That every agent which can work, and doth not work; if it afterward work, it is either thereto moved by it ſelf, or by ſomewhat elſe; and ſo it paſſeth from power to act. But God (ſaith he) is immoveable, and is neither moved by himſelf, nor by any other; but being always the ſame, doth always work: whence he concludeth, if the world were cauſed by God, that he was for ever the cauſe thereof, and therefore eternal. The anſwer to this is very eaſy; for that God's performing in due time that, which he ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather conſtancy in him. For the ſame action of his will, which made the world for ever, did alſo withhold the effect to the time ordained. To this anſwer, in it ſelf ſufficient, others add further, that the pattern or image of the world may be ſaid to be eternal; which the Platonicks call, ſpiritualem mundum; and do in this ſort diſtinguiſh the idea, and creation in time. [a] Spiritualis ille mundus, mundi hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali eſt architecto; fuit ſemper cum illo, eritque ſemper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod ſecundum opus eſt Dei, decedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit ſemper; retinet alteram, quia ſit ſemper futurus. That repreſentative, or the intentional world (ſay they) the ſamplar of this viſible world, the firſt work of God, was equally ancient with the architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever ſhall be. This material world, the ſecond work or creature of God, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from everlaſting; and in this it doth agree, that it ſhall be for ever to come. The firſt point, That it was not for ever, all Chriſtians confeſs: the other they underſtand no otherwiſe, than that after the conſummation of this world, there ſhall be a new heaven and a new earth, without any new creation of matter. But of theſe things we need not here ſtand to argue; though ſuch opinions be not unworthy the propounding; in this conſideration, of an eternal and unchangeable cauſe, producing a changeable and temporal effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platoniſt diſputeth, That the compounded eſſence of the world (and becauſe compounded, therefore diſſipable) is continued, and knit to the divine Being, by an individual and inſeparable power, flowing from divine unity; and that the world's natural appetite of God ſheweth, that the ſame proceedeth from a goodneſs and underſtanding divine; and that this virtue, by which the world is continued and knit together, muſt be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlaſtingly continue and preſerve the ſame. Which infinite virtue, the finite world (ſaith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the temporal nature it hath, ſucceſſively every moment by little and little; even as the whole material world is not altogether: but the aboliſhed parts are departed by ſmall degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the ſame ſmall degrees ſucceed; as the ſhadow of a tree in a river, ſeemeth to have continued the ſame a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continual ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to return to them, which denying that ever the world had any beginning, withal deny that ever it ſhall have any end; and to this purpoſe affirm, that it was never heard, never read, never ſeen, no, not by any reaſon perceived, that the heavens have ever ſuffered corruption; or that they appear any way the elder by continuance; or in any ſort otherwiſe than they were; which, had they been ſubject to final corruption, ſome change would have been diſcerned in ſo long a time: to this it is anſwered, that the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newneſs, and that they have not continued ſo long; than that they would continue for ever as they are. And if conjectural arguments may receive anſwer by conjectures, it then ſeemeth, that ſome alteration may be found. For either [b] Ariſtotle, Pliny, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were groſly miſtaken; or elſe thoſe parts of the world lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reaſon of the ſun's heat; neither were the ſeas under the equinoctial, navigable. But we know by experience, that thoſe regions, ſo ſituate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the ſea, over which we navigate, paſſable enough. We read alſo many hiſtories of deluges, and how that in the time of Phaeton, divers places in the world were burnt up by the ſun's violent heat.

But

But in a word, this obſervation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, that ſtone walls, of matter mouldering and friable, have ſtood two or three thouſand years; and that many things have been digged up out of the earth, of that depth, as ſuppoſed to have been buried by the general flood, without any alteration of ſubſtance or figure; yea, it is believed, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in mines and rocks, under-ground, was created together with the earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldeſt times have not invaded and corrupted; what great alteration ſhould we look for in celeſtial and quinteſſential bodies? And yet we have reaſon to think, that the ſun, by whoſe help all creatures are generate, doth not in theſe latter ages aſſiſt nature, as heretofore. We have neither giants, ſuch as the eldeſt world had; nor mighty men, ſuch as the elder world had; but all things in general are reputed of leſs virtue, which from the heavens receive virtue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger diſcourſe, we might eaſily fetch ſtore of proof; as that this world ſhall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I ſee no good anſwer that can be made to this objection: if the world were eternal, why not all things in the world eternal? If there were no Firſt, no Cauſe, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehenſible Wiſdom, but that every nature had been alike eternal; and man more rational than every other nature: why had not the eternal reaſon of man, provided for his eternal being in the world? For if all were equal; why not equal conditions to all? why ſhould heavenly bodies live for ever, and the bodies of men rot and die.

Again, who was it that appointed the earth to keep the center, and gave order that it ſhould hang in the air; that the ſun ſhould travel between the tropicks, and never exceed thoſe bounds, nor fail to perform that progreſs once in every year; the moon to live by borrowed light; the fix'd ſtars (according to common opinion) to be faſtened like nails in a cart-wheel, and the planets to wander at their pleaſure? Or, if none of theſe had power over other; was it out of charity and love, that the ſun, by his perpetual travel within thoſe two circles, hath viſited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the earth, and the creatures therein, by turns and times? Out of doubt, if the ſun have of his own accord kept this courſe in all eternity, he may juſtly be called eternal charity, and everlaſting love. The ſame may be ſaid of all the ſtars, who, being all of them moſt large and clear fountains of virtue and operation, may alſo be called eternal virtues; the earth may be called eternal patience; the moon an eternal borrower and beggar; and man, of all other, the moſt miſerable, eternally mortal. And what were this, but to believe again in the old play of the gods? Yea, in more gods by millions, than ever Heſiodus dream'd of. But, inſtead of this mad folly, we ſee it well enough with our feeble and mortal eyes: and the eyes of our reaſon diſcern it better; that the ſun, moon, ſtars, and the earth, are limited, bounded, and conſtrained: themſelves they have not conſtrained, nor could. Omne determinatum cauſam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit; Every thing bounded hath ſome efficient cauſe, by which it is bounded.

Now for nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the ſchool of Ariſtotle hath both commended many errors unto us, and ſought alſo thereby to obſcure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, ſhining in the creation, and in the governing of the world: ſo if the beſt definition tion be taken out of the ſecond of Ariſtotle's phyſicks, or primo de Cœlo, or out of the fifth of his metaphyſicks; I ſay, that the beſt is but nominal, and ſerving only to difference the beginning of natural motion from artificial: which yet the academics open better, when they call it A ſeminary ſtrength, infuſed into matter by the ſoul of the world, who give the firſt place to Providence, the ſecond to fate, and but the third to nature. Providentia (by which they underſtand God) dux & caput; fatum, medium ex Providentia prodiens; natura poſtremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of theſe (God excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or underſtanding (both which are neceſſarily in the cauſe of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is unanſwerable of [a] Lactantius: Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut ſcientiam; He only can be ſaid to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and ſcience of nature, are in theſe words truly expreſſed by [b] Ficinus: Poteſt ubique natura, vel per diverſa media, vel ex diverſis materiis, diverſa facere: ſublata vero mediorum materiarumque diverſitate, vel unicum vel ſimillimum operatur, neque poteſt quando adeſt materia non operari; It is the power of nature by diverſity of means, or out of diverſity of matter, to produce divers things: but taking away the diverſity of means, and the diverſity of matter, it then works but one or the like work; neither can it but work, matter being preſent. Now if nature made choice of diverſity of matter, to work all theſe variable works of heaven and earth, it had then both underſtanding and will; it had counſel to begin; reaſon to diſpoſe; virtue and knowledge to finiſh; and power to govern; without which, all things had been but one and the ſame; all of the matter of heaven; or all of the matter of earth. And if we grant nature this will, and this underſtanding, this counſel, reaſon, and power: [c] Cur natura potius, quam Deus nominetur? Why ſhould we then call ſuch a cauſe rather nature, than God? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the firſt and higheſt place to divine power: [d] Omnes homines rationem deorum habent, omneſque ſummum locum divino cuidam numini aſſignant. And this I ſay in ſhort, that it is a true effect of true reaſon in man (were there no authority more binding than reaſon) to acknowledge and adore the firſt and moſt ſublime power. Vera philoſophia, eſt aſcenſus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vera ſunt, & ſemper eadem: True philoſophy, is an aſcending from the things which flow, and riſe, and fall, to the things that are for ever the ſame.

For the reſt; I do alſo account it not the meaneſt, but an impiety monſtrous, to confound God and nature: be it but in terms. For it is God, that only diſpoſeth of all things according to his own will; and maketh of one earth, veſſels of honour and diſhonour. It is nature that can diſpoſe of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that commandeth all; it is nature that is obedient to all; it is God that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth; it is nature, that ſecondarily doth alſo good, but it neither knoweth nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himſelf; nature, nothing in it ſelf. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things; it is nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liveth and laboureth; for by it ſelf it exiſteth not. For ſhall we ſay, that it is out of affection to the earth, that heavy things fall towards it? Shall we call it reaſon, which doth conduct every river into the ſalt ſea? Shall we term it knowledge in fire, that makes it to conſume combuſtible matter? If it be affection, reaſon, and knowledge in theſe; by the ſame affection, reaſon, and knowledge it is, that nature worketh. And therefore ſeeing all things work as they do (call it by form, by nature, or by what you pleaſe:) yet becauſe they work by an impulſion, which they cannot reſiſt; or by a faculty, infuſed by the ſupremeſt power, we are neither to wonder at, nor to worſhip, the faculty that worketh, nor the creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder, and to him is the worſhip due, who hath created ſuch a nature in things, and ſuch a faculty, as, neither knowing it ſelf, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the virtue and power which it hath, doth yet work all things to their laſt and uttermoſt perfection. And therefore every reaſonable man, taking to himſelf for a ground that which is granted by all antiquity, and by all men truly learned that ever the world had; to wit, that there is a power infinite and eternal (which alſo neceſſity doth prove unto us, without the help of faith; and reaſon, without the force of authority;) all things do as eaſily follow which have been delivered by divine letters, as the waters of a running river do ſucceſſively purſue each other from the firſt fountains.

This much I ſay it is, that reaſon it ſelf hath taught us; and this is the beginning of knowledge. [a] Sapientia præcedit, religio ſequitur; quia prius eſt Deum ſcire, conſequens colere: Sapience goes before, religion follows; becauſe it is firſt to know God, and then to worſhip him. This ſapience Plato calleth, abſoluti boni ſcientiam; The ſcience of the abſolute good: and another, Scientiam rerum primarum, ſempiternarum, perpetuarum. For faith (ſaith [b] Iſidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reaſon and examples perſwaded; fides nequaquam vi extorquetur; ſed ratione & exemplis ſuadetur. I confeſs it, that to enquire further, as of the eſſence of God, of his power, of his art, and by what mean he created the world; or of his ſecret judgment, and the cauſes; is not an effect of reaſon: Sed cum ratione inſaniunt; but they grow mad with reaſon, that enquire after it. For as it is no ſhame nor diſhonour (ſaith a French author) de faire arreſt au but qu'on n'a ſceu ſurpaſſer; For a man to reſt himſelf there, where he finds it impoſſible to paſs on further: ſo whatſoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reaſon, it acknowledgeth it to be ſo; as [c] underſtanding it ſelf not to be infinite, but according to the name and nature it hath, to be a teacher, that beſt knows the end of his own art. For ſeeing both reaſon and neceſſity teach us (reaſon, which is pars divini ſpiritus in corpus humanum merſi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us; and ſeeing the ſame reaſon and neceſſity make us know that the ſame infinite power is every-where in the world; and yet how every-where, it cannot inform us, our belief hereof is not weakned, but greatly ſtrengthned by our ignorance; becauſe it is the ſame reaſon that tells us, that ſuch a nature cannot be ſaid to be God, that can be in all conceived by man.

I have been already over-long, to make any large diſcourſe either of the parts of the following ſtory, or in mine own excuſe; eſpecially in the excuſe of this or that paſſage, ſeeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the groſſeſt, the unſuitable diviſion of the books, I could not know how to excuſe, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the firſt part finiſhed. All men know that there is no great art in the dividing evenly of thoſe things, which are ſubject to number and meaſure. For the reſt, it ſuits well enough with a great many books of this age, which ſpeak too much, and yet ſay little; Ipſi nobis furto ſubducimur, We are ſtolen away from our ſelves, ſetting a high price on all that is our own. But hereof, though a late good writer make complaint, yet ſhall it not lay hold on me, becauſe I believe as he doth; that who ſo thinks himſelf the wiſeſt man, is but a poor and miſerable ignorant. Thoſe that are the beſt men of war againſt all the vanities and fooleries of the world, do always keep the ſtrongeſt guards againſt themſelves, to defend themſelves from themſelves, from ſelf-love, ſelf-eſtimation, and ſelf-opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the work, I have only taken counſel from the argument. For of the Aſſyrians, which, after the downfal of Babel, take up the firſt part, and were the firſt great kings of the world, there came little to the view of poſterity: ſome few enterpriſes, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the ſtory of the Hebrews, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the conſuming diſeaſe of time; and preſerved it ſelf, from the very cradle and beginning to this day: and yet not ſo entire, but that the large diſcourſes thereof (to which in many ſcriptures we are referred) are no-where found. The fragments of other ſtories, with the actions of thoſe kings and princes which ſhot up here and there in the ſame time, I am driven to relate by way of digreſſion: of which we may ſay with Virgil, Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vaſto.

They appear here and there floating in the great gulf of time.

To the ſame firſt ages do belong the report of many inventions therein found, and from them derived to us; though moſt of the authors names have periſhed in ſo long a navigation. For thoſe ages had their laws; they had diverſity of government; they had kingly rule; nobility, policy in war; navigation; and all, or the moſt of needful trades. To ſpeak therefore of theſe (ſeeing in a general hiſtory we ſhould have left a great deal of nakedneſs by their omiſſion) it cannot properly be called a digreſſion. True it is, that I have alſo made many others; which, if they ſhall be laid to my charge, I muſt caſt the fault into the great heap of human error. For, ſeeing we digreſs in all the ways of our lives, yea, ſeeing the life of man is nothing elſe but digreſſion; I may the better be excuſed, in writing their lives and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the laws of hiſtory, and of the kinds.

The ſame hath been taught by many; but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Chriſtian laws are alſo taught us by the prophets and apoſtles, and every day preach'd unto us. But we ſtill make large digreſſions; yea, the teachers themſelves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the reſt; after ſuch time as the Perſians had wreſted the empire from the Chaldeans, and had raiſed a great monarchy, producing actions of more importance than were elſewhere to be found, it was agreeable to the order of ſtory to attend this empire; whilſt it ſo flouriſhed, that the affairs of the nations adjoining had reference thereunto. The like obſervance was to be uſed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Perſians, as alſo towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other nations, who reſiſted the beginnings of the former empires, and afterwards became but parts of their compoſition and enlargement: it ſeemed beſt to remember what was known of them from their ſeveral beginnings, in ſuch times and places, as they in their flouriſhing eſtates oppoſed thoſe monarchies; which, in the end, ſwallowed them up. And herein I have followed the beſt geographers, who ſeldom give names to thoſe ſmall brooks, whereof many, joined together, make great rivers; till ſuch time as they become united, and run in a main ſtream to the ocean ſea. If the phraſe be weak, and the ſtile not every way like it ſelf; the firſt ſhews their legitimation and true parent; the ſecond will excuſe it ſelf upon the variety of matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili avena, uſed ſtronger pipes when he ſounded the wars of Æneas. It may alſo be laid to my charge, that I uſe divers Hebrew words in my firſt book, and elſewhere; in which language others may think, and I my ſelf acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant; but it is true, that ſome of them I find in Montanus; others in Latin character in S. Senenſis, and of the reſt I have borrowed the interpretation of ſome of my learned friends. But ſay I had been beholden to neither, yet were it not to be wonder'd at, having had eleven years leiſure to attain the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue: howſoever, I know that it will be ſaid by many, that I might have been more pleaſing to the reader, if I had written the ſtory of mine own times; having been permitted to draw water as near the well-head as another. To this I anſwer, that whoſoever, in writing a modern hiſtory, ſhall follow truth too near the heels, it may happily ſtrike out his teeth. There is no miſtreſs or guide, that hath led her followers and ſervants into greater miſeries. He that goes after her too far off, loſeth her ſight, and loſeth himſelf; and he that walks after her at a middle diſtance, I know not whether I ſhould call that kind of courſe temper or baſeneſs. It is true, that I never travelled after mens opinions, when I might have made the beſt uſe of them; and I have now too few days remaining, to imitate thoſe, that, either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardice, or both, do yet (when death hath them on his ſhoulders) flatter the world, between the bed and the grave. It is enough for me (being in that ſtate I am) to write of the eldeſt times; wherein alſo, why may it not be ſaid, that, in ſpeaking of the paſs'd, I point at the preſent, and tax the vices of thoſe that are yet living, in their perſons that are long ſince dead; and have it laid to my charge. But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that, finding themſelves ſpotted like the tigers of old time, ſhall find fault with me for painting them over a-new, they ſhall therein accuſe themſelves juſtly, and me falſly.

For I proteſt before the majeſty of God, that I malice no man under the ſun. Impoſſible I know it is to pleaſe all, ſeeing few or none are ſo pleaſed with themſelves, or ſo aſſured of themſelves, by reaſon of their ſubjection to their private paſſions; but that they ſeem divers perſons in one and the ſame day. Seneca hath ſaid it, and ſo do I: Unus mihi pro populo erat: and to the ſame effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis, ſed tibi; or (as it hath ſince lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the reſolution of an ancient philoſopher, Satis eſt unus, ſatis eſt nullus. For it was for the ſervice of that ineſtimable prince Henry, the ſucceſſive hope, and one of the greateſt of the chriſtian world, that I undertook this work. It pleaſed him to peruſe ſome part thereof, and to pardon what was amiſs. It is now left to the world without a maſter; from which all that is preſented, hath received both blows and thanks. Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus eſt omnis judicii, in quo lis ſecundum plures datur. But theſe diſcourſes are idle. I know that as the charitable will judge charitably, ſo againſt thoſe, qui gloriantur in malitia, my preſent adverſity hath diſarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore have not far to fall; and for riſing again, as in the natural privation, there is no receſſion to habit; ſo it is ſeldom ſeen in the privation politic. I do therefore forbear to ſtile my readers gentle, courteous, and friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promiſe a ſecond and third volume (which I alſo intend) if the firſt receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough, and too much, and it is certain, let us claw the reader with never ſo many courteous phraſes, yet ſhall we evermore be thought fools, that write fooliſhly. For concluſion; all the hope I have lies in this, that I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous readers of my love towards them, and well-deſerving of them, than ever I ſhall do again. For had it been otherwiſe, I ſhould hardly have had this leiſure to have made my ſelf a fool in print.

OF THE

Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, of the FIRST BOOK of the FIRST PART of the HISTORY of the WORLD.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preſervation of the World.

Sect. I.

THAT the inviſible God is ſeen in his creatures. Page 3

Sect. II.

That the wiſeſt of the heathen, whoſe authority is not to be deſpiſed, have acknowledged the world to have been created by God. 4

Sect. III.

Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. i. 1. ib.

Sect. IV.

Of the meaning of the words [heaven and earth] Gen. i. 1. 5

Sect. V.

That the ſubſtance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moſes underſtood in the word [earth] and that the earth, by the attributes of unformed and void, is deſcribed as the chaos of the ancient heathen. ib.

Sect. VI.

How it is to be underſtood, that the ſpirit of God moved upon the waters: and that this is not to be ſearched curiouſly. 6

Sect. VII.

Of the light created, as the material ſubſtance of the ſun: and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and uſe of it: and of motion, and heat annexed unto it. 7

Sect. VIII.

Of the firmament, and of the waters above the firmament: and whether there be any cryſtalline heaven, or any Primum Mobile. Page 9

Sect. IX.

A concluſion, repeating the ſum of the works in the creation, which are reduced to three heads: the creation of matter; the forming of it; the finiſhing of it. ib.

Sect. X.

That nature is no Principium per ſe; nor form, the giver of being: and of our ignorance how ſecond cauſes ſhould have any proportion with their effects. 10

Sect. XI.

Of fate; and that the ſtars have great influence: and that their operations may diverſly be prevented or furthered. ib.

Sect. XII.

Of preſcience. 12

Sect. XIII.

Of providence. 13

Of predeſtination. ib.

Sect. XV.

Of fortune; and of the reaſon of ſome things that ſeem to be by fortune, and againſt reaſon and providence. ib.

The CONTENTS

CHAP. II.

Of man's eſtate in his firſt creation: and of God's reſt.

Sect. I.

OF the image of God, according to which man was firſt created. 15

Sect. II.

Of the intellectual mind of man, in which there is much of the image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by ſin. 17

Sect. III.

Of our baſe and frail bodies: and that the care thereof ſhould yield to the immortal ſoul. 18

Sect. IV.

Of the ſpirit of life, which God breathed into man in his creation. 19

Sect. V.

That man is (as it were) a little world: with a digreſſion touching our mortality. ib.

Sect. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his firſt creation to diſpoſe of himſelf. 20

Sect. VII.

Of God's ceaſing to create any more: and of the cauſe thereof, becauſe the univerſal created was exceeding good. 21

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradiſe.

Sect. I.

THAT the ſeat of Paradiſe is greatly miſtaken: and that it is no marvel that men ſhould err. 21

Sect. II.

A recital of ſtrange opinions touching Paradiſe. 22

Sect. III.

That there was a true local Paradiſe, eaſtward, in the country of Eden. ib.

Sect. IV.

Why it ſhould be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradiſe. 24

Sect. V.

That the flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradiſe, nor cauſed hills in the earth. 25

Sect. VI.

That Paradiſe was not the whole earth, as ſome have thought, making the ocean to be the fountain of thoſe four rivers. 26

Sect. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradiſe as high as the moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle region of the air. 27

Sect. VIII.

Of their opinion that ſeat Paradiſe under the Equinoctial: and of the pleaſant habitation under thoſe climates. 28

Sect. IX.

Of the change of the names of places: and that beſides that Eden in Cœleſyria, there is a country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Iſaiah 37. and Ezek. 27. 28

Sect. X.

Of divers other teſtimonies of the land of Eden: and that this is the Eden of Paradiſe. 31

Sect. XI.

Of the difficulty in the text, which ſeemeth to make the four rivers to riſe from one ſtream. 33

Sect. XII.

Of the ſtrange fertility and happineſs of the Babylonian ſoil, as it is certain that Eden was ſuch. 34

Sect. XIII.

Of the river Piſon, and the land of Havilah. 35

Sect. XIV.

Of the river Gehon, and the land of Cuſh: and of the ill tranſlating of Æthiopia for Cuſh, 2 Chron. xxi. 16. 36

Sect. XV.

A concluſion, by way of repetition of ſome things ſpoken of before. 39

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief trees in the garden of Paradiſe.

Sect. I.

THAT the tree of life was a material tree: and in what ſenſe it is to be taken, that man, by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made ſubject to death. 40

Sect. II.

Of Becanus's opinion, that the tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica. ib.

Sect. III.

Of Becanus's not unwittily allegorizing of the ſtory of his Ficus Indica. 41

Sect. IV.

Of the name of the tree of knowledge of good and evil: with ſome other notes touching the ſtory of Adam's ſin. 42

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things between the fall of Adam, and the flood of Noah.

Sect. I.

OF the cauſe, and the revenge of Cain's ſin; and of his going out from God. 42

Sect. II.

Of Cain's dwelling in the land of Nod: and of his city Enoch. 43

Sect. III.

Of Moſes's omitting ſundry things concerning Cain's generation. 44

Sect. IV.

Of the diverſities in the ages of the Patriarchs, when they begat their children. 45

Sect. V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs: and of ſome of late memory. 45

Sect. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by tradition: and that Enoch writ before the flood 46

Sect. VII.

Of the men of renown before the flood. 47

Sect. VIII.

That the giants, by Moſes ſo called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as alſo divers in latter times. 48

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly riſing, and hardly at length vaniſhing in the world: and of the relicks of truth touching theſe ancient times, obſcurely appearing in fables and old legends.

Sect. I.

THAT in old corruptions we may find ſome ſigns of more ancient truth. 49

Sect. II.

That the corruptions themſelves were very ancient: as the family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians. 50

Sect. III.

That in proceſs of time theſe leſſer errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the groſs ſuperſtitions of the Egyptians. ib.

Sect. IV.

That from the relicks of ancient records among the Egyptians and others, the firſt idols and fables were invented: and that the firſt Jupiter was Cain; Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c. ib.

Sect. V.

Of the three chiefeſt Jupiters; and the ſtrange ſtory of the third. 51

Sect. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof ſome gat, ſome affected the name of Gods. 54

Sect. VII.

That the wiſer of the ancient heathen had far better opinions of God. ib.

Sect. VIII.

That Heatheniſm and Judaiſm, after many wounds, were at length about the ſame time under Julian miraculouſly confounded. 56

Sect. IX.

Of the laſt refuges of the devil to maintain his kingdom. 57

CHAP. VII.

Of Noah's flood.

Sect. I.

OF God's forewarning: and ſome human teſtimonies: and ſome doubting touching the truth of Noah's flood. 57

Sect. II.

Of the flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noah's flood. 58

Sect. III.

Of Deucalion's flood: and that this was not Noah's flood: nor the Umbri in Italy a remnant of any univerſal flood. 59

Sect. IV.

Of ſome other records teſtifying the univerſal flood: and of two ancient deluges in Egypt: and of ſome elſewhere. 60

Sect. V.

That the flood of Noah was ſupernatural, tho' ſome ſay it might have been fore-ſeen by the ſtars. 61

Sect. VI.

That there was no need of any new creation of matter to make the univerſal flood: and what are Cataractæ Cœli, Gen. vii. 11. 62

Sect. VII.

Of ſome remainder of the memory of Noah among the heathen. 62

Sect. VIII.

Of ſundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made; the matter; faſhion; and name. 63

Sect. IX.

That the Ark was of ſufficient capacity. 64

Sect. X.

That the Ark reſted upon part of the hill Taurus (or Caucaſus) between the Eaſt-Indies and Scythia. 66

†. I.

A Preterition of ſome queſtions leſs material: with a note of the uſe of this queſtion, to find out the metropolis of nations. ib.

†. II.

A propoſal of the common opinion, that the Ark reſted upon ſome of the hills of Armenia. ib.

†. III.

The firſt argument againſt the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come ſooner, had they come from ſo near a place as Armenia. 67

†. IV.

The CONTENTS

†. IV.

The ſecond argument; that the eaſtern people were more ancient in populoſity, and in all human glory. 67

†. V.

The third argument; from the wonderful reſiſtance which Semiramis found in the East Indies. ib.

†. VI.

The fourth argument; from divers conſiderations in the perſon of Noah. 68

†. VII.

Of the ſenſleſs opinion of Annius the commentator upon Beroſus, that the ark reſted upon Montes Caſpii in Armenia; and yet upon Gordæi, which are 300 miles diſtant alſo in Armenia, and yet in Scythia. 69

†. VIII.

The fifth argument; the vine muſt grow naturally near the place where the ark reſted. 70

Anſwer to an objection out of the words of the text. The Lord ſcattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth. 71

†. X.

An anſwer to an objection from the name of Ararat taken for Armenia: and the height of the hills there. 71

†. XI.

†. XII.

Of divers incongruities, if in this ſtory we ſhould take Ararat for Armenia. ib.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary ſituation of Armenia to the place noted in the text: and that it was no marvel, that the ſame ledge of hills running from Armenia to India, ſhould keep the ſame name all along, and even in India be called Ararat. ib.

†. XIV.

Of the beſt vine naturally growing on the ſouth-ſide of the mountains Caucaſi, and towards the East-Indies: and of other excellencies of the ſoil. 73

†. XV.

The concluſion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points. ib.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the firſt plantiag of nations after the flood: and of the ſons of Noah; Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the earth was repeopled.

Sect. I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder than Japhet. 74

Sect. II.

Of divers things that in all reaſon are to be preſumed, touching the firſt planting of the world; as that all hiſtories muſt yield to Moſes: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the known great lords of the firſt ages, were of the iſſue of Ham. 75

Sect. III.

Of the iſles of the Gentiles in Japhet's portion: of Beroſus's too ſpeedy ſeating Gomer the ſon of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhet's ſons Tubal in Spain: and of the antiquity of longinque navigation. 76

Sect. IV.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal and Meſech, ſeated firſt about Aſia the leſs, out of Exekiel xxxviii. 39. 78

Sect. V.

Againſt the fabulous Beroſus's fiction, that the Italian Janus was Noah. 80

Sect. VI.

That Gomer alſo and his ſon Togorma, of the poſterity of Japhet, were firſt ſeated about Aſia the leſs: and that from thence they ſpread weſtward into Europe; and northward into Sarmatia. 81

Sect. VII.

Of Javan the fourth ſon of Japhet; and of Meſch, of Aram, and Meſech of Japhet. 82

Sect. VIII.

Of Aſcanez and Riphath, the two elder ſons of Gomer. 83

Sect. IX.

Of the four ſons of Javan: and of the double ſignification of Tharſis, either for a proper name, or for the ſea. 84

Sect. X.

That the ſeat of Chuſh, the eldeſt ſon of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of ſtrange fables, and ill tranſlations of ſcripture, grounded upon the miſtaking of this point. 85

†. I.

Of Joſephus's tale of an Ethiopeſs wife to Moſes, grounded on the miſtaking of the ſeat of Chuſh. 85

†. II.

A diſpute againſt the tale of Joſephus. 86

†. III.

Chuſh ill expounded for Ethiopia, Ezekiel xxix. 10. 87

†. IV.

Another place of Ezekiel xxx. 9. in the like manner miſtaken. ib.

†. V.

A place, Iſaiah xviii. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chuſh for Ethiopia. ib.

†. VI.

That upon the like miſtaking, both Terhaka in the ſtory of Sennacherib, and Zera in the ſtory of Aſa, are unadviſedly made Ethiopians. 88

†. VII.

A farther expoſition of the place, Iſaiah xviii. 1. ib.

Sect. IX.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt. 89

†. I.

That Mizraim the chief planter of Egypt, and the reſt of the ſons of Ham, were ſeated in order, one by another. ib.

†. II.

Of the time, about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians lunary years, which made their antiquities ſeem the more fabulous. ib.

†. III.

Of certain vain aſſertions of the antiquities of the Egyptians. ib.

†. IV.

Againſt Pererius; that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred years after the creation; at leaſt that both it, and the moſt part of the world, were peopled before the flood. 90

†. V.

Of ſome other reaſons againſt the opinion of Pererius. 91

†. VI.

†. VII.

†. VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian antiquities; with somewhat of Phut, another son of Ham, which peopled Libya. 92

Sect. XII.

Of the eleven sons sons of Canaan, the fourth son of Ham. ib.

†. I.

OF the bounds of the land of Canaan; with the names of his eleven sons. ib.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth. ib.

†. III.

Of the Jebusites, and Amorites. 93

†. IV.

Of the Gergesites, Hivites, and Harkites. ib.

†. V.

Of Sini and Arvadi. ib.

†. VI.

Of Zemari. ib.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi. 94

Sect. XIII.

Of the sons of Chush, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter. ib.

†. I.

THat the most of the sons of Chush were seated in Arabia the happy; and of the Sabeans that robbed Job; and of the queen that came to Solomon. ib.

†. II.

Josephus's opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to have been seated in the west Ethiopia, disproved out of Ezekiel and Jeremy. 96

Sect. XIV.

Of the issue of Mizraim; and of the place of Jeremy, cap. 9. v. 7. ib.

Sect. XV.

Of the issue of Sem. 96

†. I.

OF Elim, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud. ib.

†. II.

Of Aram, and his sons. 97

†. III.

Of the division of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sons of Heber, of the issue of Sem. 98

†. IV.

Of the sons of Joctan, the other son of Heber. 99

†. V.

Of Ophir, one of Joctan's sons, and of Peru; and of that voyage of Solomon. ib.

†. VI.

Of Havilah, the son of Joctan, who also passed into the East Indies; and of Mesha, and Sepher, named in the bordering of the families of Joctan; with a conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the world. 101

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of government.

Sect. I.

OF the proceeding from the first government under the eldest of families, to regal; and from regal absolute, to regal tempered with laws. 101

Sect. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of government, with their opposites; and of the degrees of human society. 102

Sect. III.

Of the good government of the first kings. 104

Sect. IV.

Of the beginning of nobility, and of the vain vaunt thereof without virtue. ib.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus; and of memorable things about those times.

Sect. I.

THat Nimrod was the first after the flood that reigned like soveraign lord; and that his beginning seemeth to have been of just authority. 105

Sect. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons. 106

Sect. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Nineveh; and that it is probable out of Esay xxiii. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees. 107

Sect. VI.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known. 109

Sect. V.

OF That we are not to marvel how so many kingdoms could be erected about these times; and of Vexoris of Egypt; and Tanais of Scythia. 109

Sect. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affine unto it. 110

Sect. VII.

Of the worshipping of images, begun from Belus in Babel. ib.

Sect. VIII.

Of the wars of Ninus; and lastly of his war against Zoroaster. 112

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief author of Magic arts: and of divers kinds of Magic.

Sect. I.

THAT Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first inventor of astrology, or of magic: and that there were divers great magicians of this name. 113

Sect. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently far diverse from conjuring and witchcraft. 114

Sect. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient magic is not to be condemned; tho' the devil here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evil things under the name and colour of good things. 116

Sect. IV.

That Daniel's misliking Nabuchodonosor's condemning of the magicians, doth not justify all their practices. 117

Sect. V.

The abuse of things, which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them. 118

Sect. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawful magic. ib.

Sect. VII.

Of divers ways by which the devil seemeth to work his wonders. 119

Sect. VIII.

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul. 120

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

Sect. I.

OF the magnificent building of Nineveh by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis. 121

Sect. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis's reign. ib.

Sect. III.

Of Semiramis's parentage, and education: and metamorphosis of her mother. ib.

Sect. IV.

Of her expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices. 122

Sect. V.

Of the temple of Belus, built by Semiramis: and of the pyramids of Egypt. ib.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the Second Book of the First Part of the HISTORY of the WORLD.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: aed of the use of this question, for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian empire.

Sect. I.

OF some of the successors of Semiramis: with a brief translation to the question, about the time of the birth of Abraham. 123

Sect. II.

A proposal of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292 after the flood, and not in the year 352. 124

Sect. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his father's death. ib.

Sect. IV.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year. 126

Sect. V.

The answer to two more of the objections, shewing that we may have certainty of Abraham's age from the scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest son: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brothers should be respected. ib.

Sect. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. xi. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah. 127

Sect. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable. 128

Sect. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the story of Abraham. 129

Sect. XI.

That Amraphel, one of the four kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. xiv. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the son of Ninus. 130

Sect. X.

Of Arioch, another of the four Kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been king, lies between Cœlesyria, and Arabia Petræa. ib.

Sect. XI.

Of Tidal, another of the four kings. 131

Sect. XII.

Sect. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian empire at this time was much impaired. 131

Sect. XIII.

That it was not improbable, that the four kings had no dominion in the countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their colonies planted themselves, and so retained the names of the countries whence they came: which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble ourselves with many other difficulties. 132

CHAP. II.

Of the kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

Sect. I.

A Brief of the names and times of the first kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points. 134

Sect. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's reign in Egypt began in the year after the flood 191. ib.

Sect. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers families of kings, but rather successions of regents; oft-times many under one king. 135

Sect. IV.

Of Cham, and his son Mizraim, or Osiris. ib.

Sect. V.

Of the time when Osiris's reign ended: and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus, the son of Osiris. 136

Sect. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Egyptius, Orus, and the two Sesostres, successively reigning after Mizraim, and of divers errors about the former Sesostris. 137

Sect. VII.

Of Busiris, the first oppressor of the Israelites: and of his successor queen Thermutis, that took up Moses out of the water. 138

Sect. VIII.

Of the two brethren of queen Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was born: and who it was that perished in the Red sea. 139

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

Sect. I.

OF the time of Moses's birth: and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt. 139

Sect. II.

Of divers cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this story, or elsewhere in the scripture. 140

Sect. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses's preservation and education. 141

Sect. IV.

Of Moses's flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient historians; of his war in Ethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo's judgment of his pastoral life: and that of Pererius of the Books of Genesis, and Job. 142

Sect. V.

Of Pharaoh's pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red sea, so far as Succoth. 143

Sect. VI.

Of the solary and lunary years: and how they are reconciled: with the form of the Hebrew year, and their manner of intercalation. 144

Sect. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red sea: and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt. 146

Sect. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red sea: and of the Red sea it self. ib.

Sect. IX.

That the passage through the Red sea was miraculous; and not at a low ebb. 148

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red sea, to the place where the law was given them: with a discourse of laws.

Sect. I.

A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching chronology: with a continuance of the story until the Amalekites met with the Israelites. 149

Sect. II.

Of the Amalekites, Midianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battle with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming, who being a Kenite, was priest of Midian. 150

Sect. III.

Of the time when the law was given: with divers commendations of the invention of laws 151

Sect. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right. ib.

Sect. V.

Of the definition of laws, and the law eternal. 152

Sect. VI.

Of the law of Nature. 154

Sect. VII.

Of the written law of God. 156

Sect. VIII.

Of the unwritten law of God, given to the patriarchs by tradition. ib.

Sect. IX.

Of the moral, judicial, and ceremonial law: with a note prefixed, how the scripture speaketh not always in one sense, when it nameth the law of Moses. 157

The CONTENTS

Sect. X.

A proposal of nine other points to be considered; with a touch of the five first. 158

Sect. XI.

Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new testament. 159

Sect. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed. 160

Sect. XIII.

Of the several commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the commandments, but by our default. 160

Sect. XIV.

If there were not any religion, nor judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observ'd. 162

Sect. XV.

Of human law, written and unwritten. 163

Sect. XVI.

That only the prince is exempt from human laws, and in what sort. 165

CHAP. V.

The story of the Israelites, from the receiving of the law to the death of Moses.

Sect. I.

OF the numbering and disposing of the host of Israel, for their marches through the wilderness; with a note of the reverence given to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troops. 166

Sect. II.

The offerings of the twelve princes: the passover of the second year: the departing of Jethro. 168

Sect. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning back to the Red sea. ib.

Sect. IV.

Of their unwillingness to return: with the punishment thereof: and of divers accidents in the return. 169

Sect. V.

Of Moses's arrival at Zin-Kades, and the accidents while they abode there. 170

Sect. VI.

Of their compassing Idumea, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab. 171

Sect. VII.

Of the book of the battels of the Lord, mentioned in this story; and of other books mentioned in scripture, which are lost. 172

Sect. VIII.

Of Moses's sparing the issue of Lot, and of the giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og. 173

Sect. IX.

Of the troubles about the Midianites, and of Moses's death. 174

Sect. X.

Observations out of the story of Moses; how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose. ib.

Sect. VI.

The Etolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to war upon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis besiegeth Gyttheum, and wasteth some part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopœmen in advantage of ground: whereby he utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace by the Romans, joins with the Etolians. The Etolians surprise Demetrius; and, by killing Nabis their confederate, seize upon Sparta: But they are driven out by the citizens; who at Philopœmen's persuasions annex themselves to the Acheans. 757

Sect. VII.

Antiochus, persuaded by Thoas the Etolian, comes over into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages between him, the Etolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole isle of Eubœa. The vanity of the king's ambassadors, and the Etolians: with the civil answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Acheans. That it concerned the Greeks to have desired peace, between the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their own liberty. Of many petty estates that fell to the king. Of Aminander: and an idle vanity, by which king Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good counsel in vain. Some towns won in Thessaly. The king retires to Chalcis: where he marrieth a young wife, and revels away the rest of the winter. Upon the coming of the Roman consul, all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Etolians keeps the straights of Thermopylæ. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece unto the victors. 761

Sect. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African's elder brother, for his lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long truce to the Etolians, that so he might at leisure pass into Asia. Much troublesome business by sea: and divers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes's kingdom: with the siege of Pergamus raised by an handful of the Acheans. L. Scipio the consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battel of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus, being vanquished, yieldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph over Antiochus, is surnamed, The Asiatic, as his brother was styled the The African. 768

Sect. IX.

The Etolians, and the Gallo-greeks, vanquished by the Roman consuls Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyl's prophecies: the books of Hermes: and that inscription SIMONI DEO SANCTO. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's; and that beginning of faction among the Roman nobility. 773

THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING of the Beginning and First Ages of the ſame, from the CREATION unto ABRAHAM.

The FIRST BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preſervation of the WORLD.

SECT. I.

That the INVISIBLE GOD is ſeen in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wiſeſt men acknowledge to be a Power uneffable, and Virtue infinite; a Light by abundant clarity inviſible; an Underſtanding which itſelf can only comprehend, an Eſſence eternal and ſpiritual, of abſolute pureneſs and ſimplicity; was, and is pleaſed to make himſelf known by the work of the world: In the wonderful magnitude whereof (all which he embraceth, filleth, and ſuſtaineth) we behold the Image of that Glory which cannot be meaſured, and withal, that one, and yet univerſal Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious lights of heaven, we perceive a Shadow of his Divine Countenance; in his merciful proviſion for all that live, his manifold Goodneſs; and laſtly, in creating and making exiſtent the world univerſal, by the abſolute art of his own word, his Power and Almightineſs; which Power, Light, Virtue, Wiſdom, and Goodneſs, being all but attributes of one ſimple Eſſence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part diſcern per ſpeculum creaturarum, that is, in the diſpoſition, order, and variety of celeſtial and terreſtrial bodies: terreſtrial, in their ſtrange and manifold diverſities; celeſtial, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continual and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermix'd, nor confounded. By theſe potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the omnipotent Cauſe, and by theſe motions, their almighty Mover.

In theſe more than wonderful works, God (ſaith [a] Hugo) ſpeaketh unto man: And it is true, that theſe be thoſe diſcourſes of God, whoſe effects, all that live, witneſs in themſelves; the ſenſible, in their ſenſible natures; the reaſonable, in their reaſonable ſouls: For, according to [b] St. Gregory,

[a] Hugo ſuper Eccleſ. Homil. 8. [b] Greg. in Mor. Herm. ad fil. Tat. l. 5. Unus verò ingenitus, & non apparens, & immaniſeſtus, omnia autem manifeſtans, per omnia apparet, & in omnibus. Apparentia ſolùm generatorum eſt; nihil apparitio quàm generatio.

Omnis

Omnis homo ex ipsa quòd rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he, which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Job) which is, according to the fathers, Dominationem illius conspicere in creaturis, To discern him in his providence by his creature. That God hath been otherwise seen, to wit, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding, grounded on these places of [a] St. John and [a] St. Paul, Ye have not heard his voice at any time, neither have ye seen his shape. And again, Whom never man saw, nor can see.

And this I am sure agrees with the nature of God's simplicity, of which St. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were [b] Origen, Cyril, Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzene, Hierome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Evaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authority. But by his own word, and by this visible world, is God perceived of men; which is also the understood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his creatures, whose hieroglyphical characters are the unnumbred stars, the sun and moon; written on these large volumes of the firmament; written also on the earth and the seas, by the letters of all those living creatures, and plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned [c] Cusanus, Mundus universus nihil aliud est, quàm Deus explicatus; The world universal is nothing else but God expres'd. As the invisible things of God (saith [d] St. Paul) are seen by the creation of the world, being considered in his creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding than his own will, no other matter than his own power, no other workman than his own word, no other consideration than his own infinite goodness. The example and pattern of these his creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of his own love, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchanged will moved, by his high wisdom disposed, and by his almighty power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to love God, ex fide, & ex effectibus (that is) both persuaded by his word, and by the effects of the world's creation: Neque enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognoscique potest, sed vel ex rerum, quæ factæ sunt, quæque fiunt & gubernantur, observatione & collatione; vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he, of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be known by any knowledge of cause or beginning (saith [e] Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and govern; or else by the word of God himself.

SECT. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the world to have been created by God.

THIS work and creation of the world, did most of the ancient and learned philosophers acknowledge, though by divers terms, and in a different manner expres'd; I mean all those who are intitled by St. Augustine, summi philosophi, philosophers of highest judgment and understanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, principium universorum, the original of the universal; to whom he giveth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Vita, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein he suits with St. Paul casteth upon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by God's almighty word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus, fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraditus followed in opinion) took the word Fire to express God by (as in [g] Deuteronomy and in [g] St. Paul it is used) Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt, All things (saith he) are caused or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the will of the most high God: whose remarkable words are thus converted; [h] Cum abscondisset omnia Jupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceive this sense: When great Jupiter had hidden all things in himself, working out of the love of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth, into grateful light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most high, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Unus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. Plato calleth God the cause and original, the nature and reason of the universal; [i] Totius rerum naturæ, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiosity of some men have found it superfluous to remember the opinions of philosophers in matters of divinity (it being true, that the scripture hath not want of any foreign testimony) yet as the fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so St. Paul himself did not despise, but thought it lawful and profitable, to remember whatsoever he found agreeable to the word of God among the heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendring vengeance to them that know him not, as in the epistle to Titus he citeth Epimenides against the Cretans, and to the Corinthians, Menander; and in the seventeenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. For, truth (saith St. Ambrose) by whomsoever uttered, is of the Holy Ghost; Veritas, à quocunque dicatur, à Spiritu Sancto est: And lastly, let those kind of men learn this rule; Quæ sacris serviunt, prophana non sunt; Nothing is prophane, that serveth to the use of holy things.

SECT. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes. I. 1.

THIS visible world, of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all; in which (saith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrews seek some hidden mystery, and which in the Jews Targum is converted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men have conceived, both which are subsequent; but only to creation then. For before that beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor form to inform, nor any being, but the eternal. Nature was not, nor the next parent or time begotten, time properly and naturally taken: for if God had but disposed of matter already in being; then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of matter proceeded from a greater power, than that of God. And by what name ſhall we then call ſuch an one (ſaith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency; for it is an act of more excellency to make, than to diſpoſe of things made? Whereupon it may be concluded, that matter could not be before this beginning; except we feign a double creation, or allow of two powers, and both infinite; the impoſſibility whereof ſcorneth defence. [a] Nam impoſſibile eſt plura eſſe infinita: quoniam alterum eſſet in altero finitum; There cannot be more infinites than one: for one of them would limit the other.

SECT. IV.

Of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth, Geneſ. ii. 1.

THE univerſal matter of the world (which Moſes comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diverſly underſtood; for there are that conceive, that by thoſe words was meant the firſt matter, as the Peripateticks underſtand it; to which St. Auguſtine and Iſidore ſeem to adhere, Feciſti mundum (ſaith St. Auguſtine) de materia informi; quam feciſti de nulla re, pene nullam rem: that is, Thou haſt made the world of a matter without form; which matter thou madeſt of nothing, and being made, it was little other than nothing.

But this potential and imaginary materia prima, cannot exiſt without form. Peter Lombard, the Schoolmen, Beda, Lyranus, Comeſtor, Toſtatus, and others affirm, that it pleaſed God firſt of all to create the Empyrean Heaven: which at the ſucceeding inſtant (ſaith [b] Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heaven Steuchius Eugubinus calleth Divine clarity and uncreated: an error, for which he is ſharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the ſubſequent, when he made it to be a place, and the ſeat of Angels, and juſt Souls, than in the former affirmation; for of the firſt, That God liveth in eternal light, it is written, [c] My ſoul, praiſe thou the Lord, that covereth himſelf with light: and in the Revelation, [d] And the city hath no need of the ſun, neither of the moon to ſhine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein alſo [e] John Mercer upon Geneſis differeth not in opinion from Eugubinus: for as by Heaven created in the beginning, was not meant the inviſible or ſuperceleſtial; ſo in his judgment, becauſe it was in all eternity the glorious ſeat of God himſelf, it was not neceſſary to be created; Quem mundum ſuper-cœleſtem meo judicio creari (ſaith Mercer) non erat neceſſe.

But as Moſes forbare to ſpeak of Angels, and of things inviſible and incorporate, for the weakneſs of their capacities, whom he then cared to inform of thoſe things which were moſt manifeſt (to wit) That God did not only by a ſtrong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promiſe made to their fore-fathers; but alſo that he created, and was the ſole cauſe of this aſpectable, and perceivable univerſal; ſo on the other ſide I dare not think, that any ſuperceleſtial heaven, or whatſoever elſe (not himſelf) was increate and eternal; and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wiſdom of mortal men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the ſeat of infinite power, no more than infinite power itſelf can be limited: for his place is in himſelf, whom no magnitude elſe can contain: How great is the houſe of God (ſaith [f] Baruch) how large is the place of his poſſeſſion! it is great, and hath no end; it is high, and unmeaſurable.

But leaving multiplicity of opinions, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words [g] Heaven and Earth, was meant the ſolid matter and ſubſtance, as well of all the heavens, and orbs ſupernal, as of the globe of the earth and waters, which covered it over (to wit) that very matter of all things, Materia, chaos, poſſibilitas, ſive poſſe fieri. Which matter (ſaith [h] Calvin) was ſo called, Quod totius mundi ſemen fuerit; Becauſe it was the ſeed of the univerſal: an opinion of ancient philoſophers long before.

SECT. V.

That the ſubſtance of the waters, as mix'd in the body of the earth, is by Moſes underſtood in the word earth: and that the earth, by the attributes of unformed and void, is deſcribed as the chaos of the ancient heathen.

MOSES firſt nameth heaven and earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his ſpirit began to diſtinguiſh the confuſed maſs, and (as Baſil ſaith) Præparare naturam aquæ ad fœcunditatem vitalem; To prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulneſs.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures expreſs'd: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatſoever is under the moon, and ſubject to alteration. Corrupt ſeeds bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heavens are not ſubject, though ſubject to periſhing. They ſhall periſh (ſaith [i] David) and the heavens ſhall vaniſh away like ſmoak, ſaith [k] Eſay. Neither were the waters the matter of earth; for it is written, [l] Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear: which proveth, that the dry land was mix'd and covered with the waters, and not yet diſtinguiſhed; but no way, that the waters were the matter or ſeed of the earth, much leſs of the univerſal. Initio tu, Domine, terram fundaſti; Thou, O Lord, in the beginning haſt founded the earth: and again, [m] The earth was covered with the deep (meaning with waters) as with a garment, ſaith David. And if by natural arguments it may be proved, that water by condenſation may become earth, the ſame reaſon teacheth us alſo, that earth rarified may become water: water, air: air, fire: and ſo on the contrary. [n] Deus ignis ſubſtantiam per aerem in aquam convertit; God turneth the ſubſtance of fire by air into water. For the heavens and the earth remained in the ſame ſtate in which they were created, as touching their ſubſtance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in reſpect of beauty and ornament. [o] Cœlum vero & terra in ſtatu creationis remanſerunt quantum ad ſubſtantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis poſtmodum ſuperaddita eſt. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be underſtood according to the Latin tranſlation ſimply, and as ſpecifical water; but the ſame more properly ſignifieth liquor. For (according to [p] Montanus) Eſt autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit; For Maim (ſaith he) is a double liquor (that is, of divers natures) and this name or word the Latins, wanting a voice to expreſs it, call it in the plural, aquas, waters.

This maſs, or indigeſted matter, or chaos, created in the beginning, was without form, that is, without the proper form, which it afterwards acquired, when the ſpirit of God had ſeparated the earth, and digeſted it from the waters. [a] And the earth was void, that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the ſpirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigeſted matter into that form, which it now retaineth; then did the earth bud forth the herb, which ſeedeth ſeed, and the fruitful tree according to his kind, and God ſaw that it was good; which attribute was not given to the earth, while it was confus'd; nor to the heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God ſaw that it was good, that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta ſunt opera; The works of the perfect God are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect matter had the ancient poets their invention of Demogorgon; Heſiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that chaos: of which [b] Ovid;

Ante Mare, & Terras, & (quod tegit omnia) cœlum,
Unus erat toto naturæ vultus in orbe,
Quem dixêre chaos, rudis indigeſtaque moles.

Before the ſea and land was made, and heaven, that all doth hide,
In all the world one only face of nature did abide:
Which chaos hight, a huge rude heap.

SECT. VI.

How it is to be underſtood, that the ſpirit of God moved upon the waters; and that this is not to be ſearched curiouſly.

AFter the creation of heaven and earth, then void and without form, the ſpirit of God moved upon the waters. The ſeventy interpreters uſe the word ſuperferebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat or fovebat, (ſaith Hierome) out of [c] Baſil; and Baſil out of a Syrian doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, ſed viri cujuſdam Syri ſententiam recenſebo (ſaith Baſil): which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a ſpecial likeneſs. [d] Verbum tranſlatum eſt ab avibus pullitiei ſuæ incubantibus, quamvis ſpirituali, & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a ſpiritual and unexpreſſible manner.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect, ſpiritus Dei volitabat; The ſpirit of God did flutter: the Chaldean paraphraſt in this ſenſe, Ventus a conſpectu Dei ſufflabat: or, as others underſtand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the [e] 147th Pſalm, He cauſed his wind to blow, and the waters increaſe: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. [f] Arias Montanus in theſe words, Et ſpiritus Elohim Meracheſet, id eſt, efficaciter motitans, confovens, ac agitans ſuper facies gemini liquoris; The ſpirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cheriſhing, quickning and ſtirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh four originals, whereof three are agents, and the laſt paſſive and material, to wit, Cauſa, which is the divine goodneſs: [g] Jehi, which is, fiat, ſive erit, let it be, or, it ſhall be. Quæ vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (ſaith he) was the firſt that was uttered by the word of God. The third, ſpiritus elohim, the ſpirit of God, id eſt, Vis quædam divina, agilis ac præſens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens; that is, a certain divine power, or ſtrength, every where active and extending, and ſtretching through all, filling and finiſhing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id eſt, Materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my ſelf, I am reſolved (Cum Deus ſit ſuperrationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reaſon above reaſon) that although the effects which follow his wonderful ways of working, may in a meaſure be perceived by man's underſtanding, yet the manner and firſt operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any mind, or ſpirit, compaſſed with a mortal body. Animalis homo quæ Dei ſunt non percipit: For my thoughts (ſaith the Lord in [h] Eſay) are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways. And as the world hath not known God himſelf; ſo are his ways (according to St. Paul) paſt finding out. O righteous father, the world hath not known thee, ſaith Chriſt. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality, and operation, were by incubation or how elſe, the manner is only known to God. [i] Quomodo in omnibus ſit rebus, vel per eſſentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noſter non capit; For how God (ſaith St. Auguſtine, ſpeaking of his ubiquity) is in all things, either by eſſence, preſence, or power, our underſtanding cannot comprehend. [k] Nihil inter Deum hominemque diſtaret, ſi conſilia, & diſpoſitiones illius Majeſtatis æternæ, cogitatio aſſequeretur humana; There would be no difference between God and man, if man's underſtanding could conceive the counſels and diſpoſing of that eternal majeſty; and therefore to be over-curious in ſearching how the all-powerful word of God wrought in the creation of the world, or his all-piercing and operative Spirit diſtinguiſhing, gave form to the matter of the univerſal, is a labour and ſearch like unto his, who, not contented with a known and ſafe ford, will preſume to paſs over the greateſt river in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for ſo doth the one loſe his life, and the other his underſtanding. We behold the ſun, and enjoy his light, as long as we look towards it, but tenderly, and circumſpectly: we warm ourſelves ſafely, while we ſtand near the fire; but if we ſeek to out-face the one, or enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eſchew curioſity; this is true, that the Engliſh word (moved) is moſt proper and ſignificant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatſoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with Mirandula, Vis cauſæ efficientis, The force of the efficient cauſe, St. Auguſtine ſometimes taketh for the Holy Ghoſt; ſometimes for a wind or breath, Sub nomine ſpiritus, Under the name of a ſpirit, which is ſometimes ſo taken: or for Virtualis creatura, for a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it alſo a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible ſpirit: Anaxagoras, Mentem: Toſtatus, Voluntatem & mentem Dei, The will and mind of God; which Mens, Plato in Timæo maketh Animam mundi, The ſoul of the world: and in his ſixth book, De Republica, he calleth it, The law of heaven; in his epiſtles, The Leader of things to come, and the preſence of things paſt. But as Cyprian wrote of the incarnation of Chriſt our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox filet, & non mea tantum, ſed etiam Angelorum; My mind faileth, my voice is ſilent, and not mine only, but even the voice of angels: ſo may all men elſe ſay in the underſtanding and utterance of the ways and works of the creation; for to him (ſaith [a] Nazianzenus) there is not one ſubſtance by which he is, and another by which he can, Sed conſubſtantiale illi eſt, quicquid ejus eſt, & quicquid eſt; Whatſoever attribute of him there is, and whatſoever he is, it is the very ſame ſubſtance that himſelf is.

But the ſpirit of God which moved upon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, ſeparate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and diſtinguiſhed, and which now ſuſtaineth and giveth continuance to the univerſal. For the ſpirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the ſame is it which maintaineth all things, ſaith [b] Solomon. If thou ſend forth thy ſpirit (ſaith David) they are created: and Gregory, Deus ſuo præſentiali eſſe, dat omnibus rebus eſſe, ita quod ſi ſe rebus ſubtraheret, ſicut de nihilo facta ſunt omnia, ſic in nihilum defluerent univerſa: God giveth being to all things, by being preſent with all things, ſo as if he ſhould withdraw himſelf from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would again fall away and vaniſh into nothing. And this working of God's ſpirit in all things, [c] Virgil hath expreſs'd excellently:

Principio cœlum ac terras, campoſque liquentes,
Lucentemque globum lunæ, Titaniaque aſtra,
Spiritus intus alit: totamque infuſa per artus,
Mens agitat molem, & magno ſe corpore miſcet.

The heaven, the earth, and all the liquid main,
The moon's bright globe, and ſtars Titanian,
A ſpirit within maintains: and their whole maſs,
A mind, which through each part infus'd doth paſs.
Faſhions, and works, and wholly doth tranſpierce
All this great body of the univerſe.

And this was the ſame ſpirit, which moved in the univerſal, and thereby both diſtinguiſhed and adorned it. [d] His ſpirit hath garniſhed the heavens, ſaith Job. So then the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and created in them their ſpirituality, and natural motion; motion brought forth heat; and heat rarifaction, and ſubtilty of parts. By this ſpirit (which gave heat and motion, and thereby operation to every nature, while it moved upon the waters, which were in one indigeſted lump, and [e] chaos, diſpoſed to all forms alike) was begotten air: an element ſuperior, as lighter than the waters; thro' whoſe vaſt, open, ſubtile, diaphanick or tranſparent body, the light, afterwards created, might eaſily tranſpierce: light for the excellency thereof being the firſt creature which God called good, whoſe creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chryſoſtom calleth a vital operation, Aquis a Deo inſitam, ex qua aquæ non ſolum motionem, ſed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vital operation given by God unto the waters, whereby the waters had not only motion, but alſo power to procreate or bring forth living creatures.

SECT. VII.

Of the light created, as the material ſubſtance of the ſun, and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and uſe of it: and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

THeſe waters were afterwards congregated, and called the ſea: and this light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the ſun, the organ and inſtrument of created light. For this firſt and diſperſed light did not (as I conceive) diſtinguiſh the night from the day, but with a reference to the ſun's creation, and the uniting of the diſperſed light therein. This is proved by theſe words, [f] Let there be lights in the firmament, to ſeparate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of heaven, were alſo made for ſigns, and for ſeaſons, and for days, and for years, implying a motion inſtantly to follow, by which, days and years are diſtinguiſhed; after which ſucceeded time, or together with which, that time (which was the meaſure of motion) began. For that ſpace of the firſt three days which preceded the ſun's creation, or formal perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be meaſured, and the day named in the fifth verſe; was but ſuch a ſpace, as afterwards by the ſun's motion made a civil or natural day. And as waters were the matter of air, of the firmament, and of the lower and upper waters, and of the ſeas, and creatures therein; earth, the matter of beaſts, plants, minerals, and man's body: ſo may light (for expreſſion ſake) be called the chaos, or material ſubſtance of the ſun, and other lights of heaven: howbeit, neither the ſun, nor any thing ſenſible, is that light it ſelf, [g] Quæ cauſa eſt lucidorum, Which is the cauſe that things are lightſome (tho' it make it ſelf and all things elſe viſible:) but a body moſt illightned, which illuminateth the moon, by whom the neighbouring region (which the Greeks call æther, the place of the ſuppoſed element of fire) is effected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our air. For this light Avicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium cœleſtium virtutum, & impreſſionum; The conducter, and preſerver, or nouriſher of all celeſtial virtues and impreſſions, nothing deſcending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Ariſtotle calleth light a quality, inherent or cleaving to a diaphanous body, Lumen eſt qualitas inhærens diaphano: but this may be better avouched of the heat, which it tranſporteth, and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heat (ſay the Platonicks) [h] Abeunte lumine reſidet in ſubjecto; The light being departed, doth reſide in the ſubject, as warmth in the air, tho' the ſame be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academics make incorporal, and ſo doth Montanus, Cui nec duritia reſiſtit, nec ſpatium; Which neither hardneſs reſiſteth, nor ſpace leaveth.

Ariſtotle findeth corporality in the beams of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, ſaith [i] Picolomineus, Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, give materiality to light itſelf, but improperly: for it paſſeth at an inſtant, from the heaven to the earth; nor is it reſiſted by any hardneſs, becauſe it pierceth thro' the ſolid body of glaſs, or other criſtalline matter; and whereas it is withſtood by unclean, and unpure earthy ſubſtances, leſs hard, and more eaſy to invade than the former, the ſame is, [k] Quod obſtaculum natura terreum atque ſordidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem; Becauſe an obſtacle, by nature earthy and foul, doth not receive the pure clearneſs of light: alluding to that moſt divine light, which only ſhineth on thoſe minds, which are purged from all worldly droſs, and human uncleanneſs.

But of this created light there is no agreement in opinion; neither do I marvel at it, for it cannot be found either in the fathers, philoſophers, ſchool-men, or other ancient or latter writers, that any of them underſtood either it or themſelves therein: all men (to caſt off ignorance) have diſputed thereof, but there is no man that hath been taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferior to any in wit) as he hath ſhewed little ſtrength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: ſo is his own judgment herein, as weak as any man's; and moſt of the ſchoolmen were rather curious in the nature of terms, and more ſubtile in diſtinguiſhing upon the parts of doctrine already laid down, than diſcoverers of any thing hidden, either in philoſophy or divinity: of whom it may be truly ſaid, Nihil ſapientiæ odioſius acumine nimio; Nothing is more odious to true wiſdom, than too acute ſharpneſs. Neither hath the length of time, and the ſearch of many learned men (which the ſame time hath brought forth and devoured) reſolved us, whether this light be ſubſtantial, corporal, or incorporal: corporal they ſay it cannot be, becauſe then it could neither pierce the air, nor thoſe hard, ſolid, and diaphanous bodies, which it doth; and yet every day we ſee the air illightned: Incorporal it cannot be, becauſe it ſometime affecteth the ſight of the eye with offence, and therefore by moſt of the fathers ſo eſteemed. Others ſay (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, becauſe no form ſo excellent as it ſelf to inform it: neither can it be any accident, which is not ſeparable without the deſtruction of the ſubject: for light being taken from the ſun, the ſun is no more the ſun in exiſtence. 2dly, If light were proceeding from matter and form, then either, or both, muſt be one of theſe, lucid or bright, dark or opake, diaphanous or tranſparent; but darkneſs cannot be parent of light, and things diaphanous (being neither light nor darkneſs, but capable of either) cannot be the cauſe of either, and therefore muſt the matter, or form, or both, be lucid and ſhining. [a] Lucid and ſhining obtain their ſo being of the light; and therefore if we derive this being of light from a former, then would the progreſs go on infinitely and againſt nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the ſun hath his being primarily, and immediately of it ſelf, and is therefore the ſun's form, and the form of all lucid and ſhining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

But in my underſtanding, Lumen (which may be engliſhed by the word ſhine) is an intentional ſpecies of that which may be engliſhed by light; and ſo, this ſhining, which proceedeth from the ſun, or other lights of heaven, or from any other light, is an image, or intentional ſpecies thereof; and an intentional ſpecies may be underſtood by the example of a red or green colour, occaſioned by the ſhining of the ſun through red or green glaſs: for then we perceive the ſame colour caſt upon any thing oppoſite; which redneſs or other colour we call the intentional ſpecies of the colour in that glaſs. And again, as this light, touching his ſimple nature, is no way yet underſtood, ſo it is diſputed, whether this light firſt created, be the ſame which the ſun inholdeth and caſteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the ſun's creation.

But by the moſt wiſe and unchanged order, which God obſerved in the works of the world, I gather, that the light, in the firſt day created, was the ſubſtance of the ſun: for [b] Moſes repeateth twice the main parts of the univerſal: firſt, as they were created in matter; 2dly, As they were adorned with form: firſt, naming the heavens, the earth, the waters, all confuſed; and afterward, the waters congregated, the earth made dry land; and the heavens diſtinguiſhed from both, and beautified. And therefore the earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or dry land; and the waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the ſea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their virtual forms: ſo the ſun, although it had not its formal perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the ſubſtance thereof in the firſt day (under the name of light) created; and this light formerly diſperſed, was in the ſame fourth day united, and ſet in the firmament of heaven: for, to light created in the firſt day God gave no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation (which was to ſeparate day from night) were preciſely performed, after this light was congregated and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wiſdom of God find cauſe why it ſhould move (by which motion, days and nights are diſtinguiſhed) till then: becauſe there was not yet any creature produced, to which, by moving, the ſun might give light, heat, and operation.

But after the earth (diſtinguiſhed from waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herb, &c. God cauſed the ſun to move, and (by interchange of time) to viſit every part of the inferior world; by his heat to ſtir up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the ſeeds of all natures: [c] For, as a king, which commandeth ſome goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the ſame to that uſe and end, to which it was ordained; ſo it pleaſed God (ſaith Procopius) to command the light to be; which by his all-powerful word he approved, and approving it, diſpoſed thereof to the uſe and comfort of his future creatures.

But in that it pleaſed God to ask of [d] Job, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under man's underſtanding; and therefore let it ſuffice, that by God's grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treaſure of God (ſaith [e] Eſdras) and thoſe which inhabit the heavens, do only know the Eſſence thereof. Nihil ignotum in cœlo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknown in heaven, nothing perfectly known on earth. [f] Res veræ ſunt in mundo inviſibili; in mundo viſibili umbræ rerum: Things themſelves are in the inviſible world; in the world viſible, but their ſhadows. Surely, if this light be not ſpiritual, yet it approacheth neareſt unto ſpirituality; and if it have any corporality, then of all other the moſt ſubtile and pure; for howſoever it is of all things ſeen, the moſt beautiful, and of the ſwifteſt motion, of all other the moſt neceſſary and beneficial. For it miniſtreth unto men, and other creatures, all celeſtial influences; it diſſipateth thoſe ſad thoughts and ſorrows, which the darkneſs both begetteth and maintaineth; it diſcovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up with an angelical ſwiftneſs, our eyes unto heaven, that by the ſight thereof, our minds being informed of his viſible marvels, may continually travel to ſurmount theſe perceived heavens, and to find out their omnipotent cauſe and Creator. [g] Cognitio non quieſcit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it ſelf in things created. Et ipſa lux facit, ut cætera mundi membra digna ſint laudibus, cum ſuam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the light (ſaith St. Ambroſe) that maketh the other parts of the world ſo worthy of praiſe, ſeeing that it ſelf communicateth its goodneſs and beauty unto all. Of which Ovid out of Orpheus:

Ille

[a] Ille ego ſum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus,
Mundi oculus.

The world diſcerns it ſelf, while I the world behold,
By me the longeſt years, and other times are told,
I the world's eye.

Laſtly, if we may behold in any creature, any one ſpark of that eternal fire, or any far-off dawning of God's glorious brightneſs, the ſame in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipſa, and the light, by Hermes named lux ſancta, and Chriſt our Saviour ſaid to be [b] that light, which lightneth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in reſpect of God's incomprehenſible ſublimity, and purity, this is alſo true, that God is neither a mind, nor a ſpirit of the nature of other ſpirits; nor a light, ſuch as can be diſcerned. Deus profecto non mens eſt, at vero ut ſit mens cauſa eſt; nec ſpiritus, ſed cauſa qua ſpiritus extat; nec lumen, ſed cauſa qua lumen exiſtit. God (ſaith Hermes in Pœmandro) certainly is not a mind, but the cauſe that the mind hath his being; nor ſpirit, but the cauſe by which every ſpirit is; nor light, but the cauſe by which the light exiſteth.

So then the maſs and chaos being firſt created, void, dark, and informed, was by the operative ſpirit of God, pierced and quickned, and the waters having now received ſpirit and motion, reſolved their thinner parts into air, which God illightned: the earth alſo by being contiguate, and mixt with waters (participating the ſame divine virtue) [c] brought forth the bud of the herb that ſeedeth ſeed, &c. and for a mean and organ, by which this operative virtue might be continued, God appointed the light to be united, and gave it alſo motion and heat, which heat cauſed a continuance of thoſe ſeveral ſpecies, which the earth (being made fruitful by the ſpirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times ſucceeding.

SECT. VIII.

Of the firmament, and of the waters above the firmament: and whether there be any cryſtalline heaven, or any primum mobile.

After that the ſpirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God ſaid, Let there be a firmament in the midſt of the waters, and let it ſeparate the waters from the waters: that is, thoſe waters which by rarifaction and evaporation were aſcended, and thoſe of the earth and ſea.

But theſe waters, ſeparate above this extenſion, which the Latin tranſlation calleth firmamentum, or expanſum (for ſo Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius turn it) are not the cryſtalline heavens created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Baſilius Magnus calleth a childiſh ſuppoſition, making in the ſame place many learned arguments againſt this fancy. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the air above us, where the ſame is more ſolid and condenſe, which God ſeparated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended diſtance and vaſt ſpace: the words Raquia (which Montanus writeth Rakiagh) and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the heaven and for air, and more properly for the air and æther, than for the heavens, as the beſt Hebricians underſtand them, [c] Quo ſuprema ac tenuia ab infirmis craſſis diducta, interſectaque diſtarent; For that whereby the ſupreme and thin bodies were placed in diſtance, being ſevered and cut off from low and groſs matters: and the waters above the firmament, expreſs'd in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the air, or in the uppermoſt region of the ſame.

And that the word heaven is uſed for the air, the ſcriptures every where witneſs; as in the [e] bleſſings of Joſeph, and in the 104th Pſalm, [f] By theſe ſprings ſhall the fowl of the heaven dwell; and upon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimſtone and fire out of the heaven; and in Iſaac's bleſſing to Jacob, [g] God give thee therefore of the dew of heaven: and in [h] Deuteronomy the 11th, But the land whither you go to poſſeſs it, is a land that drinketh water of the rain of heaven: and in [i] Job, Who hath ingendered the froſts of heaven? and in St. [k] Matthew, Behold the fowls of heaven, for they ſow not. So as in all the ſcriptures of the Old Teſtament throughout, is the word heaven very oft uſed for air, and taken alſo hyperbolically for any great height, as, [l] Let us build us a tower, whoſe top may reach to heaven, &c. And in this very place Baſil avoucheth, that this appellation of heaven for the firmament, is but by way of ſimilitude: his own words be theſe; Et vocavit Deus firmamentum cœlum. Hæc appellatio alii quidem proprie accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad ſimilitudinem; And God called the firmament heaven: this appellation (ſaith Baſil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the ſtarry heaven) but to this (that is, to the firmament dividing the waters) it is impoſed by ſimilitude. And if there were no other proof, that by the firmament was meant the air, and not the heaven; the words of Moſes in the 8th verſe, conferred with the ſame word firmament in the 20th verſe, make it manifeſt: for in the 8th verſe it is written, that God called the firmament, which divided waters from waters, heaven; and in the 20th verſe he calleth the firmament of heaven, air; in theſe words, And let the fowl fly upon earth in the open firmament of heaven. And what uſe there ſhould be of this icey, or cryſtalline, or watery heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the primum mobile would otherwiſe gather and increaſe: though in very truth, inſtead of this help, it would add an unmeaſurable greatneſs of circle, whereby the ſwiftneſs of that firſt moveable would exceed all poſſibility of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impoſſibilia; But no man ought to be held to impoſſibilities; and faith it ſelf (which ſurmounteth the height of all human reaſon) hath for a forcible conductor the word of truth, which alſo may be called Lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; The light of all reaſon and underſtanding. Now that this ſuppoſed firſt moveable, turneth it ſelf ſo many hundred thouſand miles in an inſtant (ſeeing the ſcriptures teach it not) let thoſe that can believe mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of theſe many heavens, let the reader that deſireth ſatisfaction, ſearch Orontius; and of this watery heaven, Baſilius Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40, 41, &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, in his 2d book and 6th chapter. For my ſelf, I am perſuaded, that the waters called, The waters above the heavens, are but the clouds and waters engendred in the uppermoſt air.

SECT. IX.

A concluſion, repeating the ſum of the works in the creation, which are reduced to three heads: the creation of matter, the forming of it, the finiſhing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the firſt chapter of Geneſis, that this was the order of the moſt wiſe God in the beginning, and when there was was no other nature, or being, but God's incomprehenſible eternity. Firſt, he created the matter of all things: and in the firſt three days he diſtinguiſhed, and gave to every nature his proper form; the form of levity to that which aſcended; to that which deſcended, the form of gravity: for he ſeparated light from darkneſs, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the firmament into one place. In the laſt three days, God adorned, beautified, and repleniſhed the world: he ſet in the firmament of heaven, the ſun, moon, and ſtars; filled the earth with beaſts, the air with fowl, and the ſea with fiſh, giving to all that have life a power generative, thereby to continue their ſpecies, and kinds; to creatures vegetative and growing, their ſeeds in themſelves; for [a] he created all things, that they might have their being: and the generations of the world are preſerved.

SECT. X.

That nature is no principium per ſe; nor form, the giver of being: and of our ignorance how ſecond cauſes ſhould have any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working-power, which we call nature, the beginning of motion and reſt, according to Ariſtotle; the ſame is nothing elſe, but the ſtrength and faculty, which God hath infuſed into every creature, having no other ſelf-ability, than a clock, after it is wound up by a man's hand, hath. Thoſe therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any firſt or ſole power, have therein no other underſtanding, than ſuch a one hath, who looking into the ſtern of a ſhip, and finding it guided by the helm and rudder, doth aſcribe ſome abſolute virtue to the piece of wood, without all conſideration of the hand that guides, or of the judgment, which alſo directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in all elſe, that by the virtue of the firſt act, all agents work whatſoever they work: Virtute primi actus, agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: For as the mind of man ſeeth by the organ of the eye, heareth by the ears, and maketh choice by the will: and therefore we attribute ſight to the eye, and hearing to the ears, &c. and yet it is the mind only, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all theſe his inſtruments and organs; ſo God worketh by angels, by the ſun, by the ſtars, by nature or infuſed properties, and by men as by ſeveral organs, ſeveral effects; all ſecond cauſes whatſoever, being but inſtruments, conduits, and pipes, which carry and diſperſe what they have received from the head and fountain of the univerſal. For as it is God's infinite power, and every-where-preſence (compaſſing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the ſun power to draw up vapours, to vapours to be made clouds; clouds to contain rain, and rain to fall: ſo all ſecond and inſtrumental cauſes together with nature it ſelf, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would become altogether ſilent, virtueleſs, and dead: of all which excellently [b] Orpheus; Per te vireſcunt omnia; All things by thee ſpring forth in youthful green. I enforce not theſe things, thereby to annihilate thoſe variable virtues which God hath given to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his works in their virtues praiſe him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the heathen philoſophers, and thoſe that follow them, have taken on them to teach: I ſay, there is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or expreſs it, ever enrich his own underſtanding with any certain truth, or ever edify others (not fooliſh by ſelf-flattery) therein. For (ſaith Lactantius, ſpeaking of the wiſdom of the philoſophers) Si facultas inveniendæ veritatis huic ſtudio ſubjaceret, aliquando eſſet inventa; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingeniis in ejus inquiſitione contritis, non ſit comprehenſa, apparet nullam ibi eſſe ſapientiam; If in this ſtudy (ſaith he) were means to find out the truth, it had ere this been found out: but ſeeing it is not yet comprehended, after that ſo much time, and ſo many wits have been worn out in the enquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wiſdom there to be had. [c] Nam ſi de una re præciſa ſcientia haberetur, omnium rerum ſcientia neceſſario haberetur; If the preciſe knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it ſhould neceſſarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the philoſophers were ignorant in nature, and the ways of her working; ſo were they more curious, than knowing, in their firſt matter and phyſical form. For if their firſt matter had any being, it were not then the firſt matter: for, as it is the firſt matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth ſubſiſt. And ſeeing it is neither a ſubſtance perfect, nor a ſubſtance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other ſubſitance ſhould thence take concreſcence, it hath not been taught, neither are theſe forms (ſaith a learned author) any thing, ſi ex ea exprimatur potentia, quæ nihil eſt. Again, how this firſt matter ſhould be ſubjectum formarum, and paſſive, which is underſtood to precede the form, it is hard to conceive: for to make form, which is the cauſe, to be ſubſequent to the thing cauſed (to wit, to the firſt matter) is contrary to all reaſon, divine and human: only it may be ſaid, that originally there is no other difference between heat and fire, of which the one cannot ſubſiſt without the other, but in a kind of rational conſideration. Leaving therefore theſe riddles to their lovers, who by certain ſcholaſtical diſtinctions wreſt and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Ariſtotle hath laboured to prove a falſe eternity of the world, I think it far ſafer to affirm with St. Auguſtine, That all ſpecies and kinds are from God, from whom, whatſoever is natural proceedeth, of what kind or eſtimation ſoever; from whence are the ſeeds of all forms, and the forms of all ſeeds and their motions; A quo eſt omnis ſpecies, a quo eſt quicquid naturaliter eſt, cujuſcunque generis eſt, cujuſcunque æſtimationis eſt; a quo ſunt ſemina formarum, formæ ſeminum, motus ſeminum atque formarum. And thus much Averrois is forced to confeſs. For all forms (ſaith he) are, in primo motore; which is alſo the opinion of [d] Ariſtotle in the 12th of his Metaph. and of Albertus upon Dionyſius.

SECT. XI.

Of fate; and that the ſtars have great influence: and that their operations may diverſly be prevented or furthered.

AND, as of nature, ſuch is the diſpute and contention concerning fate or deſtiny, of which the opinions of thoſe learned men that have written thereof, may be ſafely received, had they not thereunto annexed and faſtened an inevitable neceſſity, and made it more general, and univerſally powerful than it is, by giving it dominion over the mind of man, and over his will, of which Ovid, and Juvenal:

[a] Ratio

[a] Ratio fatum vincere nulla valet.
Servis regna dabunt, captivis fata triumphos.
'Gainſt fate no counſel can prevail.
Kingdoms to ſlaves by deſtiny,
To captives triumphs given be.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Phariſees, Priſcillianiſts, the Bardiſaniſts, and others, as [b] Baſil, Auguſtine, and Thomas have obſerved: but that fate is an obedience of ſecond cauſes to the firſt, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platoniſt. [c] Plotinus out of the aſtronomers calleth it a diſpoſition from the acts of celeſtial orbs, unchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the ſame being alſo true enough, in reſpect of all thoſe things which a rational mind doth not order nor direct. Ptolemy, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chryſippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, ſome of them more largely, others more ſtrictly, aſcribe to [d] fate a binding and inevitable neceſſity; and that it is the ſame which is ſpoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoque noſtrum fatus eſt Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the ſtars are inſtruments of far greater uſe, than to give an obſcure light, and for men to gaze on after ſun-ſet: it being manifeſt, that the diverſity of ſeaſons, the winters, and ſummers, more hot and cold, are not ſo uncertained by the ſun and moon alone, who always keep one and the ſame courſe; but that the ſtars have alſo their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given virtues to ſprings and fountains, to cold earth, to plants and ſtones, minerals, and to the excremental parts of the baſeſt living creatures, why ſhould we rob the beautiful ſtars of their working powers? for ſeeing they are many in number, and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not think, that in the treaſury of his wiſdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every ſtar) a peculiar virtue and operation; as every herb, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the earth, hath the like. For as theſe were not created to beautify the earth alone, and to cover and ſhadow her duſty face, but otherwiſe for the uſe of man and beaſt, to feed them and cure them; ſo were not thoſe uncountable glorious bodies ſet in the firmament, to no other end, than to adorn it; but for inſtruments and organs of his divine providence, ſo far as it hath pleaſed his juſt will to determine. Origen upon this place of [e] Geneſis, Let there be light in the firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the ſtars are not cauſes (meaning perchance binding cauſes;) but are as open books, wherein are contained and ſet down all things whatſoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of human wiſdom: which latter part I believe well, and this ſaying of Syracides withal: [f] That there are hid yet greater things than theſe be, and we have ſeen but a few of his works. And though, for the capacity of men, we know ſomewhat, yet in the true and uttermoſt virtues of herbs and plants, which our ſelves ſow and ſet, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celeſtial bodies. For hardly (ſaith [g] Solomon) can we diſcern the things that are upon the earth, and with great labour find we out thoſe things that are before us: who can then inveſtigate the things that are in heaven? [h] Multum eſt de rebus cœleſtibus aliquid cognoſcere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this queſtion of fate, the middle courſe is to be followed, that as with the heathen we do not bind God to his creatures, in this ſuppoſed neceſſity of deſtiny; ſo on the contrary, we do not rob thoſe beautiful creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of theſe ſecond cauſes deſpoiled God of his prerogative, or had God himſelf conſtrained the mind and will of man to impious acts by any celeſtial inforcements, then ſure the impious excuſe of ſome were juſtifiable; of whom St. [i] Auguſtine, Impia perverſitate in malis factis rectiſſime reprehendendis ingerunt accuſandum potius auctorem ſyderum, quam commiſſorem ſcelerum; Where we reprehend them of evil deeds, they again with wicked perverſeneſs urge, that rather the author and creator of the ſtars, than the doer of the evil, is to be accuſed.

But that the ſtars and other celeſtial bodies incline the will by mediation of the ſenſitive appetite, which is alſo ſtirred by the conſtitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora cœleſtia (ſaith Damaſcene) conſtituunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & diſpoſitiones; The heavenly bodies (ſaith he) make in us habits, complexions, and diſpoſitions; for the body (though [k] Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the mind, eſpecially bodies ſtrong in humour, and weak in virtues; for thoſe of cholerick complexions are ſubject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they ſuffer themſelves to be tranſported, where the mind hath not reaſon to remember, that paſſions ought to be her vaſſals, not her maſters. And that they wholly direct the reaſonleſs mind, I am reſolved: for all thoſe which were created mortal, as birds, beaſts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites; over all which, celeſtial bodies (as inſtruments and executioners of God's providence) have abſolute dominion. What we ſhould judge of men, who little differ from beaſts, I cannot tell; for as he that contendeth againſt thoſe inforcements, may eaſily maſter or reſiſt them; ſo whoſoever ſhall neglect the remedies by virtue and piety prepared, putteth himſelf altogether under the power of his ſenſual appetite; [l] Vincetur fatum ſi reſiſtas, vincit ſi contempſeris; Fate will be overcome, if thou reſiſt it; if thou neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the ſtars or the ſun have any power over the minds of men immediately, it is abſurd to think, other than as aforeſaid, as the ſame by the body's temper may be affected. Lumen ſolis ad generationem ſenſibilium corporum confert, & ad vitam ipſam movet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the ſun (ſaith St. [m] Auguſtine) helpeth the generation of ſenſible bodies, moveth them to life, and nouriſheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet ſtill as a miniſter, not as a maſter: Bonus quidem eſt ſol, in miniſterio, non imperio; The ſun is good to ſerve, not to ſway (ſaith St. [n] Ambroſe.) And St. Auguſtine, Deus regit inferiora corpora per ſuperiora; God ruleth the bodies below by thoſe above: but he avoucheth not, that ſuperiour bodies have rule over mens minds, which are incorporal.

But howſoever we are by the ſtars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in nature and art, that encounter the ſame, and weaken their operation; and Ariſtotle himſelf confeſſeth, that the heavens do not always work their effects in inferiour bodies, no more than the ſigns of rain and wind do always come to paſs. And it is divers times ſeen, that paternal virtue and vice hath his counter-working to theſe inclinations. [o] Eſt in juvencis patrum virtus; In the young off-ſpring the fathers virtue is; and ſo on the contrary, patrum vitia: and herein alſo there is often found an interchange; the ſons of virtuous men, by an ill conſtellation, become inclinable to vice; and of vicious men to virtue.

Egregia eſt ſoboles ſcelerato nata parente:
A worthy ſon is born of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after God's reſerved power) that ſo much ſetteth this art of influence out of ſquare and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the world ſo wickedly inclined, but that a religious inſtruction and bringing up, may faſhion anew and reform them; nor any ſo well diſpoſed, whom (the reins being let looſe) the continual fellowſhip and familiarity, and the examples of diſſolute men, may not corrupt and deform. Veſſels will ever retain a ſavour of their firſt liquor: it being equally difficult either to cleanſe the mind once corrupted, or to extinguiſh the ſweet ſavour of virtue firſt received, when the mind was yet tender, open, and eaſily ſeaſoned; but where a favourable conſtellation (allowing that the ſtars incline the will) and a virtuous education do happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found ſo exceeding virtuous or vicious, heaven and earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: for as the ſeeds of virtue may, by the art and husbandry of chriſtian counſel, produce better and more beautiful fruit, than the ſtrength of ſelf-nature and kind could have yielded them; ſo the plants, apt to grow wild, and to change themſelves into weeds, by being ſet in a ſoil ſuitable, and like themſelves, are made more unſavoury and filled with poiſon. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adjuvabit opus aſtrorum, quemadmodum agricola terræ naturam; A wiſe man aſſiſteth the work of the ſtars, as the husbandman helpeth the nature of the ſoil. And Ptolemy himſelf confeſſeth thus much, Sapiens, & omina ſapientis medici dominabuntur aſtris; A wiſe man, and the ominous art of a wiſe phyſician, ſhall prevail againſt the ſtars. Laſtly, we ought all to know that God created the ſtars, as he did the reſt of the univerſal; whoſe influences may be called his reſerved and unwritten laws. But let us conſider how they bind: even as the laws of men do; for although the kings and princes of the world have by their laws decreed, that a thief and a murderer ſhall ſuffer death; and though their ordinances are daily by judges and magiſtrates (the ſtars of kings) executed accordingly; yet theſe laws do not deprive kings of their natural or religious compaſſion, or bind them without prerogative, to ſuch a ſevere execution, as that there ſhould be nothing left of liberty to judgment, power, or conſcience: the law in his own nature, being no other than a deaf tyrant. But ſeeing that it is otherwiſe, and that princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) do ſometimes for cauſes to themſelves known, and by mediation, pardon offences both againſt others and themſelves; it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himſelf, which his ſubſtitutes enjoy; God being mercy, goodneſs, and charity it ſelf. Otherwiſe that example of prayer by our Saviour taught; [a] And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil, had been no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his own creatures truly) hath aſſured us, that there is no inclination or temptation ſo forcible, which our humble prayers and deſires may not make fruſtrate and break aſunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that fate or deſtiny, though depending upon eternal power, yet being once ordered and diſpoſed, had ſuch a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himſelf ſhould in a kind have ſhut up himſelf therein; How miſerable then were the condition of men (ſaith Auguſtine) left altogether without hope.

And if this ſtrength of the ſtars were ſo transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his creatures; be he Pagan or Chriſtian that ſo believeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary Gods of the other, would thereby be deſpoiled of all worſhip, reverence, or reſpect.

And certainly, God which hath promiſed us the reward of well-doing, which Chriſt himſelf claimed at the hands of the Father ([b] I have finiſhed the work which thou gaveſt me to do;) and the ſame God, who hath threatened unto us the ſorrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be ſo unjuſt, as to bind us inevitably to the deſtinies or influences of the ſtars, or ſubject our ſouls to any impoſed neceſſity. But it was well ſaid of Plotinus, that the ſtars were ſignificant, but not efficient, giving them yet ſomething leſs than their due: and therefore as I do not conſent with them, who would make thoſe glorious creatures of God virtueleſs: ſo I think that we derogate from his eternal and abſolute power and providence, to aſcribe to them the ſame dominion over our immortal ſouls, which they have over all bodily ſubſtances, and periſhable natures: for the ſouls of men loving and fearing God, receive influence from that divine light it ſelf, whereof the ſun's clarity, and that of the ſtars, is by Plato called but a ſhadow, [c] Lumen eſt umbra Dei, & Deus eſt lumen luminis; Light is the ſhadow of God's brightneſs, who is the light of light: But to end this queſtion, becauſe this deſtiny, together with providence, preſcience, and predeſtination, are often confounded, I think it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not obſerved it, though all learned men have.

SECT. XII.

Of PRESCIENCE.

PReſcience, or foreknowledge (which the Greeks call Prognoſis, the Latins Præcognitio, or Præſcientia) conſidered in order and nature (if we may ſpeak of God after the manner of men) goeth before providence: for God foreknew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and preſcience is no other than an infallible foreknowledge. For whatſoever our ſelves foreknow, except the ſame be to ſucceed accordingly, it cannot be true that we foreknow it. But this preſcience of God (as it is preſcience only) is not the cauſe of any thing futurely ſucceeding: neither doth God's foreknowledge impoſe any neceſſity, or bind. For in that we foreknow that the ſun will riſe, and ſet; that all men born in the world ſhall die again; that after the winter the ſpring ſhall come; after the ſpring, ſummer, and harveſt; and that according to the ſeveral ſeeds that we ſow, we ſhall reap ſeveral ſorts of grain, yet is not our foreknowledge the cauſe of this, or any of theſe: neither doth the knowledge in us bind or conſtrain the ſun to riſe and ſet, or men to dye; for the cauſes (as men perſuade themſelves) are otherwiſe manifeſt and known to all. The eye of man (ſaith [d] Boetius) beholdeth thoſe things ſubject to ſenſe, as they are; the eye ſeeth that ſuch a beaſt is an horſe, it ſeeth men, trees, and houſes, &c. but our ſeeing of them (as they are) is not the cauſe of their ſo being, for ſuch they be in their own natures. And again out of the ſame author; Divina providentia rebus generandis non imponit neceſſitatem, quia ſi omnia evenirent ex neceſſitate, præmia bonorum, & pœna malorum periret; Divine providence (ſaith he) impoſeth no neceſſity upon things that are to exiſt; for if all come to paſs of neceſſity, there ſhould neither be reward of good, nor puniſhment of evil.

SECT. XIII.

Of PROVIDENCE.

NOW providence (which the Greeks call Pronoia) is an intellectual knowledge, both foreſeeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not only behold all paſt, all preſent, and all to come, but is the cauſe of their ſo being, which preſcience (ſimply taken) is not: and therefore providence by the philoſophers (ſaith St. Auguſtine) is divided into memory, knowledge, and care: memory of the paſt, knowledge of the preſent, and care of the future: and we our ſelves account ſuch a man for provident, as, remembering things paſt, and obſerving things preſent, can by judgment, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times ſucceeding. That ſuch a thing there is as providence, the ſcriptures every where teach us; Moſes in many places, the prophets in their predictions, Chriſt himſelf and his apoſtles aſſure us hereof; and beſides the ſcriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the providence of God; yea the Turks themſelves are ſo confident therein, as they refuſe not to accompany and viſit each other in the moſt peſtilent diſeaſes, nor ſhun any peril whatſoever, though death therein do manifeſtly preſent it ſelf.

The places of ſcripture proving providence, are ſo many, both in general and particular, as I ſhall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: Sing unto God (ſaith [a] David) which covereth the heavens with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the graſs to grow upon the mountains, which giveth the beaſts their food, and feedeth the young raven that cries: [b] All theſe wait upon thee, that thou mayſt give them food in due ſeaſon: [c] and thou ſhalt drink of the river Chereth (ſaith God to Elijah) and I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there. [d] Behold, the fowls of the air, they ſow not, nor reap, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, [e] Are not two ſparrows ſold for a farthing? and one of them ſhall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea, all the hairs of your head are numbred: And St. [f] Peter, Caſt all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his judgments are written, ſaith [g] David.

God therefore, who is every where preſent, [h] Who filleth the heavens and the earth, whoſe eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance againſt them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be eſteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other; for it is contrary to his own word, [i] Gloriam meam alteri non dabo; I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the king's preſence, but by the king's direction; but God is every where preſent, and king of kings. The example of God's univerſal providence is ſeen in his creatures. The father provideth for his children: beaſts and birds and all living, for their young ones. If providence be found in ſecond fathers, much more in the firſt and univerſal: and if there be a natural loving care in men, and beaſts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whoſe divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the univerſal: Amor divinus rerum omnium eſt principium, & vinculum univerſi (ſaith Plato:) Amor Dei eſt nobis perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobile ſuſtentaculum, ac univerſæ machinæ fundamentum; The love of God is the perpetual knot, and link or chain of the world, and the immovable pillar of every part thereof, and the baſis and foundation of the univerſal. God therefore, who could only be the cauſe of all, can only provide for all, and ſuſtain all; ſo as to abſolute power, to every where preſence, to perfect goodneſs, to pure and divine [k] love; this attribute tranſcendent hability of providence is only proper and belonging.

SECT. XIV.

Of PREDESTINATION.

NOW for predeſtination, we can difference it no otherwiſe from providence and preſcience, than in this; that preſcience only foreſeeth; providence foreſeeth and careth for, and hath reſpect to all [l] creatures, even from the brighteſt angels of heaven, to the unworthieſt worms of the earth: and predeſtination (as it is uſed, eſpecially by divines) is only of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their ſalvation properly, in the common uſe of divines; or perdition, as ſome have uſed it. Yet [m] Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernenſis Theologus, and others, take the word predeſtination more ſtrictly, and for a preparation to felicity. Divers of the fathers take it more largely ſometimes: among whom St. Auguſtine ſpeaking of two cities, and two ſocieties, uſeth theſe words: [n] Quarum eſt una, quæ prædeſtinata eſt in æternum regnare cum Deo, altera æternum ſupplicium ſubire cum diabolo; whereof one is it, which is predeſtinated to reign for ever with God, but the other is to undergo everlaſting torment with the devil; for according to Nonius Marcellus, Deſtinare, eſt præparare; and of the ſame opinion are many proteſtant writers, as [o] Calvin, Beza, Bucanus, Danæus, and ſuch like: and as for the manifold queſtions hereof ariſing, I leave them to the divines; and why it hath pleaſed God to create ſome veſſels of honour, and ſome of diſhonour, I will anſwer with Gregory, who ſaith, [p] Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem ſuam conſiderans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that ſeeth no reaſon in the actions of God, by conſideration of his own infirmity, perceiveth the reaſon of his blindneſs. And again with St. [q] Auguſtine, Occulta eſſe cauſa poteſt, injuſta eſſe non poteſt; Hidden the cauſe of his predeſtination may be, unjuſt it cannot be.

SECT. XV.

Of fortune: and of the reaſon of ſome things that ſeem to be by fortune, and againſt reaſon and providence.

LAſtly, ſeeing deſtiny or neceſſity is ſubſequent to God's providence, and ſeeing that the ſtars have no other dominion, than is before ſpoken, and that nature is nothing, but, as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificioſum Dei organum; The art, or artificial organ of God: And Cuſanus, divini præcepti inſtrumentum; The inſtrument of the divine precept: we may then with better reaſon reject that kind of idolatry, or God of fools, called, fortune or chance; a goddeſs, the moſt reverenced, and the moſt reviled of all other, but not ancient: for Homer maketh her the daughter of Oceanus, as Pauſanias witneſſeth in his Meſſeniacks. The Greeks call call her τυχὴν, ſignifying a relative being, or beſtiding, ſo as before Homer's time this great lady was ſcarce heard of; and Heſiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all theſe counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune; yet afterwards ſhe grew ſo great and omnipotent, as from kings and kingdoms, to beggars and cottages, ſhe ordered all things, reſiſting the wiſdom of the wiſeſt, by making the poſſeſſor thereof miſerable; valuing the folly of the moſt fooliſh, by making their ſucceſs proſperous: inſomuch as the actions of men were ſaid to be but the ſports of fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens lives, but her paſtimes: of which [a] Palladius, Vita hominum ludus fortunæ eſt; The life of man is the play of fortune: and becauſe it often falleth out, that enterpriſes guided by ill counſels, have equal ſucceſs to thoſe by the beſt judgment conducted, therefore had fortune the ſame external figure with ſapience; whereof Athenæus:

Longiſſime a ſapientia fors diſſidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen ſimillima:
From wiſdom fortune differs far,
And yet in works moſt like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly underſtood) is nothing elſe but a power imaginary, to which the ſucceſs of human actions and endeavours were for their variety aſcribed; for when a manifeſt cauſe could not be given, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cauſe of thoſe things, of which moſt men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of Plato, Nihil eſt ortum ſub ſole, cujus cauſa legitima non præceſſerit; Nothing ever came to paſs under the ſun, of which there was not a juſt preceding cauſe. But Aquinas hath herein anſwered in one diſtinction, whatſoever may be objected; for many things there are (ſaith he) which happen, beſides the intention of the inferior, but not beſides the intention of the ſuperior; Præter intentionem inferioris, ſed non præter intentionem ſuperioris (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (ſaith [b] Melanchton) Quod poetæ fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; whom the poets call fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the ſcripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of murther, [c] He that ſmiteth a man, and he die, ſhall die the death; and if a man hath not laid wait, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he ſhall flee. Now, where the ſcripture hath theſe words, God hath offered him into his hands, we ſay, if he hurt him by chance: and in [d] Deuteronomy, where the ſlipping the ax from the helve, whereby another is ſlain, was the work of God himſelf; we in our phraſe attribute this accident, to chance or fortune: and in [e] Proverbs, The lot is caſt into the lap, but the whole diſpoſition thereof is of the Lord: ſo as that which ſeemeth moſt caſual and ſubject to fortune, is yet diſpoſed by the ordnance of God, as all things elſe; and hereof the wiſer ſort, and the beſt learned of the philoſophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witneſſeth for them, gathering the opinion of Ariſtotle and his ſectators, with thoſe of Plato, and the Academicks, to this effect, that the ſame power which they called Animam mundi, the ſoul of the world, was no other than that incomprehenſible wiſdom, which we expreſs by the name of God, governing every being as well in heaven as in earth; to which wiſdom and power they ſometime gave the title of neceſſity or [f] fate, becauſe it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: ſometime, the ſtyle of fortune, becauſe of many effects there appear unto us no certain cauſes. To this effect ſpeaketh St. Auguſtine in his queſtions upon Geneſis the firſt book: the ſame hath Seneca in his 4th of Benefits; which was alſo the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which ſect he was: [g] For whatſoever (ſaith he) thou calleſt God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the ſame, differenced by divers terms, according as he uſeth, and exerciſeth his power diverſly.

But it may be objected, that if fortune and chance were not ſometimes the cauſes of good and evil in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expreſs ſucceſs; how comes it then, that ſo many worthy and wiſe men depend upon ſo many unworthy and empty-headed fools? That riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernel; and ſo many learned, virtuous, and valiant men wear out their lives in poor and dejected eſtates? In a word, there is no other inferiour, or apparent cauſe, beſide the partiality of man's affection, but the faſhioning and not faſhioning of our ſelves according to the nature of the time wherein we live: for whoſoever is moſt able, and beſt ſufficient to diſcern, and hath withal an honeſt and open heart and loving truth: if princes, or thoſe that govern, endure no other diſcourſe than their own flatteries: then, I ſay, ſuch an one, whoſe virtue and courage forbiddeth him to be baſe and a diſſembler, ſhall evermore hang under the wheel; which kind of deſerving well and receiving ill, we always falſly charge fortune withal. For whoſoever ſhall tell any great man or magiſtrate, that he is not juſt; the general of an army, that he is not valiant; and great ladies, that they are not fair; ſhall never be a counſeller, a captain, or a courtier. Neither is it ſufficient to be wiſe with a wiſe prince, valiant with a valiant, and juſt with him that is juſt, for ſuch a one hath no eſtate in his proſperity; but he muſt alſo change with the ſucceſſor, if he be of contrary qualities; ſail with the tide of the time, and alter form and condition, as the eſtate or the eſtate's maſter changeth: otherwiſe how were it poſſible, that the moſt baſe men, and ſeparate from all imitable qualities, could ſo often attain to honour and riches, but by ſuch an obſervant ſlaviſh courſe? Theſe men having nothing elſe to value themſelves by, but a counterfeit kind of wondering at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are virtues, and all their duſty actions cryſtalline, have yet in all ages proſpered equally with the moſt virtuous, if not exceeded them. For, according to Menander, Omnis inſipiens arrogantia & plauſibus capitur; Every fool is won with his own pride, and others flattering applauſe: So as whoſoever will live altogether out of himſelf, and ſtudy other mens humours, and obſerve them, ſhall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and virtue (except the ſeaſon wherein he liveth be of all theſe, and of all ſorts of goodneſs, fruitful) ſhall never proſper by the poſſeſſion or profeſſion thereof. It is alſo a token of a worldly wiſe man, not to war or contend in vain againſt the nature of times wherein he liveth: for ſuch a one is often the author of his own miſery; but beſt it were to follow the advice, which the pope gave the biſhops of that age, out of Ovid, while the Arian hereſy raged:

While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man fury's gallop ſtay.

And if Cicero (than whom that world begat not a man of more reputed judgment) had followed the counſel of his brother Quintus, Potuiſſet (ſaith Petrarch) in lectulo ſuo mori, potuiſſet integro cadavere ſepeliri; He might then have died the death of nature, and been with an untorn and undiſſevered body buried; for, as, Petrarch in the ſame place noteth, Quid ſtultius quam deſperantem (præſertim de effectu) litibus perpetuis implicari? What more fooliſh than for him that deſpairs (eſpecially of the effect) to be entangled with endleſs contentions? Whoſoever therefore will ſet before him Machiavel's two marks to ſhoot at (to wit, riches, and glory, muſt ſet on and take off a back of iron to a weak wooden bow, that it may fit both the ſtrong and the feeble; for as he, that firſt deviſed to add ſails to rowing veſſels, did either ſo proportion them as being faſtened aloft, and towards the head of his maſt, he might abide all winds and ſtorms, or elſe he ſometime or other periſhed by his own invention: ſo that man which prizeth virtue for itſelf, and cannot endure to hoiſe and ſtrike his ſails, as the divers natures of calms and ſtorms require, muſt cut his ſails and his cloth of mean length and breadth, and content himſelf with a ſlow and ſure navigation (to wit) a mean and free eſtate. But of this diſpute of fortune, and the reſt, or of whatſoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or cauſes, the wit (or rather fooliſhneſs) of man hath found out: let us reſolve with St. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is [a] but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him, and one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diverſities of operations, but God is the ſame, which worketh all in all.

CHAP. II.

Of Man's eſtate in his firſt Creation, and of God's reſt.

SECT. I.

Of the image of God, according to which man was firſt created.

THE creation of all other creatures being finiſhed, the heavens adorned, and the earth repleniſhed, God ſaid, [a] Let us make man in our own image, according to our likeneſs.

Man is the laſt and moſt admirable of God's works to us known: [b] Ingens miraculum homo; Man is the greateſt wonder (ſaith Plato out of Mercurius:) Naturæ ardentiſſimæ artificium; The artificial work of the moſt ardent or fire-like nature (as ſaith Zoroaſter;) though the ſame be meant, not for any excellency external, but in reſpect of his internal form, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, becauſe it hath an eſſence, immortal and ſpiritual in qualities, becauſe the ſame was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, becauſe man was made lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

[c] Sanctius his animal, mentiſque capacius altæ,
Deerat adhuc, & quod dominari in cætera poſſet:
Natus homo eſt.

More holy than the reſt, and underſtanding more,
A living creature wants, to rule all made before,
So man began to be.

Of this image and ſimilitude of God, there is much diſpute among the fathers, ſchoolmen, and late writers: ſome of the fathers conceive, that man was made after the image of God, in reſpect chiefly of empire and dominion, as St. Chryſoſtom, Ambroſe, and ſome others: which St. Ambroſe denieth to the woman in theſe words, Ut ſicut Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus; & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus eſſet ſuper faciem totius terræ: unus igitur unum fecit, qui unitatis ejus haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewiſe of one man the whole kind ſhould be upon the face of the whole earth: therefore he being one, made one, that ſhould have the image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the ſame verſe, that man was after the image of God in reſpect of rule and power; it is written Dominamini in the plural number; and let them rule over the fiſh in the ſea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that man is ſaid to be after the image of God in reſpect of his immortal ſoul only: becauſe as God is inviſible, ſo the ſoul of man is inviſible; as God is immortal and incorporal, ſo is the ſoul of man immortal and incorporal; and as there is but one God which governeth the world, ſo but one ſoul which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, ſo is the ſoul of man wholly in every part of the body: Anima eſt tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The ſoul is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Ariſtotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men, deny that doctrine; which that it is otherwiſe than potentially true, all the Ariſtotelians in the world ſhall never prove. Theſe and the like arguments do the Jews make (ſaith Toſtatus) and theſe reſemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite man.

The ſchool-men reſemble the mind or ſoul of man to God, in this reſpect eſpecially; becauſe that as in the mind there are three diſtinct powers, or faculties (to wit) memory, underſtanding, and will; and yet all theſe being of real differences, are but one mind: ſo in God there are three diſtinct perſons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, and yet but one God. They alſo make the image and ſimilitude divers; and again, they diſtinguiſh between imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei; and ſpin into ſmall threds with ſubtile diſtinctions many times the plainneſs and ſincerity of the ſcriptures: their wits being like that ſtrong water, that eateth thro' and diſſolveth the pureſt gold. Victorinus alſo maketh the image of God to be ſubſtantial, but not the ſimilitude: Sed in ſubſtantia nomen qualitatis declarativum; A word declaring quality in the ſubſtance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the image and ſimilitude do greatly differ, ſo the ſinful ſoul doth not therefore leave to be the image of God; but it hath not his ſimilitude, except it be holy and righteous. St. Auguſtine alſo againſt Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth,

that by ſin, the perfection of this image is loſt in man; and in his retractions maintaineth the ſame opinion, and alſo affirmeth that the ſimilitude is more largely taken, than the image.

But howſoever the ſchool-men and others diſtinguiſh, or whatſoever the fathers conceive; ſure I am, that St. Paul maketh the ſame ſenſe of the image, which Victorinus doth of the ſimilitude, who ſaith, [a] As we have borne the image of the earthly, ſo ſhall we bear the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the ſcriptures, that the words image and ſimilitude were uſed but in one ſenſe, and in this place the better to expreſs each other; whatſoever Lombard hath ſaid to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himſelf in the ſcriptures, which neither Moſes, the Prophets, or Apoſtles, ever conceived. Now as St. Paul uſeth the word (image) for both: ſo St. James uſeth the word (ſimilitude) for both, in theſe words: [b] Therewith bleſs we God even the Father, and therewith curſe we men, which are made after the ſimilitude of God. Howſoever therefore St. Auguſtine ſeemeth, out of a kind of elegancy in writing, to make ſome difference: as where he writeth, [c] Confitemur imaginem in æternitate, ſimilitudinem in moribus inveniri; We confeſs that this image is found in eternity, but his ſimilitude in manners, that is, in the ſpiritual diſpoſitions and qualities of the mind; yet thus he elſewere ſpeaketh plainly: [d] Quaſi vero poſſit eſſe imago aliqua, in qua ſimilitudo non ſit: ſi enim omnino ſimilis non eſt, proculdubio nec imago eſt; As if (ſays he) there could be any image, where the ſimilitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeneſs, there is no image. The very words of the text make this moſt manifeſt, as, Let us make man in our image, according to our likeneſs; which is, Let us make man in our image, that he may be like us: and in the next verſe following, God himſelf maketh it plain; for there he uſeth the word (image) only as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all diſpute or ambiguity, in the firſt verſe of the fifth chapter, the word (ſimilitude) is uſed again by it ſelf, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeneſs of God made he him. And this ſimilitude [e] St. Paul, calleth the image; Put on (ſaith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may believe St. Paul before Peter Lombard and other ſchool-men, then it is as manifeſt as words can make it, that the image and ſimilitude is but the ſame; for St. Paul uſeth both the words directly in one ſenſe. [f] For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the ſimilitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to prove, that man was formed after the image of God, both in body and mind: [g] Nulla pars in homine, quæ non fuerit hujuſce imaginis particeps; No part in a man (ſaith he) which was not participating God's image; for God ſaid, Let us make man according to our own image. But the ſoul alone is not man, but the Hypoſtaſis or whole man compounded of body and ſoul. The body of man (ſaith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcoſmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was firſt in God, ſo that man, according to his body, muſt needs be the image of God. Againſt which opinion of this learned man, his own objection ſeemeth to me ſufficient, where he alledgeth that it may be ſaid, that Moſes ſpake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortal man, yet is not the whole man mortal, but the body only: ſo when God ſaid, Let us make man after our image, he meant the ſoul of man, and not the body of earth and duſt: [h] Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (ſaith St. Auguſtine;) Curſed is he that referreth the Deity of God to the lineaments of man's body: Deus enim non eſt humanæ formæ particeps, neque corpus humanum divinæ (ſaith Philo;) God is not partaker of human form, nor human body of the form divine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tſelem, which ſignifieth a ſhadow or obſcure reſemblance: In imagine pertranſit homo; Man paſſeth away in ſhadow: Let us then know and conſider, that God, who is eternal and infinite, hath not any bodily ſhape or compoſition, for it is both againſt his nature and his word; an error of the Anthropomorphitæ, againſt the very eſſence and majeſty of God.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine underſtanding than theſe groſs Hereticks: Ad ſimilitudinem Dei propius accedebat humana virtus, quam figura; The virtue which is in man (ſaith he) came nearer the ſimilitude of God than the figure. For God is a ſpiritual ſubſtance, inviſible, and moſt ſimple; God is a juſt God, God is merciful, God is charity it ſelf, and (in a word) goodneſs it ſelf, and none elſe ſimply good. And thus much it hath pleaſed God himſelf to teach us, and to make us known of himſelf. What then can be the ſhadow of ſuch a ſubſtance, the image of ſuch a nature, or wherein can man be ſaid to reſemble his unexcogitable power and perfectneſs? Certainly, not in [i] dominion alone; for the devil is ſaid to be the prince of this world, and the [k] kingdom of Chriſt was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father: neither becauſe man hath an immortal ſoul, and therein the faculties of memory, underſtanding, and will; for the devils are alſo immortal, and participate thoſe faculties, being called [l] dæmones, becauſe ſcientes of knowledge and ſubtilty: neither becauſe we are reaſonable creatures, by which we are diſtinguiſhed from beaſts: for who have rebelled againſt God? who have made gods of the vileſt beaſts, of ſerpents, of cats, of owls, yea, even of ſhameful parts, of luſts and pleaſures, but reaſonable men? Yet do I not condemn the opinion of St. [m] Chryſoſtom and Ambroſe, as touching dominion, but that, in reſpect thereof, man was in ſome ſort after the image of God, if we take dominion, ſuch as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with juſtice and piety; for God did not only make man a ruler and governor over the fiſhes of the ſea, the fowls of heaven (or of the air) and over the beaſts of the field; but God gave unto man a dominion over men, he appointed kings to govern them, and judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude reaſon, as it is the ability of underſtanding. For I do not conceive, that Irenæus did therefore call man, the image of God, becauſe he was animal rationale only; but that he underſtood it better, with Sybilla; Imago mea eſt homo, rectam rationem habens; Man that is endued with right reaſon is ſaid to reſemble God (that is) by right reaſon to know and confeſs God his Creator, and the ſame God to ſerve, love, and obey; and therefore ſaid St. Auguſtine (who herein came nearer the truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & ſimilitudinem ſuam in mente; God made man in reſpect of the intellect after his own image and ſimilitude; and

Reynerius,

SECT. II.

Of the intellectual mind of man, in which there is much of the image of God; and that this image is much deformed by ſin.

BUT mens is not taken here for anima phyſica, according to Ariſtotle, which is, forma vel natura hominis; The form or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principal ſtrength of the mind, [or ſoul] cujus actus eſt perepetua veritatis contemplatio; whoſe act [exerciſe, or office] is the perpetual contemplation of truth; and therefore it is alſo called [b] intellectus divinus, intellectus contemplativus, & anima contemplativa; A divine underſtanding, and an intellect or mind contemplative. [c] Eſt autem mens noſtra (ſaith Cuſanus) vis comprehendendi; & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compoſitum; Our intellectual mind (ſaith he) is a power of comprehending; even the whole, that is in this kind powerful, compounded of all the powers of comprehenſion: unto which Mercurius attributeth ſo much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he eſteemeth it to be the very eſſence of God (which was alſo the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwiſe ſeparate from God (ſaith he) than the light from the ſun: for this mens, or underſtanding (ſaith Mercurius) [d] eſt Deus in hominibus; Is God in men; or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For, as the ſun is not of the ſame eſſence or nature with the divine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; ſo is this mens or underſtanding in men, not of the eſſence of God's infinite underſtanding, but a power and faculty of our ſouls the pureſt; or, the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternal light illightned. And this mens others call animam animæ, the ſoul of the ſoul; or, with St. Auguſtine, the eye of the ſoul, or receptacle of ſapience and divine knowledge, Quæ amorem ſapientiæ tanquam ducem ſequitur; Which followeth after the love of ſapience as her guide (ſaith Philo;) between which and reaſon; between which and the mind, called anima; between which and that power which the Latins call animus, there is this difference: reaſon, is that faculty by which we judge and diſcourſe; anima, by which we live. Hereof it is ſaid, Anima corpus animat, id eſt, vivificat; [or] The ſoul is that which doth animate the body, that is, giveth it life; for death is the ſeparation of body and ſoul: and the ſame ſtrength (ſaith Philo) which God the great director hath in the world, the ſame hath this anima, or mind, or, ſoul in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Baſil agreeth, which calleth this mens, or divine underſtanding, Perſpicacem animæ partem; The perceiving part of the mind, or, the light by which the ſoul diſcerneth: Dormientium mens, non anima, ſopitur; & in furioſis mens extinguitur, anima manet: In men that ſleep it is this (mens, or) underſtanding, and not the mind or ſoul, which reſteth, during which time it is but habitual in wiſe men, and in mad men this (mens) is extinguiſhed, and not the ſoul; for mad men do live, though diſtract.

Therefore this word being often uſed for the ſoul giving life, is attributed abuſively to mad men, when we ſay that they are of a diſtract mind, inſtead of a broken underſtanding: which word (mind) we uſe alſo for opinion, as, I am of this mind, or, that mind: and ſometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, he is of an honeſt mind, or, a man of a juſt mind: ſometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mind's ſake: and Ariſtotle ſometimes uſeth this word (mens) for the phantaſy, which is the ſtrength of the imagination: ſometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without diſcourſe: oftentimes for ſpirits, angels, and intelligences: but as it is uſed in the proper ſignification, including both the underſtanding agent and poſſible, it is deſcribed to be a pure, ſimple, ſubſtantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his firſt object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the ſoul, whereby it doth underſtand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from paſſion coming from without, and apt to be diſſevered, as, eternal from that which is mortal. Hereof excellently Mercurius; Anima eſt imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præeſt, mens animæ, anima corpori; The ſoul (meaning that which giveth life) is the image of this underſtanding, or mens; and this (mens) or underſtanding is the image of God. God is preſident or ruler over this underſtanding, this underſtanding over the ſoul, and this ſoul over the body. This diviſion and diſtinction out of the Platonics, and Peripateticks, I leave to the reader to judge of. That Mens humana hath no need of any organ, [e] Marſilius Ficinus in his 9th book of the ſoul's immortality, laboureth to prove. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words; for (ſaith he) [f] Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam, non eget mens organo; tanquam medio, per quod intelligat: quanquam eget objecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat. Hoc autem objectum ſunt phantaſmata, ſeu rerum a ſenſibus perceptarum ſimulachra ad phantaſiam prolata: To exerciſe the faculty of underſtand, the mind of man (ſaith he) needeth no inſtrument, as a mean, by which it may underſtand: but it needeth an object, whereon to look, and whence to conceive the act of underſtanding. This object are the phantaſms, or the reſemblances of things received from the ſenſe, and carried to the phantaſy. But in effect, this concluſion ſeemeth to carry a contrary ſenſe, when he maketh the phantaſy, in repreſenting the object to the underſtanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be underſtood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the underſtanding. And he addeth, that the reſemblance of things in man's imagination, are, to his underſtanding and mind, as colours are to the ſight; whence it ſo followeth, that the imagination or phantaſy it ſelf is to the faculty of underſtanding, as the eye is to the faculty of ſeeing: and as this is an Organum, ſo that. Of this queſtion, how the mind in all her actions maketh uſe of the body, and hath communion with the body, I refer the reader to a moſt grave and learned diſcourſe in the laſt reply of M. D. [g] Bilſon, late biſhop of Wincheſter, unto Hen. Jacob. Howſoever the truth be determined, we muſt conclude, that it is neither in reſpect of reaſon alone, by which we diſcourſe, nor in reſpect of the mind it ſelf, by which we live, nor in reſpect of our ſouls ſimply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the image of God. But moſt ſafely may we reſemble our ſelves to God in mente, and in reſpect of that pure faculty, which is never ſeparate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all; for St. Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the mind or ſoul, and between the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the image of God: whose words are these, Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit mens, seque intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of St. Augustine;) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere, ac diligere eum a quo facta est, (that is) The mind (or mens) was not therefore the image of God, because it remembreth, understandeth, and loveth it self; but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear Basil; Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis hujus pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiæ affectibus immersit: Man was made after the image and similitude of God, but sin hath deformed the beauty of this image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscence.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of immortality, nor in reason, nor in dominion, nor in any one of these by it self, nor in all these joyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the soul, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of original righteousness, most perfectly infused by God into the mind and soul of man in his first creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the seal of God's image (though reason may be said to be of her gift, which, joined to the soul, is a part of the essential constitution of our proper species) but from the bountiful grace of the Lord of all goodness, who breathed life into earth, and contrived within the trunk of dust and clay, the inimitable hability of his own piety and righteousness.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which dominion hath) do those that are powerful retain the image of God, as according to his commandments they exercise the office or magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walk in the ways of God, which in the scriptures is called, [a] walking with God; and all other men so long retain this image, as they fear, love, and serve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and do not bruise and deface his seal by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstinate sins. For the unjust mind cannot be after the image of God, seeing God is justice it self; the blood-thirsty hath it not, for God is charity and mercy it self; falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soul, together with God: and to be short, there is no likelihood between pure [b] light and black darkness, between beauty and deformity, or between righteousness and reprobation. And though nature, according to common understanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this image of God's goodness, which the sensual souls of beasts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude naturally more inclinable to follow and embrace the false and dureless pleasures of this stage-play world, than to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of God's wisdom, and the liberality of his mercy, formed eyes to our souls, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest heavens, and thence bring knowledge and object to the mind and soul, to contemplate the ever-during glory, and termless joy, prepared for those which retain the image and similitude of their Creator, preserving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the image of God, is created in righteousness, and holiness, as saith [c] St. Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the fathers, as by St. Augustine, with whom [d] St. Ambrose joyneth, that by sin, the perfection of the image is lost, and not the image it self: both opinions by this distinction may be reconciled (to wit) that the image of God, in man, may be taken two ways; for, either it is considered according to natural gifts, and consisteth therein; namely, to have a reasonable and understanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the image of God is more lost by sin than the very reasonable or understanding nature, &c. is lost (or sin doth not abolish and take away these natural gifts:) or, the image of God is considered, according to supernatural gifts, namely, of divine grace and heavenly glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the natural image; and this manner of similitude and image of God is wholly blotted out, and destroyed by sin.

SECT. III.

Of our base and frail bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal soul.

THE external man God formed out of the dust of the earth, or (according to the signification of the word, Adam) of Adamath, of red earth, or ex limo terræ, out of the slime of the earth, or a mixed matter of earth and water. [e] Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghaphar adamath (id est) ex pinguissima & mollissima: Not that God made an image or statue of clay, but out of clay, earth, or dust, God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

That man was formed of earth and dust did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble fear he called unto God, to save Sodom: [f] Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speak, I that am but dust and ashes: And, In these houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, do our souls inhabit, according to Job. And though our own eyes do every where behold the sudden and resistless assaults of death, and nature assureth us by never-failing experience, and reason by infallible demonstration, that our times upon the earth have neither certainty nor durability; that our bodies are but the anvils of pain and diseases, and our minds the hives of unnumbred cares, sorrows, and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which envy and fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappiness of our condition, and the dark ignorance which covereth the eyes of our understanding, that we only prize, pamper, and exalt this vassal and slave of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast away leisure) the imprisoned immortal soul, which can neither die with the reprobate, nor perish with the mortal parts of virtuous men: seeing God's justice in the one, and his goodness in the other, is exercised for evermore, as the ever-living subjects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great account? never while we have one vanity left us to spend: we plead for titles, till our breath fail us; dig for riches, while our strength enableth us; exercise malice, while we can revenge; and then when time hath beaten from us both youth, pleasure, and health, and that nature it self hateth the house of old age, we remember with [g] Job, that we muſt go the way from whence we ſhall not return, and that our bed is made ready for us in the dark; and then, I ſay, looking over-late into the bottom of our conſcience (which pleaſure and ambition had locked up from us all our lives) we behold therein the fearful images of our actions paſt, and withal this terrible inſcription: [a] That God will bring every work into judgment, that man hath done under the ſun.

But what examples have ever moved us? what perſuaſions reformed us? or what threatnings made us afraid? we behold other mens tragedies play'd before us, we hear what is promiſed and threatened: but the world's bright glory hath put out the eyes of our minds; and theſe betraying lights (with which we only ſee) do neither look up towards termleſs joys, nor down towards endleſs ſorrows, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing elſe, at the world's hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

Nil boſtes, nil dira fames, nil denique morbi
Egerunt, fuimus, qui nunc ſumus, iiſque periclis
Tentati; nihilo meliores reddimur unquam,
Sub vitiis nullo culparum fine manentes.

Diſeaſes, famine, enemies, in us no change have wrought,
What erſt we were, we are; ſtill in the ſame ſnare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In vice we dwell, in ſin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal ſouls herein; for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, caſting our hopes on the peace, which we truſt to make at parting, is no other than a rebellious preſumption, and (that which is the worſt of all) even a contemptuous laughing to ſcorn, and deriding of God, his laws and precepts. [b] Fruſtra ſperant, qui ſic de miſericordia Dei ſibi blandiuntur; They hope in vain, ſaith Bernard, which in this ſort flatter themſelves with God's mercy.

SECT. IV.

Of the ſpirit of life, which God breathed into man in his creation.

IN this frame and carcaſs God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living ſoul: (that is) God gave a body of earth and of corruptible matter, a ſoul ſpiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any ſuch bodily inſtruments as men uſe, but God breathed the ſpirit of life and immortality into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into ſuch as love and fear him. [c] The ſpirit of God (ſaith Elihu in Job) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life: In qua ſententia (ſaith Rabanus) vitanda eſt paupertas ſenſus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formaſſe corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labiis ſuis inſpiraſſe in faciem formati, ut vivere poſſit & ſpiraculum vitæ habere: nam & propheta cum ait, manus tuæ fecerunt me, &c. tropica hac locutione magis quam propria (id eſt, juxta conſuetudinem, qua ſolent homines operari) locutus eſt: In which ſentence (ſaith he) the beggarlineſs of carnal ſenſe is to be avoided, leſt perhaps we ſhould think, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of ſlime, or breathed with jaws or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the ſpirit of life: for the prophet alſo when he ſaith, thy hands have made me, ſpake this tropically, rather than properly (that is) according to the cuſtom which men uſe in working. Quantum eſt periculi his, qui ſcripturas ſenſu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the ſcriptures in a carnal ſenſe? By this breath was infuſed into man, both life and ſoul, and therefore this (ſoul) the philoſophers call Animam, quæ vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give life to the body. The inſpiration of the Almighty giveth underſtanding, ſaith Job, and this ſpirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reaſonable ſoul of man, returneth again to God that gave it, as the body returneth unto the earth, out of which it was taken; according to Eccleſiaſtes: [d] And duſt ſhall return to the earth, out of which it was taken, and the ſpirit ſhall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (ſpirit) uſually otherwiſe taken in the ſcriptures, than for the ſoul; as when Stephen cried unto God: [e] Domine, ſuſcipe ſpiritum meum, Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit: and in St. John, [f] And Jeſus bowed his head, and gave up the ghoſt, or ſpirit; (which was) that his life and ſoul left his body dead. And that the immortal ſoul of man differeth from the ſouls of beaſts, the manner of creation maketh it manifeſt: for it is written, [g] Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, the beaſt of the earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our own image, &c. and further, that [h] the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the water and earth were thoſe creatures brought forth, and thence received life; ſo ſhall they again be diſſolved into the ſame firſt matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath everlaſting, which God breathed into man, ſhall, according to Eccleſiaſtes, [i] return again to God that gave it.

SECT. V.

That man is (as it were) a little world: with a digreſſion touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abſtract or model, or brief ſtory of the univerſal: in whom God concluded the creation, and work of the world, and whom he made the laſt and moſt excellent of his creatures, being internally endued with a divine underſtanding, by which he might contemplate and ſerve his Creator, after whoſe image he was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of reaſon and other abilities, that thereby alſo he might govern and rule the world, and all other God's creatures therein. And whereas God created three ſorts of living natures (to wit) angelical, rational, and brutal; giving to angels an intellectual, and to beaſts a ſenſual nature, he vouchſafed unto man, both the [k] intellectual of angels, the ſenſitive of beaſts, and the proper rational belonging unto man, and therefore (ſaith Gregory Nazianzene) [l] Homo eſt utriuſque naturæ vinculum; Man is the bond and chain which tyeth together both natures: and becauſe in the little frame of man's body there is a repreſentation of the univerſal, and (by alluſion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcoſmos, or the little world. [m] Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, in brevi magnum, atque exiguo totum, in terris ſtatuit; God therefore placed in the earth the man whom he had made, as it were another world, the great and large world in the ſmall and little world; for out of the earth and duſt was formed the fleſh of man, and therefore heavy and lumpiſh; the bones of his body we may compare to the hard rocks and ſtones, and therefore ſtrong and durable; of which Ovid:

[a] Inde genus durum ſumus, experienſque laborum,
Et documenta damus qua ſimus origine nati:

From thence our kind hard-hearted is,
Enduring pain and care,
Approving that our bodies of
A ſtony nature are.

His blood, which diſperſeth it ſelf by the branches of veins through all the body, may be reſembled to thoſe waters, which are carried by brooks and rivers over all the earth; his breath to the air, his natural heat to the incloſed warmth which the earth hath in it ſelf, which, ſtirred up by the heat of the ſun, aſſiſteth nature in the ſpeedier procreation of thoſe varieties, which the earth bringeth forth; Our radical moiſture, oyl, or balſamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is reſembled to the fat and fertility of the earth; the hairs of man's body, which adorns, or overſhadows it, to the graſs, which covereth the upper face and ſkin of the earth; our generative power, to nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light wandring, and unſtable clouds, carried every where with uncertain winds; our eyes, to the light of the ſun and moon; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the ſpring, which, either in a very ſhort time, or with the ſun's heat, dry up and wither away, or the fierce puffs of wind blow them from the ſtalks; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure underſtanding (formerly called mens, and that which always looketh upwards) to thoſe intellectual natures, which are always preſent with God; and laſtly, our immortal ſouls (while they are righteous) are by God himſelf beautified with the title of his own image and ſimilitude. And although, in reſpect of God, there is no man juſt, or good, or righteous (for, [b] In angelis deprehenſa eſt ſtultitia, Behold, He found folly in his Angels, ſaith Job;) yet, with ſuch a kind of difference, as there is between the ſubſtance and the ſhadow, there may be found a goodneſs in man: which God being pleaſed to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and ſimilitude of his own righteouſneſs. In this alſo is the little world of man compared, and made more like the univerſal (man being the meaſure of all things; [c] Homo eſt menſura omnium rerum, ſaith Ariſtotle and Pythagoras) that the four complexions reſemble the four elements, and the ſeven ages of man the ſeven planets; whereof, our infancy is compared to the Moon, in which we ſeem only to live and grow, as plants; the ſecond age to Mercury, wherein we are taught and inſtructed; our third age to Venus, the days of love, deſire, and vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the ſtrong, flouriſhing, and beautiful age of man's life; the fifth to Mars, in which we ſeek honour and victory, and in which our thoughts travel to ambitious ends; the ſixth age is aſcribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take account of our times, judge of our ſelves, and grow to the perfection of our underſtanding; the laſt and ſeventh to Saturn, wherein our days are ſad, and over-caſt, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loſs which can never be repaired, that of all our vain paſſions and affections paſt, the ſorrow only abideth: Our attendants are ſickneſſes, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by ſo much the more greedily is our end deſired, whom when time hath made unſociable to others, we become a burthen to our ſelves: being of no other uſe, than to hold the riches we have from our ſucceſſors. In this time it is, when (as aforeſaid) we, for the moſt part, and never before, prepare for our eternal habitation, which we paſs on unto with many ſighs, groans, and ſad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanſhip of death, finiſh the ſorrowful buſineſs of a wretched life; towards which we always travel both ſleeping and waking: neither have thoſe beloved companions of honour and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promiſe of entertainments; but by what crooked path ſoever we walk, the ſame leadeth on directly to the houſe of death, whoſe doors lie open at all hours; and to all perſons. For this tide of man's life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetual ebb and falling ſtream, but never floweth again: our leaf once fallen, ſpringeth no more; neither doth the ſun or the ſummer adorn us again, with the garments of new leaves and flowers.

Redditur arboribus florens revirentibus ætas;
Ergo non homini, quod fuit ante, redit.

To which I give this ſenſe.

The plants and trees made poor and old
By winter envious,
The ſpring-time bounteous

But never man repair'd again
His youth and beauty loſt,
Though art, and care, and coſt,
Do promiſe nature's help in vain.

And of which,

Soles occidere & redire poſſunt:
Nobis cum ſemel occidit brevis lux,
Nox eſt perpetua una dormienda.

The ſun may ſet and riſe:
But we contrariwiſe
Sleep after our ſhort light
One everlaſting night.

For if there were any baiting place, or reſt, in the courſe or race of man's life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academics, the ſame might alſo perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in natural living things, and as the ſap and juice, wherein the life of plants is preſerved, both evermore aſcend or deſcend; ſo is it with the life of man, which is always either increaſing toward ripeneſs and perfection, or declining and decreaſing towards rottenneſs and diſſolution.

SECT. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his firſt creation, to diſpoſe of himſelf.

THeſe be the miſeries which our firſt parents brought on all mankind, unto whom God in his creation gave a free and unconſtrained will, and on whom he beſtowed the liberal choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God ſet before him, a mortal and immortal life, a nature celeſtial and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himſelf, to be his own guide, his own workman, and his own painter, that he might frame or deſcribe unto himſelf himſelf what he pleaſed, and make election of his own form. [a] God made man in the beginning, (ſaith Siracides) and left him in the hands of his own counſel. Such was the liberality of God, and man's felicity; whereas beaſts, and all other creatures reaſonleſs, brought with them into the world (ſaith Lucilius) and that even when they firſt fell from the bodies of their dams, the nature, which they could not change; and the ſupernal ſpirits or angels were from the beginning, or ſoon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetual eternity. But (as aforeſaid) God gave unto man all kind of ſeeds and grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of plants, the ſenſual of beaſts, the rational of man, and the intellectual of angels; whereof which ſoever he took pleaſure to plant and cultive, the ſame ſhould futurely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the firſt man Adam, and our firſt father, was enigmatically deſcribed by Aſclepius Athenienſis (ſaith Miranduła) in the perſon and fable of Proteus, who was ſaid, as often as he pleaſed, to change his ſhape. To the ſame end were all thoſe celebrated Metamorphoſes among the Pythagoreans, and ancient poets, wherein it was feigned, that men were transformed into divers ſhapes of beaſts, thereby to ſhew the change of mens conditions, from reaſon to brutality, from virtue to vice, from meekneſs to cruelty, and from juſtice to oppreſſion. For by the lively image of other creatures did thoſe Ancients repreſent the variable paſſions, and affections of mortal men; as by ſerpents were ſignified deceivers; by lyons, oppreſſors and cruel men; by ſwine, men given over to luſt and ſenſuality; by wolves, ravening and greedy men; which alſo St. Matthew reſembleth to falſe prophets, [d] which come to you in ſheeps clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves: by the images of ſtones and ſtocks, fooliſh and ignorant men; by vipers, ungrateful men; of which [e] St. John Baptiſt, O ye generation of vipers, &c.

[a] Ovid. Met. l. 1. [b] Job 4. 18. [c] Ariſt. 10. Meraph. c. 1. f.

SECT. VII.

Of God's ceaſing to create any more: and of the cauſe thereof, becauſe the univerſal created was exceeding good.

IN this work of man, God finiſhed the creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore reſted: for God commanded, and it was finiſhed, Cui voluiſſe eſt feciſſe; With whom to will is to make, ſaith Beda. Neither did God ſo reſt, that he left the world made, and the creatures therein to themſelves: for [d] My father worketh to this day (ſaith Chriſt) and I work; but God reſted (that is) he created no new ſpecies or kinds of creatures, but (as aforeſaid) gave unto man a power generative, and ſo to the reſt of living creatures, to plants and flowers, their ſeeds in themſelves; and commanded man to [e] multiply and fill the earth, and the earth and ſea to bring forth creatures according to their ſeveral kinds: all which being finiſhed, God ſaw that his works were good, not that he foreknew not, and comprehended not, the beginning and end before they were; for God made every plant of the field before it was in the earth; but he gave to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from ſo good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whoſe ſimple purity and from ſo excellent a cauſe there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberal choice, purchaſed by diſobedience his own death and mortality; and for the cruelty of man's heart, was the earth afterward curſed, and all creatures of the firſt age deſtroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his family, with thoſe creatures which the ark contained, reſerved by God to repleniſh the earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of PARADISE.

SECT. I.

That the ſeat of Paradiſe is greatly miſtaken: and that it is no marvel that men ſhould err.

CONcerning the firſt habitation of man, we read, that the Lord God planted a garden eaſt-ward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, Gen. ii. 6. Of this ſeat and place of Paradiſe, all ages have held diſpute; and the opinions and judgments have been in effect, as divers, among thoſe, that have written upon this part of Geneſis, as upon any one place therein, ſeeming moſt obſcure: Some there are, that have conceived the being of the terreſtrial Paradiſe, without all regard of the world's geography, and without any reſpect of eaſt and weſt, or any conſideration of the place where Moſes wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the heavens) the way how to find out and judge, in what region of the world this garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding reſpective and preciſe. Others, by being themſelves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the firſt interpretation; or truſting to their own judgments, underſtood one place for another; and one error is ſo fruitful, as it begetteth a thouſand children, if the licentiouſneſs thereof be not timely reſtrained. And thirdly, thoſe writers which gave themſelves to follow and imitate others, were in all things ſo obſervant ſectators of thoſe maſters, whom they admired and believed in, as they thought it ſafer to condemn their own underſtanding, than to examine theirs. For (ſaith Vadianus in his epiſtle of Paradiſe) magnos errores, magnorum virorum auctoritate perſuaſi, tranſmittimus; We paſs over many groſs errors, by the authority of great men led and perſwaded. And it is true, that many of the fathers were far wide from the underſtanding of this place. I ſpeak it not, that I my ſelf dare preſume to cenſure them, for I reverence both their learning and their piety, and yet not bound to follow them any further, than they are guided by truth: for they were men; & humanum eſt errare. And to the end that no man ſhould be proud of himſelf, God hath diſtributed unto men ſuch a proportion of knowledge, as the wiſeſt may behold in themſelves their own weakneſs: Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. [f] St. Paul confeſs'd that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third heaven in the fleſh, or out of the fleſh; and Chriſt himſelf acknowledges thus much, [g] that neither men, nor angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, ſeeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to [h] St. Jude) who is only wiſe. Sapientia ubi invenitur? (ſaith Job) But where is wiſdom found? [i] and where is the place of underſtanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the land of the living. And therefore ſeeing God found folly in his angels, mens judgments (which inhabit in the houſes of clay) cannot be without their miſtakings: and ſo the fathers, and other learned men, excuſable in particulars, eſpecially in thoſe whereupon our ſalvation dependeth not.

SECT. II.

A recital of ſtrange opinions touching Paradiſe.

NOW touching paradiſe, firſt it is to be enquired, Whether there were a paradiſe, or no? or whether Moſes's deſcription were altogether myſtical and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others, have affirmed; and that under the names of thoſe four rivers, Piſon, Gehon, Hiddekel and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge, there were delivered unto us other myſteries and ſignifications; as, that by the [a] four rivers, were meant the four cardinal virtues, Juſtice, Temperance, Fortitude and Prudence; or (by others) Oil, Wine, Milk and Honey. This allegorical underſtanding of Paradiſe by Origen divulged, was again by Fran. Georgius received (ſaith Sixtus Senenſis;) whoſe frivolous imaginations Sixtus himſelf doth fully and learnedly anſwer, in the 34th annotation of his 5th book, fol. 338. the laſt edition.

[b] St. Ambroſe alſo leaned wholly to the allegorical conſtruction, and ſet Paradiſe in the third heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, & in noſtro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our ſouls: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this ſort. By the place or garden of Paradiſe, was meant the ſoul or mind; by Adam, mens or underſtanding; by Eve, the ſenſe; by the ſerpent, delectation; by the tree of good and evil, ſapience; and by the reſt of the trees, the virtues of the mind, or in the mind planted, or from thence ſpringing. Notwithſtanding all which, upon 1 Corinth. cap. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celeſtial and terreſtrial Paradiſe; the one, into which St. Paul was wrap'd; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chryſamenſis was of opinion, that a Paradiſe had been; but that there was not now any mark thereof on the earth: the ſame being not only defaced, but withal the places now not ſo much as exiſting. To which Luther ſeemeth to adhere.

The Manichees alſo underſtood, that by Paradiſe was meant the whole earth; to which opinion Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two ſeveral places. Firſt, upon this; Fill the earth, Gen. 10. of which he gives this judgment: Hoc ipſo etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini univerſis animantibus, ſubjicite terram, clariſſime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut tum erat) fructibus conſitam, ſedem & hortum illum Adæ, & poſteritatis futuræ fuiſſe; Theſe words (ſaith he) in which God ſaid, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and ſubdue it, and rule over every creature, do clearly ſhew, that the univerſal earth, ſet or filled with all ſorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and ſeat of Adam, and of his future poſterity. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the [c] Acts, Apoſtolus ex uno ſanguine omne genus humanum ideo factum docet, ut habitarent ſuper univerſam faciem terræ: tota igitur terra paradiſus ille erat; The apoſtle (ſaith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (ſaith he) was that Paradiſe. Which conjectures I will anſwer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was firſt planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar garden; which place Goropius findeth near the river of Aceſines, in the confines of India.

[d] Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradiſe under the equinoctial; and Poſtellus, quite contrary, under the north pole: the Chaldeans alſo for the moſt part, and all their ſectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs; who would either make Paradiſe a figure, or ſacrament only, or elſe would have it ſeated out of this ſenſible world, or raiſed into ſome high and remote region of the air. Strabus and Rabanus were both ſick of this vanity, with Origen and Philo: So was our venerable [e] Bede and [e] Peter Comeſtor, and [e] Moſes Barcephas the Syrian, tranſlated by Maſius. But as Hopkins ſays of Philo Judæus, that he wonder'd, Quo malo genio afflatus, By what evil angel he was blown up into this error; ſo can I but greatly marvel at the learned men, who ſo groſly and blindly wander'd; ſeeing Moſes, and after him the prophets, do ſo plainly deſcribe this place by the region in which it was planted, by the kingdoms and provinces bordering it, by the rivers which water'd it, and by the points of the compaſs upon which it lay, in reſpect of Judea, or Canaan.

Noviomagus alſo upon Beda, De natura rerum, believeth that all the earth was taken for Paradiſe, and not any one place. For the whole earth (ſaith he) hath the ſame beauty aſcribed to Paradiſe. He addeth, that the ocean was that fountain from whence the four rivers, Piſon, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning; for he could not think it poſſible, that theſe rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Meſopotamia and Armenia) could riſe out of one fountain, were it not out of the fountain of the ocean.

SECT. III.

That there was a true local Paradiſe eaſtward in the country of Eden.

TO the firſt therefore, that ſuch a place there was upon the earth, the words of Moſes make it manifeſt, where it is written, [f] And the Lord God planted a garden eaſtward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made: and howſoever the vulgar tranſlation, called Jerom's tranſlation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverit Dominus Deus Paradiſum voluptatis a principio: The Lord God planted a Paradiſe of pleaſure from the beginning; putting the word (pleaſure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for eaſtward: it is manifeſt, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a region. For, what ſenſe hath this tranſlation (ſaith our Hopkins, in his treatiſe of Paradiſe) that he planted a garden of pleaſure, or, that a river went out of pleaſure to water the garden? but the ſeventy interpreters call it Paradiſum Edenis, The Paradiſe of Eden; and ſo doth the Chaldean paraphraſt truly take it for the proper name of a place, and for a noun appellative; which region, in reſpect of the fertility of the ſoil, of the many beautiful rivers and goodly woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) do always keep their leaves, was called Eden, which ſignifieth in the Hebrew, pleaſantneſs, or delicacy; as the Spaniards call the country, oppoſite to the iſle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the miſtaking, which may end the diſpute, as touching the double ſenſe of the word, that as Florida was a country, ſo called for the flouriſhing beauty thereof; ſo was Eden a region, called pleaſure or delicacy for its pleaſure or delicacy: and as Florida ſignifieth flouriſhing; ſo Eden ſignifieth pleaſure: and yet both are the proper names of countries; for Eden being the proper name of a region (called pleaſure in the Hebrew) and Paradiſe being the choice ſeat of all that region, Paradiſe was truly the garden of Eden, and truly the garden of pleaſure.

Now, for eaſtward, to tranſlate it, from the beginning, it is alſo contrary to the tranſlation of the ſeventy; to the antient Greek fathers, as Baſil, Chryſoſtom, Theodoret, Gregory; and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Solomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latins, Severinus, Damaſcenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a region, and ſet the word (eaſtward) for ab initio; for Damaſcene's own words are theſe, Paradiſus eſt locus Dei manibus in Eden ad orientem mirabiliter conſitus; Paradiſe is a place marvellouſly planted by the hands of God in Eden, towards the eaſt.

And after all theſe fathers, Guilhelmus Pariſienſis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senenſis, of latter times, do both underſtand theſe words of Eden and of the eaſt, contrary to the vulgar tranſlation; Pariſienſis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senenſis, directly againſt the vulgar: of which theſe are their own words; After this I will begin to ſpeak of Paradiſe terreſtrial, which God planted from the beginning, or eaſtward, &c. Poſt hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiſo terreſtri, quem plantaſſe Deum ab initio vel ad orientem, &c. And then Senenſis; Moſes enim clariſſime prodit, Paradiſum a Deo conſitum in regione terræ orientalis, quæ dicitur Eden: Eden autem eſſe proprium nomen, apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus, Cham habitaſſe ad orientalem plagam Eden; For Moſes (ſaith he) doth ſhew moſt clearly, that Paradiſe was planted of God in a region of the eaſt country, which is called Eden: but that Eden is a proper name, it appeareth in [a] Geneſis, where we read, that Cham dwelt on the eaſt border of Eden. Pererius endeavoureth to qualify this tranſlation; for this particle (ſaith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very firſt day; alledging this place of Chriſt, that although the devil was ſaid to be a [b] Man-ſlayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the ſixth day. But ſurely, as I think (referring my ſelf to better judgment) the devil was from the inſtant of his fall a man-ſlayer in diſpoſition, though he had not whereon to practiſe till man's creation. And for concluſion, St. Hierome (if that be his tranſlation) adviſeth himſelf better in the end of the 3d chapter of [c] Geneſis, converting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (a principio) as, God did ſet a cherubin before the garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante paradiſum voluptatis, cherubin; and Pererius himſelf acknowledgeth, that this is the true ſenſe of this place, preciſely taken, according to the Hebrew, Poſuit a parte orientali horti Eden, cherubin; He ſet on the eaſt ſide of the garden of Eden, a cherubin. Becanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) ſignifieth (with) as well as (in) and ſo the text beareth this ſenſe; That God planted a garden with pleaſure (that is to ſay) full of pleaſure. But Becanus followeth this conſtruction, only to the end to find Paradiſe upon the river of Aceſines; for there he hath heard of the Indian fig-tree in great abundance, which he ſuppoſeth to be the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and would therefore draw Paradiſe to the fig-tree: which conceit of his I will anſwer hereafter.

Now, becauſe Paradiſe was ſeated by Moſes towards the eaſt, thence came the cuſtom of praying towards the eaſt, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our churches are built eaſt and weſt, as to the point where the ſun riſeth in March, which is directly over Paradiſe (ſaith Damaſcenus:) affirming, that we always pray towards the eaſt, as looking towards Paradiſe, whence we were caſt out; and yet the temple of Solomon had their prieſts and ſacrifices, which turned themſelves in their ſervice and divine ceremonies, always towards the weſt, thereby to avoid the ſuperſtition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But becauſe eaſt and weſt are but in reſpect of places (for although Paradiſe were eaſt from Judea, yet it was weſt from Perſia) and the ſerving of God is every where in the world; the matter is not great, which way we turn our faces, ſo our hearts ſtand right; other than this, that we who dwell weſt from Paradiſe, and pray turning our ſelves to the eaſt, may remember thereby to beſeech God, that as by Adam's fall we have loſt the Paradiſe on earth; ſo by Chriſt's death and paſſion we may be made partakers of the Paradiſe celeſtial, and the kingdom of heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other myſtery in adding the word (eaſt) to Eden by Moſes, than to ſhew, that the region of Eden, in which Paradiſe was, lay eaſtward from Judea and Canaan: for the ſcriptures always called the people of thoſe nations, the ſons of the eaſt which inhabited Arabia, Meſopotamia, Chaldea, and Perſia: of which Ovid,

Perſidaque, & radiis juga ſubdita matutinis.
The eaſt wind with aurora hath abiding
Among th'Arabian and the Perſian Hills,
Whom Phœbus firſt ſalutes at his up-riſing.

And if it be objected, that Jeremy the prophet, threatning the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, doth often make mention of northern nations, it is to be noted, that the north is there named, in reſpect of thoſe nations that followed Nabuchodonoſor, and of whom the greateſt part of his army was compounded; not that Babylon it ſelf ſtood north from Jeruſalem, though inclining from the eaſt towards the north.

Now to the difference of this tranſlation, Peter Comeſtor giveth beſt ſatisfaction: for he uſeth the word, from the beginning, that is, from the firſt part of the world (a principio) id eſt (ſaith he) a prima orbis parte; and afterward he affirmeth, that a principio, and ad orientem, have the ſame ſignification: from the beginning, and eaſt-ward, is all one; a principio idem eſt quod ad orientem.

But to return to the proof of this place, and that this ſtory of mankind was not allegorical, it followeth in the text of the 2d chapter and 9th verſe, in theſe words; For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree pleaſant to the ſight, and good for meat, &c. ſo as firſt it appeared that God created Adam elſewhere as in the world at large, and then put him into the garden: and the end why, is expreſs'd, verſe 18, that he might dreſs it and keep it: Paradiſe being a garden or orchard filled with plants, and trees, of the moſt excellent kinds, pleaſant to behold, and (withal) good for meat: which proveth that Paradiſe was a terreſtrial garden, garniſhed with fruits, delighting both the eye and taſte. And to make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of allegorical conſtruction, he affirmeth, verſe 10, that it was watered and beautified with a river; expreſſing alſo the region, out of which this river ſprang, which he calleth Eden; and that Eden is alſo a country near unto Charon in Meſopotamia, [f] Ezechiel witneſſeth.

But to all theſe cabaliſts, which draw the truth and ſtory of the ſcriptures into allegories, Epiphanius anſwereth in theſe words; Si Paradiſus non eſt ſenſibilis, non eſt etiam fons, ſi non eſt fons, non eſt

flumen, ſi non eſt flumen, non ſunt quatuor principia; non Piſon, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates; non eſt ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non eſt Adam, non ſunt homines, ſed veritas jam fabula eſt, & omnia ad allegorias revocantur; If Paradiſe be not ſenſible, then there was no fountain, and then no river; if no river, then no ſuch four heads or branches, and then not any ſuch river as Piſon, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates; no ſuch fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves; Eve then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things eſteemed are called back into allegories. Words to the ſame effect hath St. Hierome upon Daniel; Conticeſcant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate ſequentes, ipſam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradiſum & flumina, & arbores putent allegoriæ legibus ſe debere ſubruere: Let the dotage of them be ſilent, who following ſhadows and images in the truth, endeavour to ſubvert the truth it ſelf, and think that they ought to bring Paradiſe, and the rivers, and the trees, under the rules of allegory.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the ſtory, is the place made more manifeſt. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every tree of the garden (the tree of knowledge excepted) which trees Moſes in the 9th verſe ſaith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Beſides, God left all beaſts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and theſe beaſts were neither in the third heaven, nor near the circle of the moon, nor beaſts in imagination: for if all theſe things were enigmatical or myſtical, the ſame might alſo be ſaid of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel, ſpeaking of the glory of the Aſſyrian kings, uſeth this ſpeech; [a] All the trees of Eden, which were in the garden of God, envied him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradiſe, therein ſeated, to be terreſtrial: for the prophets made no imaginary compariſons. But Moſes wrote plainly, and in a ſimple ſtyle, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and preciſe in the deſcription of Paradiſe, than in any other place of ſcripture; of purpoſe to take away all ſcruple from the incredulity of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of prophecy) to be apt to fabulous inventions; and that if he had not deſcribed both the region and the rivers, and how it ſtood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Iſraelites, and others after them, would have miſconſtrued this ſtory of mankind. And, is it likely, there would have been ſo often mention made of Paradiſe in the ſcriptures, if the ſame had been an Utopia? For we find that the valley, wherein [b] Sodom and Gomorrah ſtood (ſometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal cities therein) was before the deſtruction (which their unnatural ſin purchaſed) compared to the Paradiſe of the Lord, and like to the land of Egypt toward Zoar: in like manner was Iſrael reſembled to the Paradiſe of God, before the Babylonians waſted it: which proveth plainly, that Paradiſe it ſelf, exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that theſe places had but a reſemblance thereof: being compared to a ſeat and ſoil of far exceeding excellency.

Beſides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcinous's gardens, as Juſtin Martyr noteth, but out of Moſes's deſcription of Paradiſe? Gen. ii. And whence are their praiſes of the Elyſian fields, but out of the ſtory of Paradiſe? To which alſo appertain thoſe verſes of the golden age in Ovid:

[c] Ver erat æternum; placidique tepentibus auris,
Mulcebant Zephyri natos ſine ſemine flores.
The joyful ſpring did ever laſt,
And Zephyrus did breed
Sweet flowers by his gentle blaſt,
Without the help of ſeed.

And it is manifeſt, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Heſiodus, and Homer, and, after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all theſe together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their ſectators, did greatly enrich their inventions, by venting the ſtoln treaſures of divine letters, altered by prophane additions, and diſguiſed by poetical converſions, as if they had been conceived out of their own ſpeculations and contemplations.

But beſides all theſe teſtimonies, if we find what region Heden, or Eden was; if we prove the river that ran out of it, and that the ſame afterwards was divided into four branches; together with the kingdoms of Havila, and Cuſh; and that all theſe are eaſtward from Canaan, or the deſarts of the Amorites, where Moſes wrote; I then conceive, that there is no man that will doubt, but that ſuch a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the allegorical ſenſe of the ſcripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Chriſt, as in all the Old Teſtament throughout: the ſtory being directly true notwithſtanding. And to this purpoſe (ſaith St. Auguſtine) Tres ſunt de Paradiſo generales ſententiæ: una eſt eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradiſum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui ſpiritualiter tantum (id eſt) eccleſiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradiſum accipiunt; (that is) There are three opinions of Paradiſe: the one of thoſe men, which will have it altogether corporal: a ſecond of thoſe, which conceive it altogether ſpiritual, and to be a figure of the church: the third of thoſe, which take it in both ſenſes; which third opinion [d] St. Auguſtine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable judgment: [e] Quemadmodum homo ſenſibilis, & intelligibilis ſimul conditus erat: ſic & hujus ſanctiſſimum nemus ſenſibile ſimul & intelligibile, & duplici ſpecie eſt præditum; (that is) As man was created at one time, both ſenſible, and intelligible, ſo was his holy grove, or garden, to be taken both ways, and endued with a double form.

SECT. IV.

Why it ſhould be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradiſe.

BUT it may be objected, that it is needleſs, and a kind of curioſity, to enquire ſo diligently after this place of Paradiſe, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no uſe. To which I anſwer, that there is nothing written in the ſcripture, but for our inſtruction; and if the truth of the ſtory be neceſſary, then by the place proved, the ſame is alſo made more apparent. For if we ſhould conceive that Paradiſe were not on the earth, but lifted up as high as the moon; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the known world; from whence, Adam was ſaid to wade through the ſea, and thence to have come into Judea (out of doubt) there would be few men in the world, that would give any credit unto it. For what could ſeem more ridiculous than the report of ſuch a place? and beſides, what maketh this ſeat of Paradiſe ſo much diſputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Piſhon ſhould be Ganges, which watereth the eaſt India; and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt: and theſe two rivers ſo far diſtant, as (except all the world were Paradiſe) theſe ſtreams can no way be compriſed therein?

[a] Ezech. 31. 9. [b] Gen. 13. 10. [c] Ovid. Met. 1. [d] Aug. de Civit. Dei. l. 13. c. 21. [e] Suidas in verbo Paradiſus.

Secondly,

Secondly, If the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were ſaid to have been in ſome ſuch country, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his miracles had been performed in the air, or no place certainly known: I aſſure my ſelf, that the Chriſtian religion would have taken but a ſlender root in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witneſſes of worldly actions.

Thirdly, If we ſhould rely, or give place to the judgment of ſome writers upon this place of Geneſis (though otherwiſe for their doctrine in general they are worthy of honour and reverence) I ſay that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the world ſo ſet by it ſelf, and ſeparated, as to hang in the air under the circle of the moon? or who ſo doltiſh to conceive, that from thence the four rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, ſhould fall down, and run under all the ocean, and riſe up again in this our habitable world, and in thoſe places where they are now found? which leſt any man think that I enforce, or ſtrain to the worſt, theſe are Peter Comeſtor's own words. Eſt autem locus amœniſſimus, longo terræ & maris tractu a noſtra habitabili Zona ſecretus, adeo elevatus, ut uſque ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a moſt pleaſant place, ſevered from our habitable Zone, by a long tract of land and ſea, elevated ſo, that it reacheth to the globe of the moon.

And Moſes Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: [a] Deinde hoc quoque reſponſum volumus, Paradiſum multo ſublimiore poſitum eſſe regione, atque hæc noſtra extet terra, eoque fieri ut illinc per præcipitium delabantur fluvii tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non poſſis; eoque impetu impulſi preſſique ſub oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rurſus proſiliant ebulliantque in hoc a nobis culto orbe: which have this ſenſe: Furthermore (ſaith he) we give this for an anſwer, that Paradiſe is ſet in a region far raiſed above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to paſs, that from thence theſe rivers fall down with ſuch a headlong violence, as words cannot expreſs; and with that force ſo impulſed and preſs'd, they are carried under the deep ocean ſea, and do again riſe and boil up in this our habitable world: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this: Ephram dicit, Paradiſum ambire terram, atque ultra oceanum ita poſitum eſſe, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atque lunæ orbis lunam cingit; (which is) That Paradiſe doth compaſs or embrace the whole earth, and is ſo ſet beyond the ocean, as it enviroueth the whole orb of the earth on every ſide, as the orb of the moon doth embrace the moon. To the end therefore that theſe ridiculous expoſitions and opinions do not bring queſtion unto truth it ſelf, or make the ſame ſubject to doubts or diſputes, it is neceſſary to diſcover the true place of Paradiſe, which God in his wiſdom appointed in the very navel of this our world, and (as Melanchton ſays) in parte terræ meliore, in the beſt part thereof, that from thence, as from a center, the univerſal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we ſhall the better judge of the beginning of nations, and of the world's inhabitation: for near unto this did the ſons of Noah alſo diſperſe themſelves after the flood, into all other remote regions and countries. And if it be a generous deſire in men, to know from whence their own fore-fathers have come, and out of what regions and nations; it cannot be diſpleaſing to underſtand the place of our firſt anceſtor, from whence all the ſtreams and branches of mankind have followed and been deduced. If then it do appear by the former, that ſuch a place there was as Paradiſe, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine ſeveral opinions before remembred, by the truth it ſelf; and to ſee how they agree with the ſenſe of the ſcripture, and with common reaſon; and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the region in which God firſt planted this delightful garden.

SECT. V.

That the flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradiſe, nor cauſed hills in the earth.

AND firſt, whereas it is ſuppoſed by Aug. Chyſamenſis, that the flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in ſuch ſort, as no man can find any mark or memory thereof (of which opinion there were others alſo, aſcribing to the flood the cauſe of thoſe high mountains, which are found on all the earth over, with many other ſtrange effects:) for mine own opinion, I think neither the one, nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradiſe was after the flood withered, and grown old, in reſpect of the firſt beauty (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things time hath changed:) yet if there had been no ſign of any ſuch place, or if the ſoil and ſeat had not remained, then would not Moſes, who wrote of Paradiſe about 850 years after the flood, have deſcribed it ſo particularly, and the prophets long after Moſes, would not have made ſo often mention thereof. And though the very garden it ſelf were not then to be found, but that the flood, and other accidents of time, made it one common field and paſture with the land of Eden, yet the place is ſtill the ſame, and the rivers ſtill remain the ſame rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are ſure to find in what longitude Paradiſe lay; and learning out one of theſe rivers, which afterward doth divide it ſelf into four branches, we are ſure that the partition is at the very border of the garden it ſelf.

For it is [b] written, that out of Eden went a river to water the garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into four heads; now, whether the word in the Latin tranſlation (inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it ſelf, or to Paradiſe; yet the diviſion, and branching of thoſe rivers, muſt be in the north, or ſouth ſide of the very garden (if the rivers run as they do, north and ſouth;) and therefore theſe rivers yet remaining, and Eden manifeſtly known, there could be no ſuch defacing by the flood, as is ſuppoſed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be ſo altered, as future ages knew it not; ſo is there no probability that either theſe rivers were turned out of their courſes, or new rivers created by the flood which were not, or that the flood (as aforeſaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decreaſe, was the cauſe of high hills, or deep valleys. For what deſcent of waters could there be in a ſpherical and round body, wherein there is nor high nor low? ſeeing that all violent force of waters is either by the ſtrength of wind, by deſcent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebb or flood of the ſea. But that there was any wind (whereby the ſeas are moſt enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, [c] Therefore God made a wind to paſs upon the earth, and the waters ceaſed. So as it appeareth not, that, until the waters ſank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodneſs, cauſed the wind to blow, to dry up the abundant ſlime and mud of the earth, and make the land more firm, and to cleanſe the air of thick vapours, and unwholſome miſts: and this we know by experience, that all downright rains do evermore diſſever the violence of outragious winds, and beat down, and level the ſwelling and mountainous billows of the ſea: for any ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equal, and of one height, over all the face of the earth, and when there were no indraughts, bays, or gulfs to receive a flood, or any deſcent, or violent falling of waters in the round form of the earth and waters, as aforeſaid: and therefore it ſeemeth moſt agreeable to reaſon, that the waters rather ſtood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or over-bearing violence. And for a more direct proof that the flood made no ſuch deſtroying alteration, Joſephus avoweth that one of thoſe pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be ſeen in his days; which pillars were ſet up above 1426 years before the flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the erection of them; and Joſeph himſelf to have lived ſome forty or fifty years after Chriſt: of whom, altho' there be no cauſe to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in queſtion. And therefore it may be poſſible, that ſome foundation or ruin thereof might then be ſeen. Now, that ſuch pillars were raiſed by Seth, all antiquity hath avowed. It is alſo written that Beroſus (to whom, altho' I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the city of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus was not defaced by length of time: yea, the ruins thereof, Annius (who commented upon that invented fragment) ſaith, were to be ſeen in his days, who liv'd in the reign of Ferdinand and Iſabella of Caſtile. And if theſe his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, ſpeaking of this city of Enoch, he concludeth in this ſort: Cujus maximæ & ingentis molis fundamenta viſuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut noſtri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge maſs is now to be ſeen, and the place is called by the people of that region, the City of Cain, as both our ſtrangers and merchants report. It is alſo avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in theſe things) that the city of Joppa was built before the flood, over which Cepha was king: whoſe name, with his brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their religion, was found graven upon certain altars of ſtone. And it is not impoſſible, that the ruins of this other city, called Enoch by Annius, might be ſeen, tho' founded in the firſt age: but it could not be of the firſt city of the world, [a] built by Cain; the place rather than the time denying it.

And to prove directly that the flood was not the cauſe of mountains, but that there were mountains from the creation, it is written, that the waters of the flood overflowed by fifteen cubits the higheſt mountains. And Maſius Damaſcenus, ſpeaking of the flood, writeth in this manner: Eſt ſupra Minyadam excelſus mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos, ſermo eſt, diluvii tempore liberatos; And upon Minyada there is an high mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which, it is ſaid, that many fled in the time of the deluge, and that they ſaved themſelves thereon. Now, tho' it is contrary to God's word, that any more were ſaved than eight perſons (which Maſius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a teſtimony, that ſuch mountains were before the flood, which were afterwards, and ever ſince, known by the ſame names, and on which mountains it is generally received that the ark reſted; but untruly, as I ſhall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the mount Sion (tho' by another name) was known before the flood; on which the Thalmudiſts report, that many giants ſaved themſelves alſo; but (as Annius ſaith) without all authority, either divine or human.

Laſtly, it appeareth that the flood did not ſo turn upſide down the face of the earth, as thereby it was made paſt knowledge, after the waters were decreaſed, by this, that [b] when Noah ſent out the dove the ſecond time, ſhe returned with an olive-leaf in her mouth, which ſhe had pluck'd, and which (until the trees were diſcovered) ſhe found not: for otherwiſe ſhe might have found them floating on the water; a manifeſt proof, that the trees were not torn up by the roots, nor ſwam upon the waters, for it is written, folium olivæ raptum, or decerptum, a leaf pluck'd; which is, to take from a tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the flood made no ſuch alteration, as was ſuppoſed, but that the place of Paradiſe might be ſeen to ſucceeding ages, eſpecially unto Moſes, by whom it pleaſed God to teach the truth of the world's creation, and unto the prophets which ſucceeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this diſcovery.

SECT. VI.

That Paradiſe was not the whole earth, as ſome have thought: making the ocean to be the fountain of thoſe four rivers.

THIS conceit of Aug. Chryſamenſis being anſwered, who only giveth his opinion for reaſon, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all thoſe that underſtood, that by Paradiſe was meant the whole earth. But in this I ſhall not trouble the reader with many words, becauſe by thoſe places of ſcripture formerly remember'd, this univerſality will appear altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, [c] Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the earth and ſubdue it, rule over every creature, &c. with this of the Acts, [d] And hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell on all the face of the earth, do no way prove ſuch a generality: for the world was made for man, of which he was lord and governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his uſe. Now, altho' all men were of one and the ſame fountain of blood originally; and Adam's poſterity inhabited in proceſs of time over all the face of the earth: yet it diſproveth in nothing the particular garden, aſſigned to [e] Adam to dreſs and cultive, in which he lived in ſo bleſſed an eſtate before his tranſgreſſion. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had been left to the univerſal, Moſes would not then have ſaid [f] eaſtward in Eden, ſeeing the world hath not eaſt nor weſt but reſpectively. And to what end had the angel of God been ſet to keep the eaſt ſide, and entrance into Paradiſe after Adam's expulſion, if the univerſal had been Paradiſe? for then muſt Adam have been chaſed alſo out of the world. For if all the earth were Paradiſe, that place can receive no better conſtruction than this, That Adam was driven out of the world into the world, and out of Paradiſe into Paradiſe, except we ſhould believe with Metrodorus, that there were infinite worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one as to affirm, That in ſo large a field as the univerſal,

univerſal, there ſhould grow but one thiſtle. Noviomagus upon Beda, ſeemeth to be led by this, that it was impoſſible for thoſe three rivers, Ganges, Nilus and Euphrates (which water three portions of the world ſo far diſtant) to riſe out of one fountain, except the ocean be taken for the well, and the world for the garden.

And it is true, that thoſe four rivers, being ſo underſtood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it ſhall plainly appear, that Piſon was falſly taken for Ganges, and Gehon falſly for Nilus, altho' Ganges be a river by Havila in India, and Nilus runs thro' Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the miſtakings of Noviomagus, Goropius and Vadianus, with others, are made manifeſt. Yet was their conjecture far more probable than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus and Athanaſius, That Paradiſe was ſeated far beyond the Ocean ſea, and that Adam waded through it, and at laſt came toward the country in which he was created, and was buried at mount Calvary in Jeruſalem. And certainly, tho' all thoſe of the firſt age were of great ſtature, and ſo continued many years after the flood, yet Adam's ſhin-bones muſt have contained a thouſand fathom, and much more, if he had forded the ocean; but this opinion is ſo ridiculous, as it needs no argument to diſprove it.

SECT. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradiſe as high as the moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle region of the air.

THirdly whereas Beda ſaith, and as the ſchoolmen affirm, Paradiſe to be a place altogether removed from the knowledge of men (locus a cognitione hominum remotiſſimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradiſe was far in the eaſt, but mounted above the ocean, and all the earth, and near the orb of the moon (which opinion, tho' the ſchoolmen charge Beda withal, yet Pererius lays it off from Beda, upon Strabus, and his maſter Rabanus) and whereas Rupertus, in his geography of Paradiſe, doth not much differ from the reſt, but finds it ſeated next or neareſt heaven; it may ſeem, that all theſe borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well underſtood; who (undoubtedly) took this place for heaven it ſelf, into which the ſouls of the bleſſed were carried after death.

[a] True it is, that theſe philoſophers durſt not for fear of the Areopagites (in this, and many other divine apprehenſions) ſet down what they believed in plain terms, eſpecially Plato: though Socrates in the end ſuffered death for acknowledging one only powerful God; and therefore did the devil himſelf do him that right, as by an oracle, to pronounce him the wiſeſt man. [b] Juſtin Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the ſcriptures; and St. Auguſtine gave this judgment of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Chriſtian. And it ſeemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Euſebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforeſaid, meant the celeſtial Paradiſe, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightful, and healthful, upon the top of mount Atho (called Acrithonos) which being above all clouds of rain, or other inconvenience, the people (by reaſon of their ſo many years) are called Macrobici (that is) long-liv'd. A further argument is uſed for proof of the height of this place, becauſe therein was Enoch preſerved from the violence of the flood: approved by Iſidore and Peter Lombard: in which place alſo Tertullian conceived, that the bleſſed ſouls were preſerved till the laſt judgment: which Irenæus and Juſtin Martyr alſo believed. But this opinion was of all catholick divines reproved, and in the Florentine council damned; of which St. Auguſtine more modeſtly gave this judgment: Sicut certum eſt Enoch & Eliam, nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc ſunt, an in paradiſo an alibi, incertum eſt; (that is) As it is certain that Enoch and Elias do now live; ſo where they now live, in paradiſe, or elſewhere, it is uncertain. But Barcephas gives a third cauſe, though of all other the weakeſt. For (ſaith he) it was neceſſary that Paradiſe ſhould be ſet at ſuch a diſtance and height, becauſe the four rivers (had they not fallen ſo precipitate) could not have had ſufficient force to have thruſt themſelves under the great ocean, and afterward have forced their paſſage thro' the earth, and have riſen again in the far diſtant regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

Theſe ſtrange fancies and dreams have been anſwered by divers learned men long ſince, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this ſubject; of whoſe arguments I will repeat theſe few: (for to uſe long diſcourſe againſt thoſe things, which are both againſt ſcripture and reaſon, might rightly be judged a vanity in the anſwerer, not much inferiour to that of the inventer.)

It is firſt therefore alledged, that ſuch a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being ſet ſo near the moon, it had been too near the ſun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, becauſe it muſt have been too joynct a neighbour to the element of fire. Thirdly, becauſe the air in that region is ſo violently removed, and carried about with ſuch ſwiftneſs, as nothing in that place can conſiſt or have abiding. Fourthly, becauſe the ſpace between the earth and the moon (according to Ptolemy and Alfraganus) is ſeventeen times the diameter of the earth, which makes in a groſs account about one hundred and twenty thouſand miles. Hereupon it muſt follow, that Paradiſe, being raiſed to this height, muſt have the compaſs of the whole earth for a baſis and foundation. But had it been ſo raiſed, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men, ſeeing it would deprive us of the ſun's light all the fore-part of the day, being ſeated in the eaſt, as they ſuppoſe. Now, to fortify the former opinions, Toſtatus addeth this, that thoſe people which dwell near thoſe falls of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like thoſe that dwell near the [c] Catadupæ, or over-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have ſeen in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than thoſe of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling near them are not deaf at all. Toſtatus (better to ſtrengthen himſelf) citeth Baſil and Ambroſe together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hæc apud Baſilium & Ambroſium in eorum ſcriptis, quæ nunc extant, nuſquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (ſaith he) that I ever read thoſe things either in Baſil or Ambroſe.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath diſpoſed of them according to his wiſdom. Their taking up might be into the celeſtial Paradiſe, for ought we know. For altho' fleſh and blood, ſubject to corruption, cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven, and the ſeed muſt rot in the ground before it grow, yet we ſhall not all die (ſaith St. Paul) [d] but all ſhall be changed: which change in Enoch and Elias, was eaſy to him that is almighty. But for the reſt, the ſcriptures are manifeſt, that by the flood all periſhed on the earth ſaving [e] eight perſons; ſons; and therefore in the terreſtrial Paradiſe they could not be.

For Toſtatus's own opinion, who ſoared not altogether ſo high as the reſt, but believed that Paradiſe was raiſed above the middle region of the air, and twenty cubits above all mountains, that the flood did not therefore reach it (which Scotus and other latter ſchool-men alſo believed; for, ſay they, there were no ſinners in Paradiſe, and therefore no cauſe to overwhelm it:) this is alſo contrary to the expreſs letter of the ſcripture, which directly, and without admitting of any diſtinction, teacheth us, that [a] the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwiſe, then might we as well give credit to Maſius Damaſcenus, and the Thalmudiſts, who affirm, that there were of the giants that ſaved themſelves on the mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus being (as the reſt of the ſchool-men are) full of diſtinctions, ſaith; that the waters ſtood at Paradiſe, as they did in the [b] red ſea, and at Jordan; and as the flood was not natural, ſo was Paradiſe ſaved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth his high conceit with this ſuppoſition, that it was not believed, that Paradiſe was ſo ſeated, as Bede and others ſeem to affirm in words, but by hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty ſo reſembled. But this I dare avow of all thoſe ſchool-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their followers to ſhift, than to reſolve, by their diſtinctions. Wherefore not to ſtay long in anſwering this opinion of Toſtatus, I confeſs that it is written, that the mountains of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, over-reach and ſurmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithſtanding) there is found on the heads of the hills both ſprings and fruits; and the Pagan prieſts, ſacrificing on theſe mountain-tops, do not find the aſhes (remaining of their ſacrifices) blown thence, nor thence waſh'd off by rains, when they return: yet experience hath reſolved us, that theſe reports are fabulous; and Pliny himſelf (who was not ſparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of theſe mountains is far under the ſuppoſed place of Paradiſe; and on theſe ſelf hills the air is ſo thin (ſaith St. Auguſtine, whom herein I miſtruſt) that it is not ſufficient to bear up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any ſenſible reſiſtance of air to mount her ſelf by.

SECT. VIII.

Of their opinion that ſeat Paradiſe under the Equinoctial: and of the pleaſant habitation under thoſe climates.

THOSE which come nearer unto reaſon find Paradiſe under the Equinoctial line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus; judging, that thereunder might be found moſt pleaſure, and the greateſt fertility of ſoil: but againſt it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the diſtemperate heat, which he ſuppoſeth to be in all places ſo directly under the ſun; but this is non cauſa pro cauſa; for although Paradiſe could not be under the line, becauſe Eden is far from it, in which Paradiſe was; and becauſe there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges under it (Ganges being one of the four rivers, as they ſuppoſe) yet this conceit of diſtemper (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, conſidering the age, when thoſe fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every country, as it lay by degrees nearer the tropick, and ſo toward the Equinoctial, did ſo much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reaſonable conjecture, that thoſe countries which were ſituated directly under it, were of a diſtemper uninhabitable: but it ſeemeth that Tertullian conceived better and ſo did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough: and though (perchance) in thoſe days it might be thought a fantaſtical opinion (as all are which go againſt the vulgar;) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beauty, and delight, that Paradiſe had, the ſame muſt be found within that ſuppoſed uninhabitable burnt zone, or within the tropicks, and neareſt to the line it ſelf. For hereof experience hath informed reaſon, and time hath made thoſe things apparent, which were hidden, and could not by any contemplation be diſcovered. Indeed it hath ſo pleaſed God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that ſuch inconveniences which we contemplate afar off, are found by trial and the witneſs of mens travels, to be ſo qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vain, or as a fruitleſs lump to faſhion out the reſt. For [c] God himſelf (ſaith Iſaiah) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we find that theſe hotteſt regions of the world ſeated under the Equinoctial line, or near it, are ſo refreſhed with a daily gale of eaſterly wind (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth evermore blow ſtrongeſt in the heat of the day, as the downright beams of the ſun cannot ſo much maſter it, that there is any inconvenience or diſtemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are ſo cold, freſh and equal, by reaſon of the entire interpoſition of the earth, as (for thoſe places which my ſelf have ſeen, near the line and under it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equal temper, only there are ſome tracts, which by accident of high mountains are barr'd from this air and freſh wind, and ſome few ſandy parts without trees, which are not therefore ſo well inhabited as the reſt; and ſuch difference of ſoils we find alſo in all other parts of the world. But (for the greateſt part) thoſe regions have ſo many goodly rivers, fountains and little brooks, abundance of high cedars, and other ſtately trees caſting ſhade, ſo many ſorts of delicate fruits, ever bearing, and at all times beautified with bloſſom and fruit, both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be beſt compared to the Paradiſe of Eden: the boughs and branches are never unclothed and left naked, their ſap creepeth not under ground into the root, fearing the injury of the froſt: neither doth Pomona at any times deſpiſe her withered huſband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are theſe countries called Terræ vitioſæ, vicious countries: for nature being liberal to all without labour, neceſſity impoſing no induſtry or travel, idleneſs bringeth forth no other fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleaſures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and thoſe of his opinion were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who miſliked this opinion, and followed a worſe. And (to ſay the truth) all the ſchool-men were groſs in this particular.

SECT. IX.

Of the change of the names of places: and that beſides that Eden in Cœleſyria, there is a country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Iſaiah xxxvii, and Ezek. xxvii.

THESE opinions anſwered, and the region of Eden not found in any of thoſe imaginary worlds, nor under Torrida Zonæ; it followeth that

now we diſcover and find out the ſeat thereof, for in it was Paradiſe by God planted. The difficulty of which ſearch reſteth chiefly in this, that as all nations have often changed names with their maſters; ſo are moſt of theſe places, by Moſes remembred, forgotten by thoſe names of all hiſtorians and geographers as well ancient as modern.

Beſides, we find that the Aſſyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Perſians (Cyrus only and few others excepted) ſought to extinguiſh the Hebrews. The Grecians hated both their nation and their religion; and the Romans deſpiſed once to remember them in any of their ſtories. And as thoſe three monarchies ſucceeded each other; ſo did they transform the names of all thoſe principal places and cities in the eaſt: and after them, the Turk hath ſought (what he could) to extinguiſh in all things the ancient memory of thoſe people, which he hath ſubjected and inthralled.

Now beſides thoſe notable marks, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the country of Eden, we are to take for guides theſe two conſiderations (to wit) that it lay eaſtward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all others the moſt beautiful and fertile. Firſt in reſpect of ſituation, the next country to Judea eaſtward was Arabia Petræa; but in this region was Moſes himſelf when he wrote: and the next unto it eaſtward alſo was Arabia the Deſart, both which in reſpect of the infertility could not be Eden, neither have any of the Arabians any ſuch rivers, as are expreſs'd to run out of it: ſo as it followeth of neceſſity, that Eden muſt be eaſtward, and beyond both Arabia Petræa, and Deſerta. But becauſe Eden is by Moſes named by it ſelf, and by the fertility and the rivers only deſcribed, we muſt ſeek it in other ſcriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour nations better deſcribed. In the prophet Iſaiah I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent countries, in theſe words ſpoken in the perſon of Senacherib by Rabſakeh. [a] Have the Gods of the nations delivered them, which my fathers have deſtroyed, as Goſan and Haran and Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar? and in Ezekiel, where he propheſieth againſt the Tyrians: [b] They of Haran and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Aſhur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to avoid confuſion, we muſt underſtand that there were two Edens, one of which the prophet Amos remembreth, where he divideth Syria into three provinces, whereof the firſt he maketh Syria Damaſcene, or Decapolitan: the ſecond part is that valley called Avenis, otherwiſe Convallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Aſſyria is joyned to Arabia the Deſart and where [d] Ptolemy placeth the city of Averia: and the third is known by the name of Domus Edenis, or Cœleſyria, otherwiſe vallis cava, or the hollow valley, becauſe the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both ſides, and border it: for Coile in Greek is cava in Latin. But this is not that Eden, which we ſeek: neither doth this province lie eaſt from Canaan, but north, and ſo joyneth unto it as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, becauſe there is a little city therein called Paradiſe, the Jews believed this Cœleſyria to be the ſame which Moſes deſcribeth. For the ſame cauſe doth Hopkins in his treatiſe of Paradiſe reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden with the other Eden of Paradiſe: tho' to give Beroaldus his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later writers, ſaving that he failed in diſtinguiſhing theſe two regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether miſunderſtood two of the four rivers, to wit, Piſon and Gehon, as ſhall appear hereafter. Now, to find out Eden, which (as Moſes teacheth us) lay eaſtward from the Deſarts, where he wrote after he had paſſed the red ſea; we muſt conſider where thoſe other countries are found, which the prophet Iſaiah and Ezekiel joineth with it. For (ſaith Iſaiah) Goſan, Haran, and Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar. Alſo [e] Ezekiel joineth Haran with Eden, who, together with thoſe of Sheba, Aſhur and Chilmad, were the merchants that traded with the city of Tyre, which was then (ſaith Ezekiel) the mart of the people for many iſles. And it hath ever been the cuſtom, that the Perſians conveyed their merchandiſe to Babylon, and to thoſe cities upon Euphrates and Tigris, and from thence tranſported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the port of the Mediterranean ſea: as in ancient times to the city of Tyre, afterwards to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbark them at the port of Alexandretta, in the bay of Iſſicus, now Laiazzo. Ezekiel, in the deſcription of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the nations of the eaſt, as the only mart-town of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and alſo what commodities every country yielded: and having counted the ſeveral people and countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exerciſed. [f] They were thy merchants (ſaith the prophet) in all ſorts of things, in rayments of blue ſilk, and of broidered works, fine linen, coral and pearl: and afterwards ſpeaking of the merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and in what kinds they traded, he hath theſe words. The merchants of Sheba and Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy fairs, with the chief of all ſpices, and with all precious ſtones and gold. Now theſe be indeed the riches which Perſia and Arabia fœlix yield: and becauſe Sheba and Raamah are thoſe parts of Arabia, which border the ſea, called the Perſian gulf, therefore did thoſe nations both vent ſuch ſpice, ſweet gums, and pearls, as their own countries yielded, and withal having trade with their neighbours of India, had from them alſo all ſorts of ſpices, and plenty of gold. The better to convey theſe commodities to that great mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entered by the mouth of Tigris, and from the city of Terredon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Balſara) thence ſent up all theſe rich merchandiſes by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended weſtward, and afterwards by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three days journey of Aleppo, and then over land they paſs'd to Tyre, as they did afterwards to Tripoly (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforeſaid. Now the merchants of Canneh, which Ezekiel joineth with Eden, inhabited far up the river, and received this trade from Arabia and India, beſides thoſe proper commodities which themſelves had, alſo which they received out of Perſia, which bordered them. St. Jerome underſtandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is ſeated upon Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads, and which took that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent city. Hieroſolymitanus thinks it to be Cteſiphon, but Cteſiphon is ſeated down low upon Tigris, and Canne cannot be on that ſide, I mean on the eaſt ſide of Tigris, for then were it out of the valley of Shinar. [g] Pliny placeth the Schenite upon Euphrates, where the ſame beginneth to be fordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Deſart, and where the river of Euphrates reflecteth from the Deſart of Palmirena: for theſe people of Canneh (afterwards Schenitæ) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, ſtretching themſelves from their own city of Canneh in Shinar weſtward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the city of Thapſacus, where Ptolemy appointed the fords of Euphrates: which alſo agreeth with the deſcription of the Schenitæ by Strabo, whoſe words are theſe; [a] Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam euntibus iter eſt per Schœnitas; The merchants which travel from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore thoſe which take Canneh for Charran do much miſtake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from [b] Ur in Chaldea (called by God) ſtandeth alſo in Meſopotamia, not upon Euphrates itſelf, but upon the river of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the merchants of Charran are diſtinctly named with thoſe of Canneh in Ezekiel, as they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Aſhur, and Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is ſometimes called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the ſame Charran of Meſopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Meſopotamia: or Aran fluviorum, the Greek word Meſopotamia importing a country between rivers: for Meſos in Greek is medius in Latin, and Potamos fluvius. And when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the city itſelf, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforeſaid.) For Strabo, in the deſcription of Arabia, giveth that tract of land from the borders of Cœleſyria to the edge of Meſopotamia, to the Schenitæ, who alſo inhabited on both ſides of Euphrates, and were in afterages accounted of theſe Arabians which inhabit Batanea and the north part of the Deſarts, ſtretching themſelves towards the unhabited ſolitude of Palmirena, which lyeth between Syria and Arabia the Deſart. So as theſe of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the prophet Ezekiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneth, and Eden, &c. But St. Jerome made a good interpretation of Canneth, or Chalne, by Seleucia, for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witneſs Appian;) and ſo Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his commentaries upon Geneſis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canne, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other cities, ſtanding in triangle with Seleucia, and almoſt the next unto it, as Thelbe-canne and Mann-canne, the one a little to the weſt of Seleucia, and the other oppoſite unto it, where theſe rivers of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to join. Therefore which of theſe the ancient Canne was (being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain ſeat thereof, that ſo many other cities did retain a part of the name in ſo many ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that theſe additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference between the eaſt and the weſt, or the greater and the leſs Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to diſtinguiſh cities by, are ordinary in all the regions of the world.

Now of the other city joyned with Eden, as Haran, or Charran, St. Jerome on the Judges ſpeaking thereof in theſe words: [c] Cumque reverterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, quæ eſt in medio itinere contra Ninevem, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran (which is the midway againſt Nineveh) the eleventh day.

This city is by the martyr Stephen, named Charran (ſpeaking to the high-prieſt:) [d] Ye men, brethren, and fathers, hearken: the God of glory appeared to our father Abraham, while he was in Meſopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the ſeat of this city is not doubted of: for it is not only remembred in many ſcriptures, but withal exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Craſſus the Roman, who, for his unſatiable greedineſs, was called Gurges avaritiæ; the gulf of avarice. Whereof Lucan:

With Roman blood th'Aſſyrian car he defil'd.

But this city Canne, or Chalne, is made manifeſt by Moſes himſelf, where it is written of Nimrod: [f] And the beginning of his kingdoms was Babel, and Erech, and Acad, and Chalne, in the land of Sinaar, or Shinar: where Moſes ſheweth the firſt compoſition of the Babylonian empire, and what cities and people were ſubject unto Nimrod; all which lay in the ſaid valley of Shinar, or near it; and this valley of Shinar is that tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which alſo Eden ſtretcheth it ſelf, Chaldæa, Babylonia, Sinar, idem ſunt (ſaith Comeſtor.) Three names of one country: which region of Babylonia, took name of the tower Babel; and the tower, of the confuſion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in theſe words: [g] And as they went from the eaſt, they found a plain in the land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which plain Babylon was built (as aforeſaid.)

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the firſt beginning of Nimrod's greatneſs, and before he had ſubdued any ſtrange, or far-off nations, being one part of his dominion, and alſo named by Moſes to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which alſo Ezekiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that thoſe of Eden were alſo the merchants which traded with the Tyrians: and Iſaiah in the threats of Senacherib againſt Jeruſalem (with other nations that Senacherib vaunted that his fathers had deſtroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telaſſar. But before I conclude where Eden it ſelf lyeth, it is neceſſary to deſcribe thoſe other countries which Ezekiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembred, as thoſe of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Geneſis: [h] Moreover the ſons of Ham were Cuſh, &c. And the ſons of Cuſh were Seba, and Havila, and Sabtah, and Raamah, &c. And the ſons of Raamah were Sheba, &c. And anon after; Cuſh begat Nimrod: ſo as Sheba was the grandchild of Cuſh, and Nimrod the ſon of Cuſh, whoſe elder brother was Sebah: though ſome there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and underſtanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma took that part adjoyning to Shinar, toward the ſea ſide and Perſian gulf (called afterwards Raama and Sheba, by the father, and his ſons, which poſſeſſed it.) For (ſaith Ezekiel) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy merchants, they occupied in thy fairs with the chief of all ſpices and all precious ſtones, and gold. So as Sheba was that tract of country, which parteth Arabia Deſerta from Arabia Felix, and which joyneth to the ſea, where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themſelves to the ocean. This part and the confining country, [a] Strabo calleth Catabria, where the beſt myrrh and frankincenſe is gathered: which people have an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the eaſt ſide of the Perſian gulf. By this it appears who were the Shebeans, ſpoken of by Ezekiel, and ſaid to have been the merchants of Tyre, for gold, ſpices, and precious ſtones: of which they had not only plenty of their own, but were alſo furniſhed from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their aromatics, and other proper commodities. For, as Strabo reporteth out of Eratoſthenes, In Perſicæ oræ initio inſula eſt, in qua multi & pretioſi uniones gignantur: in aliis vero, clari & perlucidi lapilli. Eratoſthenes (ſaith Strabo) affirmeth, that, In the beginning of the Perſian gulf, there is an iſland, in which there are many precious pearls bred: and in other, very clear and ſhining ſtones. Now, the difference between Sheba the ſon of Raamah, and Seba the ſon of Cuſh, is in this, that Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech;) and Sheba with (Schin:) but whatſoever the difference may be in the Hebrew orthography, their countries and habitations are diverſe. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Perſian ſea, and Saba (whence the queen of Saba) neighboured the red ſea; and ſo that place of the 72d Pſalm expounded Reges Arabum & Sabæ, hath in the Hebrew this ſenſe, Reges Shebæ & Sabæ.

The Shebans, Ezekiel nameth together with the Edenites, becauſe they inhabited upon the out-let of the ſame river, upon which the Edenites were ſeated: and ſo thoſe of Sheba, towards the ſea-coaſt and upon it, paſs'd up the country, by Tigris and Euphrates, being joyned in one main ſtream, and ſo through the region of Eden, which Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their merchandiſe toward Tyre. And as the cities of Charran, and Canneh, border Eden on the weſt and north-weſt: ſo doth Sheba on the ſouth, and Chilmad on the north-eaſt: Chilmad being a region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean paraphraſt: which country, by the geographers is called Coromitena (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews alſo often uſe.

Thus much of thoſe countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edenites, inhabiting Telaſſar: for theſe Senacherib vaunted, that his fathers had deſtroyed; and this place of Telaſſar lay moſt convenient, both to receive the trade from Sheba and Arabia, and alſo to convey it over into Syria and to Tyrus. Now, to make theſe things the more plain, we muſt remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian empire fell from his obedience, and after his death theſe monarchies were utterly disjoyned.

For it appeareth both in Eſay the 37th, and in the 2d of Kings, by the threats of Rabſache, the while the army of Aſſyria lay before Jeruſalem, that the cities of Goſan, Haran, Reſeph, and the Edenites at Telaſſar, had reſiſted the Aſſyrians: tho' by them (in a ſort) maſtered and recovered. [b] Have the Gods of the nations delivered them whom my fathers have deſtroyed, as Goſan, and Haran, Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar? But it appeared manifeſtly after Senacherib's death, that theſe nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others ſubjection: for Eſar-Haddon held Aſſyria; and Merodach Baludan, Babylonia. [c] And after that the army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabſache which lay before Jeruſalem (Hezekiah then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the angel of God deſtroyed; the king of Babel ſent to [d] Hezekiah, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Aſſyrians. After which overthrow, [e] Senacherib himſelf was ſlain by his own ſons in the temple of his idols, Eſar-Haddon ſucceeding him in Aſſyria. To the Babylonian ambaſſadors ſent by Merodach, [f] Hezekiah ſhewed all his treaſures as well proper as conſecrate, which invited the kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conqueſt and ſubverſion. So as, the ſuſpicion of war encreaſing between Babylon and Aſſyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the north, and towards Aſſyria, were employ'd to bear off the incurſions of the Aſſyrians; and their garriſon-place was at Telaſſar: and the very word (Telaſſar) ſaith Junius, ſignifying as much as a bulwark againſt the Aſſyrians. This place Hieroſolymitanus takes for Reſem, others for Seleucia: but this Telaſſar is the ſame, which Am. Marcellinus in the hiſtory of Julian (whom he followed in the enterpriſe of Perſia) calleth Thilutha inſtead of Telaſſar, who deſcribeth the exceeding ſtrength thereof in his 24th book: it is ſeated in an iſland of Euphrates upon a ſteep and unaſſaultable rock, inſomuch as the emperor Julian durſt not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a garriſon againſt the Aſſyrians, being alſo a paſſage out of Meſopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the country adjoyning were lodged to defend the ſame. This place [g] Ptolemy calleth Teridata, having Reſeph (which he calleth Reſepha) on the left hand; and Canneh (which he calleth Thelbe-Canne) on the right hand; not far from whence, is alſo found the city of Mann-Canne, upon Tigris; and all theſe ſeated together, as Eſay and Ezekiel have ſorted them. But the underſtanding of theſe places is the more difficult, becauſe Aſſyria (which the Chaldeans call Atturia) and Meſopotamia, were ſo often confounded; the one taken for the other by interchange of dominion. [h] Aſſyria & Meſopotamia in Babyloniæ nomen tranſierunt (ſaith Niger;) Aſſyria and Meſopotamia took the name of Babylonia. Laſtly, It appeareth, by thoſe adjacent regions by the prophets named, in what part of the world Eden is ſeated, as, by Charran or Haran in Meſopotamia: alſo by Canneh and Reſeph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in theſe words tranſlateth this place: Plantaverat autem Jehovah Deus hortum in Eden, ab oriente; The Lord God planted a garden in Eden eaſtward: that is (ſaith he in his annotations) Juſſerat naſci arbores in Eden, regione orientali, in finibus Arabiæ & Meſopotamiæ; He commanded trees to grow in Eden, an eaſtern region in the borders of Arabia and Meſopotamia.

SECT. X.

Of divers other teſtimonies of the land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradiſe.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it ſeems by the two epiſtles of the Neſtorian Chriſtians, that inhabit Meſopotamia: which epiſtles in the year 1552, they ſent to the pope about the confirming of their patriarch, and Andræas Maſius hath publiſhed them, tranſlated out of Syriac into Latin. By theſe epiſtles (I ſay) it ſeems we may have ſome farther light for the proof of that, which we have ſaid about the region of Eden

in

in thoſe parts. For in them both, there is mention of the iſland of Eden in the river Tigris, or at leaſt, Tigris in both theſe epiſtles is called the river of Eden. This iſland, as Maſius in his preface to theſe epiſtles ſaith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, the iſland, by an eminency.) It hath (ſaith he) ten miles in circuit, and was ſometimes walled round about, which name of the iſland Eden may (doubtleſs) remain to this day; tho' in the reſt of the region ſo called, this name be ſwallowed up with the fame of thoſe flouriſhing kingdoms of Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This iſland of Eden hath up the river, and not far beyond it, the city of Haſan-Cepha, otherwiſe Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Moſal or Moſel, from which (as in that which followeth it ſhall appear out of Maſius) it is not above twelve miles diſtant. Neither is it to trouble us, that Moſal or Moſel by Marius Niger is remembred among the cities higher up Tigris, in theſe words, [a] Juxta autem Tigrim, civitates ſunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quæ nunc Moſel dicitur; magna ſane, &c. (that is) By Tigris are theſe cities, Dorbeta near unto mount Taurus (which is now called Moſel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, diſplacing Moſel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I ſay) needs not here to trouble us: ſeeing for this matter, the teſtimony of Maſius, informed by the Chriſtians that dwelt there (the ſeat of whoſe patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Moſal (or Mozal) is in the confines of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria, ſeated upon Tigris, and in the neighbourhood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Neſtorian Chriſtians in their former epiſtle, call it Attur in theſe words: Ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis quæ ſunt circum civitatem Moſal (hoc eſt) Attur, in vicinia Nineves; Of all the cities and towns which are about the city of Moſal (that is) Attur in the neighbourhood of Nineve. As alſo Niger acknowledgeth Cteſiphon a city thereabout to be called Aſſur (which is the ſame as Attur, after the dialect of thoſe nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he ſhould miſtake Cteſiphon (which is not far off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Aſſur. By this then we may come ſomewhat near the end of our purpoſe. For the iſle of Eden, which lieth in the breaſt of Tigris, is but twelve miles from Moſal and that ancient city, which Ptolemy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the ſcriptures Nineve; Philoſtratus, and Simeon Sethi, Moſula, and John Lean, Moſal, others Moſſe (tho' it be not the ſame with Moſal) is ſet but a little higher upon the ſame river of Tigris, near Moſal: ſo that we are like to find this iſle of Eden hereabout. For the ſame Andræas Maſius, which placeth it above Moſal, makes it to be below Haſan-Cepha, which is upon the ſame river of Tigris.

The only difficulty is this, that ſome perhaps may think, that the words of the Neſtorians in both their epiſtles, ſpeak not of any iſle in Tigris, called the iſle of Eden, but of an iſle in Tigris, a river of Eden. But this ſenſe of their words in my opinion ſeemeth the more improbable. And yet, if this were the meaning here, we have a teſtimony from the learned of thoſe parts, that not only Euphrates, but alſo Tigris, was a river of Eden, and that the name of Eden in thoſe parts is not yet quite worn out, tho' the region hath been ſubject to the ſame change that all other kingdoms of the world have been, and hath by conqueſt and corruption of other languages, received new and differing names. For the ſouth part of Eden, which ſtretcheth over Euphrates, was after the flood called Shinar, and then, of the tower of Babel, Babylonia, and the north part of Eden is that tract of Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tigris between mount Taurus and Seleucia. And of this region of Eden that ancient Æthicus maketh mention (not that latter Æthicus, diſciple of Gallinicus, otherwiſe by Plutarch and Athenæus called Iſtri, who lived in Egypt in the reign of Philadelphus; but another of a far higher and remote time) the fame being made Latin out of the Greek by St. Jerome. And tho' by corruption of the ancient copy it be written, in Æthicus, Adonis for Edenis: yet Adonis, being a river of Phœnicia, cannot be underſtood to be the region named by Æthicus. For Æthicus makes it a country, and not a river, and joyneth it with Meſopotamia and Æthiopia, calling the land of Chus Æthiopia, after the vulgar, and ſeptuagint. And laſtly, the river which watereth the regions (ſaith Æthicus) falleth into the gulf of Perſia: which river he calleth Armodius for Tigris; Tigris being but a name impoſed for the ſwiftneſs thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates have their original: for out of Eden came a river, or rivers, to water the garden, both which rivers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traverſe Meſopotamia, regions firſt of all known by the name of Eden, for their beauty and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained alſo ſome part of Armenia; and the excellent fertility thereof in divers places is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in ſome part thereof (ſaith Strabo) the leaves are always green, and therefore therein a perpetual ſpring. Alſo Stephanus, de Urbibus, mentioneth the city of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in uſe in Amos's time, tho' he ſpake not of Eden in the eaſt, but of Eden in Cœleſyria. But to the end I may not burthen the readers patience with too long a diſcourſe, it may ſuffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once joined together, and afterwards ſeparate) are two of thoſe four heads, into which theſe rivers which are ſaid to water the garden of Paradiſe, were divided: whoſe courſes being known, Eden (out of which they are ſaid to come) cannot be unknown. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seventy and all others convert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel, Tigrim omnes exponunt; and all men underſtand Hiddekel by Tigris (ſaith Vatablus.) And becauſe that which I have ſaid of the iſle of Eden ſhall not be ſubject to the cenſure of ſelf-invention, I have hereunder ſet down the words out of the two general epiſtles of the Neſtorians, as Maſius (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latin. The occaſion of thoſe letters and ſupplications to the pope, were, that the Neſtorian Chriſtians, which inhabit Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Perſia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at leaſt in queen Mary's time they had) fifteen churches in one city called Seleucia Parthorum, or Moſel upon the river Tigris; having no ſufficient authority to chooſe themſelves a patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three metropolitan biſhops at the leaſt) ſent to the biſhop of Rome, in the year of Chriſt 1552 (as aforeſaid) a petition to obtain allowance unto ſuch an election, as themſelves had made: having three hundred years before that, upon the like defect, ſent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made known to the biſhop of Rome the ſtate of the Chriſtian church in thoſe parts: for, upon the death of their patriarch (who of a covetous deſire to enrich himſelf, had forborn to inſtitute metropolitan biſhops, when the places fell void) they all aſſembled themſelves together to conſult

of the church-government. And becauſe all the patriarchs for an hundred years had been of one houſe and family to the prejudice of the church, and that there yet remained one biſhop of the ſame ſtock and kindred, who aſpired to the ſame dignity which his predeceſſors had held, the reſt of the profeſſors refuſed to allow him. Upon which occaſion, and for the choice of a governour more ſufficient, the teachers in all the churches aſſembled themſelves. The words of the general epiſtle to the pope were theſe, about the middle of the ſaid epiſtle; Verum nos non acceptavimus, neque proclamavimus ipſum; ſed ſubito convenimus ex omnibus locis orientalibus, & ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis quæ ſunt circum civitatem Moſel (hoc eſt, Attur) in vicinia Nineves, ex Babylonia, ex Charra, ex Arbella, ex Inſula quæ eſt in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, &c. i. e. But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but ſuddenly we aſſembled our ſelves out of all parts of the eaſt, and out of all the cities and villages which are about Moſel (or Attur) neighbouring upon Nineve; and out of Babylon, Charra, Arbella; and out of the iſland which lieth in the middle of Tigris, a river, of Eden, or rather out of the iſle of Eden, which lieth in the river Tigris. And in a ſecond epiſtle at the ſame time ſent, they uſed theſe words: Neque ſuperſunt apud nos metropolitæ, quorum eſt ordinare catholicum; ſed ſoli pauci epiſcopi, epiſcopus Arbelæ, epiſcopus Salmaſti, epiſcopus Adurbeigan; en e veſtigio convenimus in inſulam, quæ eſt intra Tigrim flumen, Eden; fecimuſque compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any metropolitan biſhops, to whom it belongs to ordain a patriarch, but only a few biſhops, as the biſhop of Arbela, the biſhop of Salmaſtus, and the biſhop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we aſſembled ſpeedily in the iſland of Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed between our ſelves, &c.

Now this iſland of Eden, Maſius deſcribeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Neſtorian epiſtles, and the ſtate of the church may be in thoſe parts (ſaith he) the better underſtood. And after he hath diſtinguiſhed the four ſorts of Chriſtians in thoſe parts of the world, and in the ſouth part of Africa, which he calleth Neſtorians, Jacobites, Maronitæ, and Cophti, he goeth on in theſe words: Mox, audita illius morte, concurriſſe aiebant tumultuario in illam quam modo dixi Tigris inſulam, quæ duodecim circiter paſſuum millibus ſupra Moſal poſita, decem fere millia paſſuum ſuo ambitu continet, muris undique cincta, & a paucis aliis quam Chriſtianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the patriarch (as thoſe that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuouſly together into that iſland of Tigris or Eden before ſpoken of, which iſland is ſituated about twelve miles above Moſal, containing very near ten miles in compaſs, and every where invironed with a wall, inhabited by few other men than Chriſtians. And afterward, he maketh a recapitulation of the Chriſtian churches; among the reſt he addeth the iſle of Eden by the name of Geſerta, inſula Tigris, ſive Geſerta. Furthermore, deſcribing the city of Hoſan-Cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it ſupra prædictam Tigris inſulam, rupi aſperæ impoſitam; Above the aforeſaid iſland of Tigris, being ſeated on a ſteep rock. Of this iſland of Geſerta, Andrew Theuet maketh mention in his 10th book of his general coſmography, in theſe words: Geſerta ou Geſire eſt au milieu de la riviere du Tigre, & penſe que c'eſt une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Aſie; Geſerta or Geſire is in the middle of Tigris, the ſoil the moſt fertile of all Aſia.

By this we may ſee that the ancient name of Eden liveth; and of that Eden which lieth eaſtward from Arabia Petræa, and the deſart where Moſes wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezekiel, and that Eden which is ſeated according to the aſſertion of the ſaid prophet, and joined with thoſe nations of Reſeph, Canneth, and Charran, and the reſt which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two regions of Aſſyria, and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Telaſſar were garriſoned to reſiſt the Aſſyrians, whoſe diſplantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above-written;) and laſtly, the ſame Eden, which embraceth Tygris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the known rivers of thoſe four, which are by all men aſcribed to Paradiſe.

SECT. XI.

Of the difficulty in the text, which ſeemeth to make the four rivers to riſe from one ſtream.

BUT it may be objected, that it is written in the text, That a river went out of Eden, and not rivers in the plural: which ſcruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus anſwered in his chronology: The Latin tranſlation, ſaith he, hath theſe words: Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradiſum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: quæ verba melius conſentiunt cum rei narratione, & ejuſdem explicatione, ſi ita reddantur; & fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene (hoc eſt) fluvii procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a river went out of the place of pleaſure to water Paradiſe, and thence was divided into four heads; which words (ſaith Beroaldus) do better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus tranſlated; And a river was going forth of Eden (that is) rivers went forth, and ran out of the region of Eden to water the orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became four heads. The Tigurine differs from the vulgar or Latin; for it converts it thus, Et fluvius egrediebatur de deliciis; And a river went out of pleaſure, inſtead of Eden; and the Latin addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a river went out of the place of pleaſure: and ſo the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a region moſt delighful and fertile; and ſo alſo the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the country of Eden, and not to the garden it ſelf.

And for the word (river) for rivers, it is uſual among the Hebrews: for it is written: Gen. i. 11. Let the earth bud forth the bud of the herb that ſeedeth ſeed, the fruitful tree, &c. Here the Hebrew uſeth the ſingular for the plural, herb and tree, for herbs and trees; and again, Gen. iii. 2. We eat of the fruit of the tree, inſtead of (trees:) And thirdly, Gen. iii. 8. The man and his wife hid themſelves from the preſence of God; In medio ligni Paradiſi; In the middle of the tree of the garden, for (trees.) And of this opinion is David Kimchi and Vatablus, who upon this place of Geneſis ſay, that the Hebrews do often put the ſingular for the plural, as illud, for unumquodque illorum; and he giveth an inſtance in this queſtion it ſelf, as, A river (for rivers) went out of Eden.

And this anſwer out of divers of the learned, may, not without good reaſon, be given to the objection, that Moſes ſpeaketh but of one river, from which the heads ſhould divide themſelves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reaſon, we may expound the four heads, to be four notable paſſages into famous countries. And ſo we may take the word (river) verſe the 10th for one river (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this river

(after he is paſt the place, where we ſuppoſe Paradiſe to have been) divides it ſelf, and ere long yielded four notable paſſages into ſeveral countries, tho' not all the way down ſtream (for this is no where in the text) where it is noted, that following the river downward, there is conveyance into the countries named in the text, tho' part of the way to one of the countries (to wit, to Aſſyria) were up Tigris.

To this end the text ſpeaking of Hiddekel, as it riſeth from the river of Eden, doth not ſay, it compaſſeth or waſheth the whole region of Aſſyria (as it had uſed this phraſe of Piſon and Gehon) but that it runneth towards Aſſyria. The firſt branch Piſon, is Nahar-malcha (by interpretation) Baſilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris under Apamia; whence ariſeth the name of Paſi-Tigris, as it were Piſo-Tigris. This leadeth to the land of Havila or Suſiana. The ſecond branch Gehon, is that which in hiſtorians is Nabarſares or Narragas, for Nahar-ragas: both which names ſignify flumen derivatum (a river derived) alſo Acracanus, quaſi Ranoſus, by reaſon of the froggy fens which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the firſt ſeat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is loſt at length in the lakes of Chaldea. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper ſtream of Piſon, or Baſilius, which runneth into Hiddekel, properly ſo called (that is, into Tigris) above Seleucia, where it ſheweth a paſſage up Tigris into Aſſyria: where, becauſe at length it is called Hiddekel or Tigris, having before no known proper name, the text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, ſo called per excellentiam, being the body of the river Euphrates, which runneth thro' Babylon and Otris. But be it a river or rivers, that come out of Eden, ſeeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradiſe was not far from theſe rivers: for that Perath in Moſes is Euphrates, there can be no queſtion; and (indeed) as plain it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (ſaith Moſes eaſtward towards Aſſur, as we find, that Tigris is the river of Aſſyria proprie dicta, whoſe chief city was Nineveh, as in Geneſis the 10th it is written: That out of that land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Aſſur, and builded Nineveh, which was the chief city of Aſſyria.

And as for the kind of ſpeech here uſed in the text, ſpeaking of four heads; tho' the heads of rivers be (properly) their fountains, yet here are they to be underſtood, to be ſpoken of the beginning of their diviſion from the firſt ſtream. Caput aquæ (ſaith Ulpianus) illud eſt, unde aqua naſcitur; ſi ex fonte naſcatur fons; ſi ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a fountain, then is the fountain taken for the head: if out of a lake, then the lake; and if from a main river any branch be ſeparate and divided, then where that branch doth firſt bound it ſelf with new banks, there is that part of the river, where the branch forſaketh the main ſtream, called the head of the river.

SECT. XII.

Of the ſtrange fertility and happineſs of the Babylonian ſoil, as it is certain that Eden was ſuch.

IT may alſo be demanded, whether this region of Eden, by us deſcribed, be of ſuch fertility and beauty, as Eden the ſeat of Paradiſe was: which if it be denied, then muſt we alſo conſider, that there was no part of the earth, that retained that fertility and pleaſure, that it had before the curſe: neither can we aſcribe the ſame fruitfulneſs to any part of the earth, nor the ſame virtue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the food; and therefore this region of Eden may be now no ſuch flouriſhing country, as it was when it was firſt created in his perfection. Yet this I find written of it: Firſt in Herodotus, Clia. lib. 1. who was an eye-witneſs, and ſpeaketh of the very place it ſelf, for the iſle of Eden is but twelve miles or thereabout from Nineveh, and ſo from Moſal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod urbs Ninus ſita erat, hæc regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima eſt, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not far from the place where Ninus is ſeated; this region, of all that we have ſeen, is moſt excellent. And he addeth afterward, Cereris autem fructu procreando adeo ferax eſt, ut nunquam non fere ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is ſo fruitful in bringing forth corn, that it yieldeth two hundred fold: the leaves of wheat and barley being almoſt four fingers broad: as for the height of millet and ſeſam, they are even in length like unto trees, which altho' I know to be true, yet I forbear to ſpeak hereof, well knowing, that thoſe things which are reported of this fruitfulneſs, will ſeem very incredible to thoſe, which never were in the country of Babylon. They have commonly in all the country palm-trees growing of their own accord, the moſt of them bearing fruit; out of which they make both meats, and wine, and honey, ordering them as the fig-trees. Thus far Herodotus.

To this palm-tree, ſo much admired in the Eaſt-India, Strabo and Niger add a fourth excellency, which is, that it yieldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; of which theſe people make bread, wine, honey, and vinegar. But Antonius the eremite findeth a fifth commodity, not inferiour to any of thoſe four, which is, that from this ſelf-ſame tree there is drawn a kind of fine flax, of which people make their garments, and with which in Eaſt-India they prepare the cordage for their ſhips; and that this is true, Athanaſius in the life of Antonius the eremite confeſſeth, ſaying, That he received a garment made thereof from the eremite himſelf, which he brought with him out of this region. So therefore thoſe trees, which the Eaſt-Indies ſo highly eſteem and ſo much admire (as indeed the earth yieldeth no plant comparable to this) thoſe trees (I ſay) are in this upper Babylon, or region of Eden, as common as any trees of the field. Sunt etiam (ſaith Strabo) paſſim per omnem regionem palmæ ſua ſponte naſcentes; there are of palms over all the whole region, growing of their own accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report, Euntibus a parte læva Arabiæ odorum fertilitate nobilis, regio campeſtris intereſt inter Tigrim & Euphratem, jacens tam ubere & pingui ſolo, ut a paſtu repelli pecora dicantur, ne ſatietas perimat (that is) As you travel on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of ſweet odours) there lieth a champain country placed between Tigris and Euphrates, and ſo fruitful and fat a ſoil, that they are ſaid to drive their cattle from paſture, leſt they ſhould periſh by ſatiety. Bis in anno ſegetes Babylonii ſecant; The Babylonians cut their corn twice a year (ſaith Niger.) And as countries generally are more fruitful to the ſouthward, than in the northern parts: ſo we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the ſouth part of Armenia, which is the north border of Eden, or a part thereof; his words be theſe in the Latin, Tota enim hæc regio frugibus & arboribus abundat manſuetis, itemque ſemper virentibus; This region aboundeth with pleaſant fruits, and trees always green: which witneſſeth a perpetual ſpring, not found elſewhere but in the Indies only, by reaſon of the ſun's neighbourhood, the life and ſtirrer up of nature in a pera perpetual activity. In brief, ſo great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are conſtrained twice to mow down their corn-fields, and a third time to eat them up with ſheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the valley of Mexico, for the firſt forty years, could not make out kind of wheat bear ſeed, but it grew up as high as the trees, and was fruitleſs. Beſides, thoſe fields are altogether without weeds (ſaith [a] Pliny) who addeth this ſingularity to that ſoil, That the ſecond year the very ſtubble (or rather falling down of the ſeeds again) yieldeth them a harveſt of corn without any further labour: his words are theſe: Ubertatis tantæ ſunt, ut ſequenti anno ſponte reſtibilis fiat ſeges.

SECT. XIII.

Of the river Piſon, and the land of Havilah.

AFTER the diſcovery of Eden, and the teſtimonies of the fertility thereof, it reſteth to prove that Piſon and Gehon are branches of Tigris and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certainty of theſe two rivers ſhould trouble ſo many wiſe men, it is ſtrange to me, ſeeing neceſſity itſelf (Tigris and Euphrates being known) findeth them out: for Euphrates or Tigris, or both, be that river or rivers of Eden, which water Paradiſe, which river or rivers Moſes witneſſeth afterward; divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Piſon, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a ſtranger fancy in the world, than when we find both theſe, namely, Tigris and Euphrates in Aſſyria and Meſopotamia, to ſeek the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two rivers as far diſtant, as any of fame known or diſcovered in the world: the ſcriptures making it ſo plain, that theſe rivers were divided into four branches; and with the ſcriptures, nature, reaſon and experience bearing witneſs. There is no error, which hath not ſome ſlippery and bad foundation, or ſome appearance of probability reſembling truth, which when men (who ſtudy to be ſingular) find out (ſtraining reaſon according to their fancies) they then publiſh to the world matter of contention and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformity of mens minds to find ſome partakers or ſectators, the better by their help to nurſe and cheriſh ſuch weak babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But this miſtaking (and firſt for the river of Piſon) ſeemeth to have grown out of the not diſtinguiſhing of that region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah, which adjoineth to Babylonia, afterwards known by the name of Suſiana. For Havilah upon Tigris took name from Havilah the ſon of Cuſh; and Havilah in India from Havilah the ſon of Joctan; the one remembred by Moſes in the deſcription of Paradiſe, the other where [b] Moſes ſetteth down the generations of Noah and his ſons after the flood. For the ſons of Cuſh were Seba, Havila, Sabtah, and Raamah; and the ſons of Joctan were Ophir and Havilah, &c. of which latter, to wit, of Ophir and Havilah, the ſons of Joctan, that iſland of Ophir (whence Solomon had gold) and Havilah adjoining had their names. Now becauſe Ganges is a great and a famous river of the Eaſt-India, and Havilah a country of the ſame, and is ſituated upon Ganges, hence it came, that Ganges is taken for [c] Piſon, which river is ſaid by Moſes to water the land of Havilah. Or perhaps it was ſuppoſed that thoſe four rivers, named by Moſes, muſt of neceſſity be four of the greateſt in the world; whence (ſuppoſing that Ganges was the next great and famous river after Tigris and Euphrates, they choſe out this river to make one of the four. And yet certainly there is another river, whom in theſe reſpects they ſhould rather have choſen than Ganges; for the river Indus on this ſide India, for beauty, for nearneſs, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges; but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reaſonable man conceive, that Ganges can be one of the four heads: ſeeing Indus cometh between it and Tigris; and between Tigris and Indus is all that large empire of Perſia, conſiſting of many kingdoms. And again, farther towards the eaſt, and beyond Indus, are all thoſe ample dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie between thoſe two proud rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the four, becauſe it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Perſia, then how much leſs Ganges, which falleth into the ocean, little leſs than forty degrees to the eaſtward of Indus? Surely whoſoever readeth the ſtory of Alexander ſhall find, that there is no river in Aſia, that can exceed Indus. For Hydaſpis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies tranſported himſelf and the greateſt part of his army, and in ſailing down that branch of Indus, found it ſo large and deep, and by reaſon thereof ſo great a billow, as it endangered his whole fleet, which was ready to be ſwallowed up therein: Hydaſpis (as aforeſaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having beſides this, the rivers of Coas, of Suaſtus, Aceſines, Adris (otherwiſe Hirotis) Hiſpalis and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are ſwallowed up with all their children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one ſtream, it croſſeth athwart Aſia, and then at Cambaia viſiteth the ocean ſea.

But becauſe Piſon, which compaſſeth Havilah, as alſo [d] Gehon, which watereth Cuſh, muſt ſomewhere be joined with the reſt in one body, or at leaſt be found to proceed out of the ſame country of Eden, out of which the other two heads do proceed, out of doubt they cannot, either the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riſeth in the uttermoſt of the ſouth, and runneth northward into the Mediterranean ſea; and the river Ganges riſeth out of the mountain Imaus, or (as others will have it) Caucaſus, which divides the northern Scythia from India, and runneth from north to ſouth into the Indian ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, near Georgiana or Iberia, the other not far off in the ſame Armenia, by the Gordiæan mountains, ſo as Ganges who only travelleth in her own India, and Nilus thro' Ethiopia and Egypt, never ſaw the land of Eden, or joined themſelves in one channel, either with themſelves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be ſeparated or divided into four heads or branches, according to Moſes.

Therefore the river Piſon, which inricheth Havila, is the ſame which by joining itſelf with Tigris, was therefore called Piſi-tigris, or Piſo-tigris, of Piſon and Tigris, which river watereth that Havilah, which Havilah the ſon of Cuſh gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, ſo called of Havilah the ſon of Joctan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the eaſt. And this Havilah of the Cuſhites hath alſo [e] gold, bdellium, and the onyx-ſtone. This bdellium is a tree, of the bigneſs of an olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yieldeth a certain gum, ſweet to ſmell to, but bitter in taſte, called alſo bdellium. The Hebrews take the loadſtone for bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew ſignifieth pearl: ſo doth Eugubinus; and Jerome calls it Oleaſter: be it what it will, a tree bearing gum or pearl: Havilah or Suſiana hath plenty of both. Now this country of Suſiana or Havilah ſtretcheth itſelf towards the north, as far as the altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all the tract of land ſouthward, as far as the Perſian gulf, on the eaſt ſide thereof: from which eaſt-ſide had the Shebans (which traded with the city of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold, which Strabo alſo witneſſeth, as was ſhewed before.

The [a] Greeks had a conceit, that Piſon was Danubius: the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Aben-ezra (ſaith [b] Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, tranſlateth Piſon into Nilus: but Nilus findeth the ſame impoſſibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the ſea of Helleſpont and all Aſia the leſs, between it and Tigris. Now Piſon, which runneth through Havilah or Suſiana, doth to this day retain ſome ſign of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other under the city of Apamia, there do they agree of a joynt and compounded name, and are called Piſo-tigris. And it is ſtrange unto me, that from ſo great antiquity there ſhould be found remaining any reſembling ſound of the firſt name: for Babylon itſelf, which dwelleth ſo near theſe rivers, is by ſome writers known by the name of Bandas, as, by [c] Poſtellus, by Caſtaldus, of Baldach: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Boughedor, by [d] Andrew Theuet; and yet all thoſe that have lately ſeen it, call it Bagdet. To this river of Piſon, [e] Ptolemy indeed, with many others, give the name of Baſilius or Regius, and Gehon they term Maharſares and Marſias, and Baarſares. So is Euphrates, near the ſpring and fountain, by Strabo and [f] Pliny called Pixirates: by Junius, Puckperah, out of the Hebrew, that is, the profuſion or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh thro' the mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrews Parath (ſaith Ar. Montanus:) Pagninus, Perath: Joſephus, Phorah: Euſebius, Zozimus: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Giſtilanus and Colinutius term it Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Aſſyrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The ſame confuſion of names hath Tigris, as, Diglito, and Diglath, Seilax, and Sollax: of the Hebrews it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.
